

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

The House met at Two of the clock.

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

For the Borough of Hackney (North Division), v. General Sir Lewis Pelly, K.C.B., K.C.S.I., deceased.

QUESTIONS.

SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION AT MITTON.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON (Devon, Tavistock): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education with reference to the Petition which was addressed by the inhabitants of Mitton, in the parish of Buckland Monachorum, to the Education Department in 1891, praying for additional school accommodation similar to that provided in analogous circumstances in the neighbouring parish of Beer Ferris, and to which the Department replied, on 9th February, 1892, to the effect that, having inquired into the case, they thought it would be met by the provision of an infant school at Mitton Combe to hold 50 children, at which children might remain till passing the Second Standard, or attaining nine years of age, whether, in view of the facts that the petitioners were not consulted on the said inquiry, that Mitton and the adjoining hamlets are one and a-half to two miles and more from the existing school at Buckland Monachorum, and that greater facilities have been given for education under similar circumstances at Beer Ferris, the Department will raise its requirements for a school at Mitton to one that will hold 60 children, girls being allowed to finish their education there and boys to remain till ten, if desired?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The facts are in the main as stated in my noble Friend's question; but it was held expedient in regard to the educational benefit of the district that one good school should be maintained in a central position rather than two small schools in different parts of the parish.

IRELAND AND THE PUBLIC HEALTH AMENDMENT ACT, 1890.

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY (London-derry): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the regulations relating to "The Public Health Amendment Act, 1890," will be sanctioned by the Irish Local Government Board?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The regulations relating to the Public Health Amendment Act, 1890, were duly prepared by the Irish Local Government Board and laid before Parliament in accordance with the Act. A Report has been received that no Resolution has been passed by the House of Commons against the regulations, and a similar Report is expected daily from the other House, upon receipt of which the necessary Order in Council confirming the regulations will be forthwith passed.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The terms of the Act prescribe two months as the period during which the regulations should be before either House; can the right hon. Gentleman explain how it is that the Report has not yet been received from the other House?

MR. JACKSON: No; I have no explanation to give.

BETTING PROSECUTIONS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the following observations, reported in the Times and other newspapers as having been made by Mr. Hannay, Stipendiary Magistrate, at the Marylebone Police Court, on Thursday last, in the course of a prosecution for betting instituted by the Commissioners of Police—

"Mr. Hannay observed that, in almost all these betting prosecutions, there was an evident excess of insincerity, for one must know that gambling was going on amongst the highest as among the lowest of society. Fortunately it was not for him to say why one person was prosecuted and another left alone"; and whether he will take such steps as will secure that the laws against gambling shall be enforced by the police with impartiality against all classes?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir, I have seen the newspaper paragraph referred to. The prosecution of a betting-house depends entirely upon the particular circumstances of each case. I think the learned Magistrate cannot have been aware that the Metropolitan Police, in such cases as the Park Club and the Field Club, took proceedings against persons belonging to the higher classes of society; and I am not aware of any grounds for imputing insincerity or partiality to them in the enforcement of the law.

Viscount Ebrington

CATHOLIC PRISON CHAPLAINS.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury why the Roman Catholic Chaplain to the Glasgow Barlinnie Prisons, with a daily population of 1,200 and annual commitments of 27,000, receives only £100 a year, with neither house allowance nor right to pension, whereas the Roman Catholic Chaplain to Liverpool Prison, with a daily population of 1,000 and annual commitments of 1,900, receives £300 a year, together with a house and right to pension?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. Gorst, Chatham): I have no information as to the accuracy or otherwise of the numbers quoted. Salaries are fixed after communication with the responsible Department; and it is impossible for me to compare the various considerations, no doubt quite satisfactory in each case, which justify the respective amounts.

THE LINCOLNSHIRE CHARITIES.

SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Exeter, as a Charity Commissioner, whether the attention of the Charity Commissioners has been called to the Report of the Charities Committee of the Lindsey (Lincolnshire) County Council, in which it is stated that, out of a Return of 458 charities, 132 appeared to be either lost or misapplied; and whether the Charity Commissioners propose to take proceedings under "The Charitable Trusts (Recovery) Act, 1891," or under any other Acts, with reference to these 132 charities?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. Maxwell, Wigton): My hon. Friend has asked me to answer this question. The Charity Commissioners have no knowledge of the Report mentioned in the question. But if the Lindsey County Council should call the attention of the Commissioners to the case of any charity within the Division to which the provisions of the Charities Recovery Act of 1891 are applicable, the Commissioners will consider whether proceedings should be taken under that Act.

THE FRANCHISE AND POOR LAW RELIEF.

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the fact that, in consequence of the dispute in the coal trade in the county of Durham, great distress prevails in the south-east of Durham, and the north-east of Yorks, and especially in the towns of Darlington, Stockton, Middlesbrough, and the Hartlepoons; that owing to this distress, many thousands of industrious working men, ordinarily in receipt of good wages, have been for several weeks thrown out of employment through no fault whatever of their own, and by causes over which they have no control, and have thereby been obliged to accept relief from public funds, and will thereby lose their votes at the next General Election; and whether, under these circumstances, he will consider the advisability of passing a short Act through both Houses of Parliament in order to relieve these men from being disfranchised at the coming Election?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Ritchie, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I greatly deplore the distress which has been caused throughout the districts named in the question by the attitude of the colliers at present on strike. It is undoubtedly a matter of regret that one of the consequences of this strike should be that persons themselves not responsible for it should be driven to have recourse to the Poor Law and thus for a time be disfranchised; but my hon. and gallant Friend asks the Government to take a step in order to avert this consequence, which is of a very grave character. If the Government were to propose that, because these persons were driven to have recourse to the Poor Law by causes over which they have no control, the consequences which are involved by the law as it stands at present with reference to the franchise should not follow, it would be very difficult to oppose similar relief being given to all those who, at any time, by causes for which they are not responsible, were driven to seek relief at the hands of the Guardians. Such a principle may be right or wrong, but it is a very serious and important change in the law which ought not hastily or without full consideration to be proposed. In addition to the question of principle, there would be great difficulties of detail to which I need not now allude. I hope I have said enough to show to my hon. and gallant Friend that, although the Bill might be what he calls a short one, it involves such serious questions both of principle and detail that it would be impossible to hold out any hope of its passing through Parliament this Session even if it were considered advisable to deal with the matter in the way suggested.

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN: Fully concurring in the spirit of the right hon. Gentleman's answer, may I ask him will he consider the possibility for the future of devising some means of discriminating between the cases of men ordinarily in good circumstances, and who may be driven to receive exceptional relief, and the cases of those who are habitually in receipt of relief, and therefore are not entitled to the franchise?

*MR. RITCHIE: As I have endeavoured to inform the House, that is a principle totally foreign to the existing Poor Law, and I cannot myself hold out any expectation that I shall be prepared, with the knowledge I at present possess, to ask the House to consider and deal with exceptional cases produced by such causes.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether in the draft of the Bill for the further Amendment of Local Government this question is dealt with?

*MR. RITCHIE: I think it would be quite contrary to usage for a Member of the Government to give an explanation of the details of a Bill not yet before the House.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Has the right hon. Gentleman any objection to give time for the discussion of the question upon the Bill I have given notice to introduce?

*MR. RITCHIE: That is a question which should be addressed to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House; but I think, with the engagements the Government now have, my right hon. Friend would find some difficulty in giving time for the discussion of a Bill which must involve a long and intricate debate.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE IN ESSEX AND HERTS.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture what was the extent of the area declared to be an infected zone in Essex and Herts by the Order of the Board of Agriculture dated 13th April, 1892, and what the sole reason for that Order; what is the process by which notice of the declaration of an infected zone is given to farmers in districts remote from the market affected; and whether he will consider the desirability in the future—after the disease has been localised on one farm, and a sufficient period has elapsed to show that no other cases have developed since the last open markets of the districts proclaimed—of confining the infected zone to an area of not more than two miles in diameter round the farm where the disease exists?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The zone declared in Essex and Hertfordshire by the Order of the Board on 13th April comprised the Petty Sessional Divisions of Brentwood, Epping, Ongar, and Orsett, and the liberty of Haveringham Bower, in Essex. The reason for that Order was an outbreak at Clavering, in Essex, among animals which were seen by one of the most experienced officers of the Board, and were found to be undoubtedly affected with the disease. When an outbreak is discovered, and an Order of the Board is passed, the Local Authorities are at once informed of it, generally by telegraph as well as by post; and it is their duty to give publicity to the Orders in the district affected. With regard to the system suggested by the hon. Member of declaring smaller areas of not more than two miles in diameter to be infected, I may remind him that that is practically the system which was formerly adopted and failed so signally in the past; and I should be very reluctant, by any engagement of the kind, to fetter the action of the Board, who must be guided by the circumstances in each case, and upon them the responsibility must necessarily rest of dealing with outbreaks as they think best.

MR. H. GARDNER: The right hon. Gentleman says a similar system of areas was formerly adopted and failed, but I do not think he has quite apprehended the tenour of my question. My question was whether, after the right hon. Gentleman has satisfied himself that there is no danger of an outbreak, except in one particular part of the area, he will then contract the area of the zone around the infected spot?

MR. CHAPLIN: That is precisely the plan formerly adopted, and which experience tells us it is not expedient to renew.

POACHING IN THE FOREST OF DEAN.

MR. SAMUELSON (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of Charles Paul, Crown woodman, of Staunton, Forest of Dean, who was fined 30s. and 10s. costs on Tuesday, 12th April, upon a charge of poaching; and whether, in view of the fact that no evidence was offered by the prosecution that the man Paul was trespassing in pursuit of game, and that he has hitherto borne an excellent character and has never before been charged before a Magistrate, a further inquiry will be instituted into the case?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have received a report from the Magistrates' clerk concerning this case. The evidence showed that Paul—with two other men who were also convicted and fined—was trespassing in pursuit of game. There was no evidence offered that any of the three men had been previously convicted, and no question of character arose. I do not find in the circumstances of the case sufficient ground for interference with the action of the Magistrates.

MR. SAMUELSON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a Magistrate stated one of the persons was a notorious poacher?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am aware of that, but there was no evidence given to warrant that statement; so I suppose the Magistrate spoke from the fulness of his private knowledge.

MACROOM POST OFFICE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been directed to the inadequate accommodation afforded in the Macroom Post Office; and whether, in view of the fact that new post offices have been built in other places in the South of Ireland which possess less business and postal traffic than Macroom, steps will be soon taken to build new postal premises in Macroom?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The sub-post office of Macroom was fitted up by the sub-postmaster in 1888 at considerable expense, and I am told it affords ample accommodation both for the public and for the staff. A new office is quite unnecessary.

DR. TANNER: If I put a representation from the inhabitants before the right hon. Gentleman will it obtain consideration?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Certainly I will consider it, but I have told the hon. Member what the representation made to me is.

THE CORK AND DUBLIN MAIL SERVICE.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any further steps have been taken to provide the required acceleration of the mail service between Cork and Dublin; and whether any further communications have taken place on this matter between the Post Office and the Great Southern and Western Railway or between the Post Office and the Treasury?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I can only say "No" to this question. Nothing fresh has occurred.

DR. TANNER: Is it the intention of the Post Office Department to submit to the snub offered by the Treasury on this matter?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There is no question of the Treasury in the matter. I fully explained the whole circumstances on a former occasion when the hon. Member raised the subject, and I have indicated that no doubt this subject will be re-considered at a future time.

NAVAL MEDICAL OFFICERS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any, and, if so, what, steps have been taken to carry out the promise given by the First Lord that medical officers in the Navy will be given the opportunities recommended by a Commission and Committee of this House—namely, to be given permission to attend, while on full pay, the medical schools in Great Britain, after certain periods afloat?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): A certain number of surgeons of the Royal Navy, after returning from service afloat, are now permitted annually to attend metropolitan hospitals for a time on full pay, and the experiment has been attended by satisfactory results.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): May I ask whether a similar privilege will be extended to medical officers in the Army Medical Department?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I shall be glad if the hon. Member will give notice of that question.

SHEERNESS DREDGING REFUSE AND LOCAL FISHERIES.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that Government lighters from Sheerness are in the habit of discharging mud and rubbish into the fishing grounds between the Nore Sand and Sheerness Middle Ground, thereby contravening the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act and the bye-laws of the Sea Fisheries Committee, and inflicting great loss on Essex fishermen, by damaging nets and spoiling the grounds; and whether he will issue an Order directing Government dredgers, like those belonging to contractors and Vestries, to deposit their refuse at a safe distance from the fishing grounds?

LORD G. HAMILTON: A few years ago, when it was decided to dredge a new ship channel in the Medway, the sites between the Nore Sand and Sheerness Middle Ground were chosen for the deposit of the material so dredged as the least likely to prove injurious to navigation or fisheries. The mud dredged from the basins in the dockyard at Sheerness is also deposited there, but no rubbish is discharged on those sites by Government vessels. The provisions of the Sea Fisheries Act do not apply in this instance, as the sites in question are within the limits of the Dockyard Port of Chatham and Sheerness, over which the Admiralty possesses exclusive jurisdiction. The effect of these deposits is carefully watched, and there is no reason to suppose that any injury has resulted, or will result, to the navigable channels or the local fisheries, which are little followed in that part of the estuary, the quantity of material deposited by the Government lighters being exceedingly small, as compared with the large and deep spaces available for its reception.

MAJOR RASCH: I have to thank the noble Lord for his answer; but I should like to know whether, if it is found that the deposits of mud are injurious to the fisheries, he will give orders to have the practice stopped?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Any allegation of that kind, which is supported by reliable evidence, will be taken into consideration. I think, however, it will be found that my statement is correct, that no injury has been inflicted on the fisheries.

PENALTIES FOR NON-VACCINATION IN SCOTLAND.

MR. ALBERT BRIGHT (Birmingham, Central): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the costs and expenses amounting to £1 19s. inflicted on William George Unkles, at Ayr, on 12th January, for having failed to vaccinate his child, are according to law; and whether such charges are uniform throughout Scotland?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I have made inquiry into this matter, and am informed that the costs referred to in the question were taxed by the auditor of the Court before whom the complaint was brought, who passed them as being in accordance with the law regulating such fees. The charges are fixed by Statute, but, of course, must necessarily vary to some extent according to the circumstances of each case.

RE-AFFORESTATION OF IRELAND.

MR. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a proposal to purchase additional land at Knockboy, County Galway, for the purpose of planting trees, which has been brought under his attention, has resulted in the acquisition by the Congested Districts Board of any further land for re-forestation; if so, what further area is at the disposal of the Board, and at what pace are the planting operations being carried out?

MR. JACKSON: I should be much obliged if the hon. Member will repeat the question on Thursday.

ST. GEORGE'S BARRACKS.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary, War Department, whether his attention has been called to the conditions of crowding and discomfort under which the examination of recruits has to be conducted at St. George's Barracks; whether the close proximity of the National Gallery to some of the barrack-rooms exposes the pictures to serious risk from fire; and whether, in removal or enlargement of these old and badly constructed Barracks, he will endeavour to obviate the inconveniences and dangers now referred to?

MR. BRODRICK: The attention of the Secretary for War has been called to the conditions alluded to, and steps have been taken to remedy the evil, so far as the present limited space will allow. It is in contemplation to remove the Barracks, but the matter will have to be further considered. The question of the National Gallery comes within the province of the First Commissioner of Works, while the latter part of the question was dealt with in a reply given by my right hon. Friend on 17th March, 1891.

THE IRISH EDUCATION BILL.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland a question with regard to the Motion in my name for a Return in connection with the Irish Education Bill. The right hon. Gentleman stated yesterday that he had no objection to such a Return being prepared. I should like to know whether the Motion is unopposed?

MR. JACKSON: I stated yesterday that I had no objection to it so far as I am personally concerned. I am not sure how the hon. Member wishes the Return to be prepared. I may not furnish it in quite the form he requires.

MR. SEXTON: Am I to understand that the Motion will not be opposed by any Member of the House?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot, of course, answer for that.

PACIFICATION OF THE SHIRE DISTRICTS.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any further news has been received from Consul Johnston from Lake Nyassa?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): Yes, Sir. A telegram was received at the Foreign Office yesterday, in which Consul Johnston reported—

"Entire pacification of the Shire Districts and of those of Lake Nyassa. The two powerful Chiefs, M'Ponda and Jumba, have given valuable assistance against the Arab slave raiders, who have been driven over the Eastern Frontier. Makanjiro, with whom Captain Maguire was engaged when he lost his life, has been driven from the Lake by friendly natives, and Karembe, another important chief, has sent messengers announcing his adhesion to British policy. Captain Keene reports very favourably on the state of the Upper Shire. Mr. King and the Parsee doctor, who were wounded, have recovered, and are performing their duties."

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): What is the date of the telegram?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The first week in April.

MR. BUCHANAN: Where is it from?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I think it is from Zomba.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Where is that?

[No answer was given.]

THE BUDGET PROPOSALS.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Will the First Lord of the Treasury inform us whether the Budget proposals will be taken on Thursday; and, if not, on what date?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think it is extremely doubtful. I understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would arrive from Ireland this afternoon. As soon as he comes I will confer with him, and I hope to be able to make an announcement on the subject before the House rises at seven o'clock.

ARBITRATION BETWEEN ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I wish to give notice that it is not my intention to proceed with the Motion standing in my name, relating to arbitration between Great Britain and the United States, at this Evening Sitting. I was not aware until a few hours ago that the Motion was to be seconded by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock), and supported by various Members in different parts of the House; and having taken counsel with my friends who have given me countenance and help in this matter I have decided not to proceed with it. I will trust to the chances of the ballot to decide when it shall come on.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EDUCATION AND LOCAL TAXATION RELIEF (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 208.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 2nd May.]

Considered in Committee.

Clause 2.

*MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I move an Amendment, in page 2, line 9, to leave out the word "sixty," and insert the words "one hundred." My object is to increase the grant for education from £60,000 to £100,000. I think there is now a golden opportunity of doing for Scotland what we have not been able to do since 1872. It is notorious, and it is the opinion of all educationalists, that while the Education Act did a great deal for primary education, it has done for secondary and technical education very little. There have been many representations from Scotland as to putting the schools on a proper basis, so as to fit them for the great work they have undertaken. There should be evening schools for young people working in factories or at agricultural employment, where they may receive education according to their circumstances, and such as would fit them for their particular callings. It is admitted by all hon. Gentlemen that whilst Scotland in the past has been credited with being advanced in regard to education, we have receded very much in recent years, that we are falling behind the Continent and other industrial centres, and that unless we observe what is being done by our competitors who have continuation schools and the like, we shall go still further to the rear in the industrial race. A further want is also expressed in another statement coming from the Education Institute—

To put the matter as shortly as I can, we have three great Departments needing help. We have first the existing secondary schools, which are admitted to be in a backward condition owing to want of more Imperial assistance. In order that there may be free or cheaper education, we want a large sum of money for these secondary schools. In addition, we require a large sum of money for the inception of technical schools, with their workshops, appliances, laboratories, &c., and then for continuation education — particularly evening schools — we shall require considerable aid. Justice to Scotland cannot be done until these evening schools are free. Nothing was more apparent in the discussion on Free Education, as applicable to Scotland and England, than that the straits of the parents and the encouragement for children was not needed in the primary schools, but after the children had passed the compulsory standard. We require encouragement for those children who are willing to take advantage of the continuation schools. Why, in our large burghs years ago, when there was nothing so good as the primary schools, we had voluntary contributions to mechanics' institutes, and those institutes conducted evening classes at very low fees for the benefit of the community. Many men who attained considerable positions in life were largely educated at those classes. While I am not sanguine enough to suppose that if provision is made we should have all the children taking advantage of it, I believe if we only get one out of ten, or even one out of twenty, the effect in Scotland can only be anticipated with the greatest possible satisfaction. I feel that this Amendment is more important than any Amendment which has commanded the attention of this Committee since I have had the honour of having a seat in the House. If the Government realised the possibilities attaching to the system of continuation evening and day schools throughout Scotland, I am sure they would never consider the miserable contribution which is going to be made for the relief of the local rates, a relief which, in the main, will be for a class who do not need it, and a class which, to their credit, have not been seeking it. I accept with gratitude the concessions made by the Government last night, when they promised a Departmental Committee, regarding which we await fuller information with interest. That Committee will, I think, see that the sum of £60,000 for continuation schools, including evening schools and secondary education, will not half meet the full requirements of Scotland. If we once hand over to the Parochial Boards and other rating authorities this money, we shall experience great difficulty in taking it away. Therefore I make an earnest appeal to the Government to yield at least some concession with regard to the great requirement throughout Scotland. I appeal to all who take an interest in Education in Scotland not to stand upon the sordid interest of the ratepayers, but to consider the advantage of the whole country. In conceding this Amendment the Committee would place Scotland in the position her past deserves and her present needs demand.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 8, to leave out the word "sixty," and insert the words "one hundred."
—(Mr. Easlemont.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'sixty' stand part of the Clause."

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I hope very much that the Government will accept this Amendment. I should myself have moved to leave out the words sixty thousand, and propose to insert the words one hundred and ten thousand, which stand in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks), who is not able to be here to-day. I beg to submit to the Government and the Committee that the concession—the frankness and heartiness of which we are glad to acknowledge—made by the Government last night to a demand for inquiry into the needs and conditions of secondary education in Scotland, and the means which will be taken to promote them, make it more than ever necessary that a larger sum than £60,000 should be allotted to educational purposes. That sum, in the opinion of those who have gone into the matter, will be found inadequate for all the purposes which are intended, and which, I believe, are contemplated by both sides of the House. It is, of course, very difficult to say beforehand precisely what sum will be needed, but we now know that we are to have a Committee to examine that question. That Committee will go into the facts; it will submit proposals which are afterwards to be embodied in the Bill before us, and when we have these proposals, and not till then, shall we be able to judge what exact sum of money is required to finish the work in an adequate manner. But it will be perfectly easy, if the recommendations of the Committee should be found to be in favour of even a smaller sum than £110,000, to give the residue to the Town and County Councils, to whom, in preference to the Parochial Boards, I would very much rather see it given. But, waiving that point for a moment, the Local Authorities can very easily get rid of the money. It will not, however, be so easy to take away the money from the Local Authorities and apply it afterwards to secondary education, and if it were found that the Committee recommended more than £60,000, we may take it that the Committee will extend the purview of the scheme beyond the very narrow limit which has been contemplated in the Memorandum submitted to us. Therefore we are in a much stronger position for asking for a larger sum of money than we were yesterday, and, under these circumstances, I hope the Government will consent. I desire to observe that there is one object which does not seem to have been contemplated in the Memorandum. It is one of great utility, and which necessarily involves considerable expenditure of money. I mean the granting not only of free places, but scholarships or bursaries to the most promising children in elementary schools. Something was said about Wales, but it is not only for Wales, but also for England, that valuable evidence has been furnished by the experience of the last 20 years as to the need for small scholarships or bursaries to enable the promising children of the labouring classes to continue their education. To the parents it is not so much a question of fees; it is rather the question of dispensing with the earnings of the child. I think hon. Members will, if they inquire, see that there is a great deal of evidence to show that we cannot give the help we want to the best children of the labouring classes except by means of scholarships, and that course will mean a considerable addition to the expenditure to be incurred in connection with this scheme. In view of that and other points, I think the Government will see there is very good cause for the demand we now make for an increased amount. I should like to add, too, that we have been hoping to hear from the Government what form they propose to give to their agreement last night to appoint a Committee to consider this matter, and whether they would put upon the Paper an Amendment embodying the consequence of the concessions which have been made. I suppose, however, the Government will take an early opportunity either upon this Amendment or upon some of the Amendments which touch Sub-section B or sub-Section I, of stating what they propose to do about this Committee, and in what form they intend to put upon the Bill the fact that a Committee is to be appointed, and that the Minute is to be framed in accordance with this recommendation. I also hope that the opportunity will be given of reviewing that Minute and the conclusions which the Committee may arrive at, before action is taken upon them by the Department. These are points on which we desire to be informed before we part with Sub-section I.

*MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): Secondary education seems to be a somewhat confusing subject, and to have confused the primary arithmetic of hon. Members opposite. Certainly it has confused the arithmetic of my hon. Friends the Members for East Aberdeenshire (Mr. Esslemont) and South Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce). They seem to think that £60,000 and £50,000 added together make £100,000, while the right hon. Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks), I am glad to see, knowing less about secondary education, understands his arithmetic better, and has made the sum to be £110,000.

MR. ESSLEMONT: If I may interfere in this rather unnecessary arithmetical display, I may say that I intended that the £10,000 left over should be given to the Fee Fund, in order that all schools in Scotland may be free; but for the convenience of discussion, and in the interest of accord, I agreed to the £110,000. My hon. Friend need have no alarm as to our arithmetical ability.

*MR. HOZIER: I think it would have been better if my hon. Friend had put his scheme down as a whole. I do not see any Amendment on the Paper to that effect.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I beg pardon.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! Order!

*MR. HOZIER: At any rate, it does not stand in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen. The Amendment before the House, as now amended to suit the rules of arithmetic, is that the whole sum should be £110,000—that £50,000 should be taken from the Parochial Boards and handed over for the purposes of higher education. I certainly trust the Government will not give way to this Amendment, for they have at their backs every Conservative in the House, also a large majority of Liberal Unionists, and a considerable proportion of the Gladstonian Members. What says our old friend the North British Daily Mail, which represents the opinion of the vast majority of the Gladstonians in the West of Scotland at any rate? In its leading article of 5th April it says—

“It was, perhaps, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman's wonderful heat on this subject which induced Mr. Marjoribanks to suggest last night as a compromise that the Government should add to the £60,000 for secondary education the £50,000 assigned to the Parochial Boards for the relief of rates. The ratepayers seem to have got between the devil and the deep blue sea. This proposed further robbery by Mr. Marjoribanks of the ratepayers, by way of compromise, is worse than the Bill as it stands.”

By my Amendment yesterday I at least can claim to have done my best to avoid both the devil and the deep blue sea, as the North British Daily Mail puts it. As, however, only these two alternatives are now left before us, I unhesitatingly prefer the deep blue sea, and shall do my utmost to support the Government in resisting this Amendment.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I think the Government see that the situation has been altered by what occurred last night. The Secretary for Scotland, in asking for £60,000, had in view a carefully prepared Departmental Estimate, from which we gather that £57,000 would be required to carry out the views of the Department. As I understood the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury last night, in referring the subject to a Committee, he proposes that this Committee should deal not only with the subject for which this sum of money is provided, but should also take into account the provision for evening or continuation schools. If this is done, it must, apparently, necessitate some enlarged provision under that category. Practically, the whole of the £60,000 was absorbed by the original scheme of the Department; and if we add to that secondary education a provision for evening or continuation schools, it would be almost indispensable to make some additional provision for it. There is another point with which I did not trouble the First Lord last night, but it comes in one of the Amendments which is down for to-day, and I invite his most careful attention to this question. I dare say he has not left it altogether out of consideration; but I am not sure that he is in possession of the very strong views which prevail widely—indeed I may almost say universally—amongst the bulk of the voters. In the scheme which is proposed by the Government—which I do not criticise at this moment—provision is made for reducing the fees; but no provision at all is made, or at all events very little and totally inadequate provision is made, to meet what I consider to be the great weakness of our system of secondary education in Scotland. Some years ago, at the Grammar School at Aberdeen, the fee was 10s. 6d. per quarter, which came to a total of two guineas a year. That was considered a very high fee, and in the county schools, where the education was quite as good in many respects, much lower fees were charged. Since that time a very great change has taken place in Scotland in consequence of the raising of the standard of the Universities, which has necessitated a more prolonged period of training and a better training in the secondary schools. At the time of which I speak it was quite possible for a working man, if he were in good employment and if he were a careful man, to send his boys to the Grammar School. But now that is altered, and I do not know what the fees are; but probably they are 30s. a quarter and perhaps more, for the fees have been quadrupled since the time of which I speak. And what has been going on in Aberdeen has been going on all over Scotland. The result is that the old connection which existed to a large extent in Scotland between the poorest class and the higher education—the link which connected these two has been broken, and very properly broken, in the interests of education, and a more expensive and prolonged education prevails in the secondary schools. That can be met in one way, and in one way alone, in justice to the interests of education, in justice to the large bulk of the people of Scotland, in justice to the Universities, and in justice to the working man. This way is not by lowering the fees where fees ought properly to be charged. I do not think that fees ought to be made too low. I think where a fee is charged that fee should be approximately, if not entirely, a full charge for the value of the seat. With regard to the middle-class schools, there is no occasion for any appeal on their behalf. I believe the parents of the children attending those schools are able and willing to pay the necessary amount; but what is required and what is urgent is that those parents who are not in a position to pay the fees at all, and who, moreover, are not in a position to afford to keep their children in idleness, should have some assistance. This is a most material item. There are, undoubtedly, two classes of poor people. There are some parents who, if they were relieved from the payment of the fees, might meet the other expenses, and there is a class still poorer who are unable to do without the wages which their children can earn when they are at work. If we are going to put our secondary education in Scotland, I will not say on an entirely satisfactory, but on a tolerably satisfactory basis, it is absolutely essential that there should be a very large expenditure for exhibitions, and these exhibitions must be given for merit and for merit alone, and should be given to the boys from the State-aided schools. I contend for the State-aided schools in this matter, and for those schools where poor boys attend, and I say that the exhibitions should be given as a result of competition. Now, how much would that require? I take it that on the average for these two classes of parents—those for whom fees were paid, and those who received a grant for maintenance—you could hardly pay less than £10 a year. That is a very low sum, and if we had 5,000 boys and girls—because we ought to include girls in this provision so far as education is applicable to them—the cost would be about £50,000; and I venture to put it to the Government whether, in taking the money which is allotted to us, they could not take over £50,000 in addition to the £60,000, in order to provide not only for the continuation schools, but also an ample margin for bursaries? Suppose this Committee, when it comes to inquire into this subject, finds that any proposals put forward are fatally hampered by the absence of exhibitions and bursaries, what will they do? I believe you cannot make a proper or satisfactory system of secondary education in Scotland unless you get the poor boys into the schools. If the Committee finds that that is so, what position will you be in when you have only £60,000 to work with? The reasonable thing is to take precautions, and take a larger sum of money, if it should be found on examination that the sum you have taken is not enough. The money would not be lost, nor would it be thrown away. It is at your own disposal, and might be applied to other purposes. What I would suggest is whether it would not be possible to cut this discussion short by adopting this view? Instead of limiting the 1st clause to £60,000, to put in £110,000, and put in such words as these, "That so much of the money as would not be required under this sub-section should be disposed of later on." That would give you elasticity. That is to say, if the Committee, having examined the question, found it necessary to go as far as £110,000, they would have the money; but if it were not necessary to go so far, the Memorandum you lay before the House provides for a less sum, and the balance would be distributed in a manner you can settle in the Bill. That, I think, is a fair offer to make to the Government; and if the Government would adopt it, it clearly would meet the views of my hon. Friend, and would enable us to dispose of this difficult branch of the Bill.

(3.21.) MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): My hon. Friend has raised the point in a very practical way. He has pointed out how, in consequence of the proposals laid before the House, we shall have in various ways to provide for fresh contingencies. I think the original proposal from the Education Department is inadequate, but there is one point to which attention has not yet been drawn. Very little provision is made in the Draft Memorandum for secondary education in the country districts. The burgh schools are to get the bulk of the money, and about £15,000 is given to the other schools. In the course of the discussion last night it became apparent that a portion of this £15,000 is to be given to schools in Glasgow, and after a sum has been set aside for inspection it is evident that a very small proportion even of this £15,000 will be available for secondary education in the country. One of the duties of any Departmental Committee which inquires into the subject will be to ascertain how secondary education can be provided for in the country districts; and I venture to prophesy that a much larger sum will be required to meet the requirements of the country districts than seems to have been considered necessary in the Memorandum from Dover House. My hon. Friend proposes to meet this increased expenditure by applying to education the money which it is proposed to give to Parochial Boards. I think that would be a very fair proposal. I suppose the poorest Parochial Boards, and those which have the greatest difficulty in getting in their money, are the Boards in the Highland districts; but the Highlands have lately had a special grant for educational purposes, and in many Highland districts education can be conducted with little or no burden on the rates. In the manufacturing districts the times have not been bad, and the number of poor children has been somewhat diminished, and I do not think any special case can be made out at present for giving any assistance to Parochial Boards. I can imagine cases where the burdens of the Parochial Boards may have been very severe; but such cases do not exist now, and I think the Government may very fairly apply the money they propose to give to these Parochial Boards to the purposes of secondary education. This would take a considerable sum of money, and I trust the Government will see its way to give us a larger sum than they now propose.

*(3.25.) MR. SHAW-STEWART (Renfrew, E.): I am afraid the events of to-day will rather discourage the Government in making concessions, because it seems that the concessions of last night form the ground, in the opinion of some hon. Members, for an enlarged discussion on subsequent Amendments. It appears to me that hon. Members do not quite realise that all public bodies in Scotland, or nearly all, are anxious that this Bill should pass as it stands now. The hon. Member who has just sat down sees no reason why the Parochial Boards should have their share of this money; but he forgets that the charge for pauper lunatics is a very heavy one. There are those who sit on this side of the House who have thought that this Bill, being the equivalent of a grant to England in aid of the rates, should give the money solely in aid of the rates in Scotland. But the Government have given way on that point and have assigned a certain portion of the money for education. They have met the wishes of Gentlemen on the other side with regard to the disposal of that money, and have gone further and indicated their willingness to allow the County and Town Councils a free hand with regard to the allocation of their share of the money. Now, seeing that the public bodies of Scotland desire the Bill as it stands, and that the Government have done their best to meet the reasonable wishes of Gentlemen opposite, I do hope this discussion will not be long continued.

(3.29.) MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): It is clear to me that more money will be needed for the purpose of secondary education. It seems to me that the Memorandum before us cuts matters very fine, and is a very sanguine estimate as to the amount of expenditure which can be got out of a limit of £60,000. This discussion has rendered it abundantly clear that more money will be needed, and I think more money should be provided. The hon. Member for East Renfrew has stated that the public bodies in Scotland are in favour of this Bill as it stands; but if an Amendment were made by which the money was taken from the Parochial Boards and given to any other purpose, I do not think any other public bodies except the Parochial Boards would be opposed to the change. I have put down another Amendment with regard to this money, but I regard that as the second best Amendment.

If the Government will not accept the proposal, which I regard as most important, to give the whole of the £50,000 for secondary education, I hope they will be prepared to consider the Amendment I have put down for dividing the money between secondary education, the Universities, and Town and County Councils. There is another ground on which I think the £50,000 will be wanted for secondary education. The Committee is to consider the Welsh precedent; one important part of that precedent is the power the counties have of rating themselves to the extent of a halfpenny in the pound; and I trust there will be enthusiasm enough created in Scotland to lead the counties to rate themselves, especially if, as in Wales, each pound provided out of the rates is met by another pound out of the Treasury. A halfpenny rate in Scotland produces exactly £50,000, and if the Welsh precedent is adopted, that sum might be used with great advantage as reproductive expenditure, leading not only to the expenditure of the £50,000, but double that amount by encouraging the levying of rates in all the counties of Scotland. My hon. Friend the hon. Member for South Lanark (Mr. Hozier) promises the Government the support of all the Conservative and Liberal Unionist Scotch Members; but I should like to wait to see the Division List before being so certain.

(3.32.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Certainly, on behalf of the Government, I do not feel that we have any right to complain that the question of altering the allocation of the money should be raised this afternoon, even after the compromise last night. I distinctly understood from the right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), who spoke on behalf of hon. Gentlemen on that side, that though it was, so to speak, guaranteed that the Bill should get through this afternoon, it was also understood that this and certain other questions should be raised, discussed, and voted upon. I must, however, make one mild protest against a certain line of argument adopted by all the speakers. I do not propose to argue whether this £60,000 is the exact amount which should be carried out of the £265,000 for the purposes of education. It is possible to make an ingenious and powerful speech either for or against any possible arrangement or re-arrangement of the money at our disposal. One argument, however, ought not to be pressed, and I think it has been pressed. We have been told that the result of having this Committee will be that much more money will be required for the scheme than would be required had the Scotch Education Department been allowed to manage their own affairs, and to frame a scheme as seemed best to them. As the Committee knows, I should have preferred leaving this matter to the Education Department; but, in order to meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen who said that the £60,000 would be wasted or not spent to the best advantage, I consented to the Departmental Committee. But the fact that that concession has been made ought not to be turned against the Government and used as an argument for giving more funds on the ground that the Committee will recommend a more costly scheme than that sketched out in the Minute before the Committee. I rise simply to say that, whatever the view hon. Gentlemen may have on the subject, the appointment of the Committee ought not to be used to press us to place more money at the disposal of the Committee. The Government, as the Committee will have anticipated, feel obliged to adhere to the general distribution of the fund sketched out in the Bill, which distribution has no direct connection with the Departmental Memorandum which was the subject of discussion yesterday, and we shall feel ourselves bound to vote against the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman. I understand that in my absence the hon. Member for Aberdeen asked a question as to whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce words into the Bill embodying that part of the compromise which had to do with the formation of the Committee. I should have thought, on the whole, that that was not expedient, because what will be entrusted to the Committee will be the framing of material out of which an Educational Minute will have to be constructed, and that is an operation which will be completed, I suppose, within the next few weeks. I do not see the object of introducing into the Bill, which is to be of a permanent character, the elements of an arrangement which must be of a temporary character. I think the Committee will understand that that would mean the introduction of words which would lose all their meaning and significance when the Committee had concluded its labours; and, therefore, I think, on the whole, it would not be advisable to put these words in the Bill.

*(3.37.) MR. STEPHEN WILKIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.): I will be no party to oversetting the agreement substantially arrived at last night, and I have a variety of objections to this proposal. The hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire (Mr. Esslemont) spoke of having a secondary school within three miles of every child in Scotland. Such a scheme as that is as impracticable as it is unwise, and £110,000 would go little further in the direction of securing such a desideratum than the proposal in the Bill. My idea is that this Departmental Committee will have enough to do in formulating a scheme for the use of the £60,000. Let that sum be wisely spent, and it will form the basis, possibly, of a larger scheme afterwards. I think it is a waste of time to discuss the difference between £60,000 and £110,000, and I shall vote for the Bill as it stands.

*(3.40.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I cannot agree that it would be waste of time to discuss what part of this money should be given to secondary education. I think the First Lord of the Treasury rather strained the argument we are using when he said that we urged the appointment of the Committee as a reason for giving more money to secondary education. I understood the result of last night to be that the scheme of the Department and of the sub-section of the Bill was one of secondary education, practically by grants, and to show that the scheme and the money provided would hardly be sufficient to carry out that scheme, and that, therefore, much less was the money enough to carry out an enlarged scheme; and it was decided that a Departmental Committee should sit and consider a better scheme of secondary education, and not one so limited as the one before us. We should be very much disappointed if a Minute were drawn up contemplating assisting secondary education by fee grants only. That was last night generally condemned as inadequate, and I and other hon. Members have put down Amendments expressing that view. The Bill contemplates taking out of the £60,000 the sum expended on the inspection of higher schools. We at present get a portion of that sum under the Estimates, and we think this new sum of £60,000 should not be encroached upon, and the Estimates saved by means of it. I would strongly urge on the Government that we expect from the Report of the Committee a much wider scheme of secondary education—wider in its substance than that before us. We shall not be content, and it is absurd to imagine that the public of Scotland will be content when they are told that the new system of secondary education to be inaugurated is to be based on, and limited to, grants in aid of the fees. It was in view of the pressure put on the Government that they agreed that the scope of the scheme should be further extended. I expected to see on the Paper words embodying the compromise. I should like to know if we are expected to pass this sub-section in its present form, because I think there would be considerable objection to that from the fact that it would limit the consideration of the Committee to a system of grants and the cost of inspection of higher schools, the general decision being that such a system would be wholly inadequate to the wants of Scotland.

(3.45.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): It seems to be assumed on the other side that this Bill deals with the whole subject of secondary education in Scotland. Secondary education is at present subsidised by the rates in Scotland and by Imperial grants. In England you have elementary education, but in the Scotch Act the term "elementary" does not occur. From time immemorial, and by the terms of the Scotch Education Act, every parish school is bound to have secondary education at the top of its instruction, and the ordinary Board school in every Highland parish is qualified to send students to the Universities. That is the case in Glasgow and throughout Scotland, and pupils are sent, at the expense of the rates and the Imperial grants, from the Board schools to the Universities. The system introduced by the Bill is a mere offshoot, and will not tend to extend the secondary education which is bound to be provided by the parish. You cannot have secondary education in Scotland except in the ordinary parish schools; the country is too sparsely populated to have secondary schools, as proposed, in certain districts. The Scotch Education Department has let down the secondary education in the parish schools, and the consequence is that the enthusiasm of the teachers has fallen off, and the attendance at the Universities is decreasing. Your scheme will ruin secondary education, as you propose to take it out of the parish schools and to have certain district schools. If there were secondary education at the top of the curriculum of the parish schools, the elementary education would be better, as the teacher would work with a view to the higher grade; but by taking away the secondary education you lower the enthusiasm of the teacher and the tone of the school. You may have your district schools, but you will not have them equipped. What do you hold out to the School Boards to induce them to have a secondary department in the ordinary Board schools?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Member will see that he is straying away from the point of the Debate.

MR. CALDWELL: Very well, Sir; I will say a word with regard to Parochial Boards. Is it right that they should not get any portion of this money? Notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary, the Parochial Boards in Scotland are well-managed Boards, and yet they do not get within £30,000 or £40,000 of what they would get if they received the proportion of subsidy which is given to English Parochial Boards. But there is another point. The franchise in Scotland, as in other places, is dependent upon the payment of the poor rate, so that if you give a subsidy to the Parochial Boards, you would thereby, by enabling the rates to be lowered, put it in the power of many persons to pay their rates who otherwise could not do so, and thus put them in a position to exercise the franchise. That is a very serious item in the Highland parishes, where the parochial rate is very considerable, and the non-payment disfranchises so many people. Then there is the fact that the rates of the Parochial Boards are paid by precisely the same parties who pay other rates, so that by relieving the rates of the Parochial Boards you are practically subsidising the county ratepayers. There is, therefore, no reason why, in distributing a large sum of money like this, you should select one Rating Authority only in a county or a parish. A portion of it ought to be appropriated for the purpose of relieving the poor rate, and if that were done, the general ratepayers would be in precisely the same position as if one body got the whole of the money.

*(3.53.) MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews, &c.): Having followed the course of the Debate last night very attentively, I cannot agree that the concession of a Departmental Committee made by the First Lord of the Treasury in any way warranted the assumption that such a Committee would have power to recommend schemes involving expenditure larger than that proposed by the Bill. I agree very much with the remarks of the hon. Member for South Lanarkshire (Mr. Hozier), and I know I am stating a fact when I say that a very large number of bodies in Scotland hold strongly the view that the whole of this sum should be applied in relief of local rates. At the same time I accept with readiness the concession that the Government has made in providing that a certain sum shall be applied to educational objects, more particularly to the objects of secondary education. I should like to make a suggestion to the Lord Advocate, which might, perhaps, be taken into consideration by the Departmental Committee when it comes to deal with the Memorandum. It has been brought to my notice by those interested in certain endowed schools, concerning which it remains to be seen whether they will come under the scheme or not by reason of their constitution, that the fairer arrangement of the grant in aid of secondary education would be, by extending it to every pupil in a secondary school rather than making it conditional on certain limitations. I do not intend to go into any detail, but I merely wish to throw out that suggestion, which I hope the Committee will keep before them. We have no warrant for supposing that power will be given to the suggested Departmental Committee to enlarge the sum mentioned in this clause, and for that reason I hope the Committee will now decide that the sum to be granted towards secondary education shall be that mentioned in the Bill and no more.

*MR. MARK J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I should like to point out that the proposal to grant £60,000 for secondary education is a tentative measure. Although the hon. Member maintains that we have already a system of secondary education in Scotland, yet that system is practically not in operation. This is a very important point to recollect, because if you are going to grant a large sum of money for secondary education you ought to show that you have a large number of pupils wishing to avail themselves of it, and that is not the case. The people of Scotland have to a large extent got into the habit of sending their children early in life to labour or industrial pursuits, so that they do not continue at school in the same way as in the past. If we can induce people to let their children take advantage of secondary education by cheapening the means of getting it, we shall have made a good beginning. I am satisfied that the Government will do well in holding firm to this Bill, and not relinquishing one iota of it. They have made considerable concessions which I am glad of, but I do hope they will go no further.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): The point we are discussing is one of great importance, but it is not one of great width for the purpose of discussion, and I venture to say that we have all made up our minds on which side we are going to vote. I would, therefore, appeal to my hon. Friends whether we might not divide on this question, as to whether the £60,000 should not be increased to £100,000. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has complained that some of my hon. Friends have employed the concession of a Departmental Committee as a weapon in support of this extended grant. I suppose the Committee would recommend something larger than is contemplated in the Memorandum that has been issued by the Department. When a Committee is appointed to inquire into the question of a larger scheme of Secondary Education in Scotland, I think you naturally contemplate something a little beyond that with which you are dealing, and so I think we are justified in discussing this matter from that point of view. Well, as I have already remarked, I do not think there is much more to be said on this simple question as to whether the £60,000 is enough, and I suggest we should now divide.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I should like an explanation from the Lord Advocate with reference to a question that must arise in connection with the practical working out of this scheme. Naturally, it is supposed that there will be a large number of new scholars drafted into the schools under this Secondary Education Bill. That involves of necessity, in many cases, if not in all, new buildings, and in other cases re-organisation of old buildings. What provision is made for all this? And again, even in those schools which already have suitable buildings, what provision is made for the equipment and necessary apparatus of teaching which will be required? It seems to me these are questions which should be asked and answered before we go to a Division.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 180; Noes 123.—(Div. List, No. 100.)

(4.19.) MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to move the next Amendment which stands in my name, namely—in page 2, line 9, to leave out “secondary” and insert “intermediate.” In doing so I feel indeed very strongly the obligation to consult brevity, so as to limit the discussion in conformity with the arrangement come to last night, and in which the Government have now gone a considerable distance to meet us. This Amendment, I need hardly tell the Lord Advocate, is to be taken in connection with the definition of the word "intermediate" which I propose further down—namely, that "intermediate education" should mean secondary education and technical education. Now, the object of this Amendment is to meet the requirements of needy country districts such as I represent—constituencies such as mine, in which no secondary schools exist, and perhaps are not likely to be established—and in such districts where, through being of a purely mining or industrial character, the intermediate education between the common schools and the University, assuming they were to go so far, which is required would be obviously rather of a technical kind than of what is usually understood by a secondary kind. The definition of secondary education which I have taken is the one which exists in the Scotch Education Act of 1872; and from that Act it has been borrowed, and put almost verbatim into the Welsh Education Act of 1889. Now, I think it would be a great pity if this money, which is proposed to be given to advanced education beyond the common standard, should not be applicable to technical education where that is the principal want of the district; and I am fortified in that view by the fact that at present the County Councils have a sum of £48,000—doubtless not a very large sum—at their disposal, which they are to apply all over Scotland for technical education. A considerable inclination has been displayed in the County Councils of Scotland to devote the whole of that sum to that purpose; but they are hampered very much by the smallness of the sum, and by having no machinery at their disposal to administer it. Now if the line between secondary and technical education were removed, undoubtedly these sums, already available for technical education, would flow into the same purse as the sum which the Bill proposes to confer. I think these considerations are extremely obvious in themselves. I do not think anything I can say would be likely to make them clearer. It is natural for the Department in distributing this money to leave out the subject which does not happen to be under their control; but I think I have shown to the Committee that the actual circumstances of the case show that these two subjects should not be separated. I have received the very strongest representations from gentlemen deeply interested in the operation of advanced education in the counties, from members of County Councils and Chairmen of School Boards who take a very active interest in this subject, and they tell me if there is to be any hope for the useful application of this money to advanced education in these poor districts, the legal separation of technical and secondary education would be absolutely fatal. There is nothing in this proposal, so far as I can see, to interfere with the scheme of the Bill, or to affect the compromise arrived at last night, and I trust the Government will see their way to accept it.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 9, to leave out the word "secondary," and insert the word "intermediate."—(Mr. Crawford.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'secondary' stand part of the Clause."

*(4.23.) MR. HOZIER: I hope the Government will see their way to accept the Amendment now proposed by my hon. Friend, or the Amendment of the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire, or the Amendment of the hon. Member for Forfarshire. They all mean the same thing. I earnestly trust the Government will see their way to accept some such Amendment as this, because I do think that if the rural districts are to get any benefit whatever from this grant to secondary education, it is most likely to be got in the direction of having lecturers going about from place to place, lecturing on agricultural subjects such as dairy work, agricultural chemistry, and so on, and also having lecturers going about lecturing on mining subjects in the mining districts.

*(4.25.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I do not think any fault can be found with the definition which the hon. Member suggests, so that "intermediate education" should include both secondary and technical education. But the very fact that a word is required to be imported for the first time into Scotch educational matters reminds one of the fact that hitherto technical and secondary education, strictly so called, have proceeded in Scotland on different lines. I think it is natural that it should be so, and I hope the hon. Gentleman will at this particular moment be satisfied with the assurance that I am now about to give. The Bill as it now stands, with the Amendment which I propose to add later on in consequence of the compromise arrived at last night, does not exclude aid in furtherance of the promotion of technical education. But I do protest strongly against the idea that it would be an improvement in the Bill that technical education should be brought in under this subsection which we are now considering. It appears to me that secondary education should be allowed to proceed and develop mainly on the lines on which it has hitherto gone in Scotland, and that there would be very considerable inconvenience in bringing in technical education in the narrow sense of technical instruction, and setting it side by side with secondary education, properly so called. The hon. Gentleman has reminded us that Town and County Councils are in receipt of annual grants under a recent Act of Parliament which they have under their control to distribute in that direction. As we know, a good many both of Burgh and County Councils have done good work in that distribution; and they will have the power under the provisions of this Bill, as amended, to contribute in aid of the furtherance of technical education properly so-called out of the money which they will get under what I may describe as the Residue Clause. In consideration of that fact I think that the main objection of the hon. Member that this Bill does nothing to further technical education falls to the ground. There is also another matter which must be kept in view—namely, that while secondary education properly so-called is in the main very much of the same kind in all quarters of the country, yet technical education very largely varies with the localities; and that being so, there is, it appears to me, an appropriateness in leaving that department of education very much as regards initiation and furtherance, in the hands of Town and County Councils who have had a start in that direction under recent legislation.

(4.29.) MR. BRYCE: There is one observation which fell from the Lord Advocate on which I wish to make a remark. With regard to technical and secondary education, he says that technical education is strictly local in its character. I do not think he is justified in assuming that this £60,000 will not be applied by Local Authorities.

SIR C. J. PEARSON: The Local Authorities I have referred to are those Parliament entrusted with the distribution of the sum available for technical education.

MR. BRYCE: That is exactly what I am coming to. The argument in favour of Local Authorities such as County Councils and Town Councils is equally true with regard to School Boards. School Boards are also Local Authorities, and there is no reason why the distribution of money appropriated for special purposes, such as technical education, should not be entrusted to School Boards equally with County Councils, or Town Councils. Therefore, I fail to see why a sharp line should be drawn between these Local Bodies. The School Board of Glasgow is just as well qualified to make distribution of this money as the County Council of Lanarkshire. The Lord Advocate says the County Council will have the power, under the Amendment which he proposes to make part of the Bill, to apply any part of the sum coming to them for the purposes of technical education. We welcome that Amendment from him, and we are very glad that he sees his way to recognise the claims of technical education. But I want to point out to him that at present the powers of the County Council affecting technical education are very largely interfered with and restricted, and made to a considerable extent inoperative, by the fact that there is no proper machinery for carrying them into effect. What is wanted is that the County Council shall have the power to give the money either to the School Board, or to some other Local Authority, or else that it shall have the power to invent machinery for itself. The main contention of the hon. Mover of this Amendment and of those interested in technical education is this : that you cannot divorce technical education from secondary education, and if you want to benefit technical education you must supply the County Council with machinery by which it can be carried out, and the School Boards ought to co-operate. I, therefore, appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to see if he can give the machinery by which the County Council can use the money for technical education.

(4.32.) MR. ESSLEMONT : As this Amendment embodies the object sought by the one standing lower down on the Paper in my name, it will not be necessary to move the other Amendment if the decision is taken upon this. I have heard with great disappointment the announcement of the Lord Advocate that he is not going to accept this most reasonable Amendment. We have been trying to point out that you are going to confine the benefits of this £60,000 more to existing secondary schools, which are less needed, than to technical instruction throughout the counties, and you are really depriving us in the counties of any opportunity we might have of taking advantage of this for all useful purposes. The Member for South Aberdeen has said that it is impossible to dissociate secondary and technical education in the counties and smaller burghs. What we want is only liberty under this clause, and under the Definition Clause, to take them up together in the counties, and I hope the Lord Advocate will reconsider this matter. I think it is a concession he can make without the slightest injury to any of the parties concerned. I can see no interest that will be served by leaving out the word, but I can foresee a very great disadvantage in working the Act if the word is not accepted.

(4.35.) MR. LENG (Dundee) : I think it is much to be regretted that so hard-and-fast a line is to be drawn. I represent a city which is comparatively rich in these endowments for secondary education. The Lord Provost informed me yesterday that there was actually more money for secondary education than can at present be advantageously applied. But now Dundee is a large manufacturing city, and we have great need for further development of technical education ; and although the citizens have most intelligently encouraged the establishment of technical education institutions, they are insufficient to meet the demand for technical instruction, and it would be of very great service if the authorities had power to apply such sums as may be awarded to the city I represent in this direction. If, however, a hard-and-fast line is laid down—if you say, “ We will only apply it to secondary education,” then you are sending money to an object which is really not requiring it, and depriving us of it for a purpose for which it would be beneficial. I would re-enforce the appeal to the Lord Advocate to allow more elasticity in the matter.

(4.37.) MR. PARKER SMITH : I have very great difficulty in supporting this present Amendment to change the word, because I think secondary education fully wants the £60,000. But what I do feel is most desirable in this Bill is that the control of secondary and technical education should be put into the same hands. Therefore, it seems to me—especially if we have in view that the Town and County Councils are to spend part of their money, if they please, on technical education, and as we know they are prepared to spend a large part of that residue grant upon technical education—most desirable that it shall be made use of so that the two sets of expenditure should go together, should be under the same control and in the same hands. I wish the Lord Advocate could see his way to accept this Amendment, not with the view of spreading the £50,000 out thinner, but of giving those who will have control of this money also the control over that devoted to technical education.

(4.38.) DR. CLARK (Caithness) : The very first day that the right hon. Gentleman introduced the Bill he was asked what he meant by secondary education, and he then took the hard-and-fast line, that by secondary education he practically meant classical education—

SIR C. J. PEARSON : I assure the hon. Member I said nothing of the sort.

DR. CLARK : When the right hon. Gentleman introduced the Bill I asked whether secondary education would embrace technical education, and he said he thought it would not. Since then he has persistently refused to look upon technical education as a branch of secondary education. I look upon this as the most important question to-day before the Committee. It will be remembered that last year, when we moved an Amendment to the Scotch Clause, which came before the English one, the Government absolutely refused to meet our desires, and on a division the English Members outvoted us, and prevented the Scotch Councils using the money for technical education. When the English Clause came on they had changed their minds, and the Amendment was accepted permitting a portion of the money to be used for technical education. On the Report stage the Scotch County Councils received the same power as the English, but when they got the money for the purposes of technical education there was no machinery. For some time we have been trying to get technical education in Scotland and in other parts of the Kingdom, because so far as that branch of education is concerned we are far behind other countries. Take the condition of things in Germany. A boy goes to a primary school, then he can go to a secondary school. But you have two classes of secondary schools in Germany; you have got the classical schools and the scientific schools. Boys, if they want to enter commerce or trade, go to the scientific schools, where they get scientific teaching as a basis, and then go to the technical schools. By that means you have got German workers and German manufacturers in a better position to fight us in the markets of the world. Now we think something might be done to get us back that which we have lost in consequence of our education becoming a branch of the English Education Department. We have been dragged down to the English level. I think something should be done to organise technical education. In Ireland, £10,000 is spent by the Imperial Parliament in promoting agricultural education, and surely this money we are now dealing with ought to be used for the purpose of making the most that could be made of our young men. A Commission has been sitting during the present Parliament, and we have been considering their proposals. These proposals take the money left for the education of the poor in Scotland, and give it to large middle-class educational establishments. That money ought to have been used for the technical education of the children of the poor, but a Commission appointed by a Liberal Government has given it to the rich. Some of us feared that the same thing would have occurred so far as this £60,000 is concerned, but I hope when this Departmental Committee sits they will recommend to the Government a course much more advanced and liberal than is suggested by their present scheme, and that this money may be used in organising intermediate education in Scotland, and in developing, on the old Scotch lines, the parochial schools, so that they may be made more useful.

(4.45.) MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON: If it is difficult to draw a line between secondary education and technical education in towns, it will be found more difficult to draw a line between the two kinds of education in the country. In the country districts technical education would form a larger proportion of the advanced education than would be the case in towns, and if the country districts are to have a fair share of attention under the Secondary Education Scheme it will be by giving full encouragement to the development of technical education in these districts. I see no objection to introducing the word "intermediate," simply because it is a new word. If intermediate education had been considered in all its bearings the shortcomings of the Memorandum of the Education Department would not have been so apparent, and I think the Government will be acting wisely if they adopt the suggestion that has been made. The Lord Advocate referred to the grant which the County Councils could already dispose of in support of technical education. That grant is an extremely small one. The County of Ross-shire, which is one of the largest in Scotland, with a scattered population, gets a grant of £500, and not only is the grant so small and insignificant in reference to the work that has to be done, but the difficulty of expend-ing that money is very great because of the restrictions upon the actions of the County Council. I do not think that can be quoted as any argument against the Amendment.

(4.47.) MR. SINCLAIR: I thoroughly sympathise with the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for the Partick Division when he said this £60,000 was little enough. It is too little for secondary education alone, but there are places that want no more, but want a great deal for technical education, and there are other places where the means available ought to be divided between the two, some for the one and some for the other, and there are other places where secondary education alone ought to be considered. It does seem to me the administration of these funds ought to be placed in the same hands, and I trust we shall, before we go to a Division, have some assurance from the Lord Advocate that we shall have the two funds administered in the same way by some machinery which would be introduced afterwards in the Bill.

*(4.49.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: Perhaps I may say a word in answer to the appeal of the hon. Member who has just sat down. I would remind the hon. Member that there has been for several years in Scotland an Act under which it is optional for School Boards to provide for technical education. That has been done very sparsely. That Act has been very little used. The case, therefore, stands thus:—At the present moment there is a certain power given by Parliament to the Local Bodies, to whom I have referred as being authorised to distribute the small amount under the Act of 1890, to divert in that direction money given primarily in the relief of rates. It is still in the power of the School Boards to make provision for technical education under the Act of 1887; but, following the lines of the Act of 1890, the result would be that these bodies would have the distribution not merely of the small and no doubt inadequate amount under the Act of 1890, but of the entire amount under what I might call the Residue Clause of this section. That being the precise position, I am unable to give way in this matter.

MR. SINCLAIR: May I ask whether the sum that is given under the residue grant can be administered by the Local Boards?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It would be in the discretion of Town or County Councils to distribute it, as they have the power to do under the Act of 1890.

Question put.

(4.55.) The House divided:—Ayes 197; Noes 136.—(Div. List, No. 101.)

MR. CRAWFORD: The next Amendment which stands in my name refers to the distribution of money and to the compromise which I understand was arrived at last night between the First Lord of the Treasury and a right hon. Gentleman on this side.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The view which I think is generally entertained by all parties on this subject is that we should not introduce into the Bill any more binding words than those which are there already. Sub-section 1, as the hon. Member knows, leaves great latitude with the Scotch Education Department for the distribution of the money. The Scotch Education Department has to frame a Minute under which the money will be distributed; and for the purpose of preparing that Minute the head of the Department will have associated with him four other gentlemen to form a Departmental Committee. That was, I think, the idea yesterday.

MR. CRAWFORD: I think there was a general impression that the arrangement which was come to would be carried out by some change in the structure of the Bill on this point. For my own part, I feel that if the arrangement is thoroughly carried out, it may not be absolutely necessary to change the Bill.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Though it may not actually be necessary to insert a provision relative to this Committee, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will favourably regard any proposal to make the words as they stand in the Bill less binding instead of more binding. I will just mention that in one section there are the words "in making grants." That is, I believe, the technical wording. "Making provision" would, I think, be better. I also wish to know whether the words "Minutes of the Department submitted to Parliament" mean that they shall lie on the Table of Parliament, and not go into force until Parliament has approved them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That, I understand, is the meaning of them.

DR. CLARK: I beg to move that sub-section (a) of Section 1 be not—

THE CHAIRMAN: There is an Amendment of which the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) has given notice.

*MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to move, in page 2, line 12, to leave out from "defraying," to "and," in line 15. I should like to draw attention to sub-section (a). To that sub-section I have two objections: The first is, that it makes a prior claim that this money is to be spent on the inspection of higher class schools. I do not think that should come in the first place. My second objection is, that there is already a sum voted in the Estimates for the inspection of these schools. I do not agree that the Government ought to relieve itself, out of this £60,000, of an obligation which has been in the Estimates since the year 1885. That is the ground upon which I put down the Motion to omit this sub-section. I move the first Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 12, to leave out from the word "defraying," to the word "and," in line 15.—(Mr. Buchanan.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

DR. CLARK: I should like to know the reason of this change, and how much money it is estimated will be required to meet it. It is already defrayed in the Vote, and the object of this sub-section (a) is already carried out in our Estimates.

*MR. C. S. PARKER: I think it is a very fair remark that as a sum is already on the Estimates we should not take the whole of the cost out of the £60,000. I am, however, aware that the sum hitherto on the Estimates has been very inadequate, and especially for conducting these examinations for leaving certificates. Knowing this, I think it marvellous that the Department has been able to conduct the examinations as well as it has done on so small a sum. I agree that more money is required, but I think we might maintain upon the Estimates the amount Parliament has hitherto granted. Perhaps that condition would be met by substituting "towards defraying the cost" for "defraying the cost." I want also to know whether, in parting with this Bill, we shall part with all power to make modifications such as require legislation? It is quite clear that if this Departmental Committee is to have a free mind to consider alternatives such as that just withdrawn, such alternatives cannot be rendered operative except by Act of Parliament. The simplest way would be to have an understanding that, if any such legislation is required, a Bill for the purpose shall be brought in later, in order that it may pass this Session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman has asked me whether anything we are now doing would limit the power of Parliament to deal with such recommendations as the Committee to be constituted under our promise of yesterday may make.

*MR. C. S. PARKER: We could not limit the power, but I ask whether there is any intention on the part of the Government, if such a scheme as that withdrawn is approved by the Committee, to give effect to it by legislation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think it would be competent for the Government to pledge themselves to bring in legislation to carry out the recommendations of the Committee—recommendations of which there is at present no notice at all, and of which we cannot form an idea. But, of course, it is always our desire to promote the interests of education; and if legislation will do that, and without controversy, of course we shall be glad to do it. With regard to the question more immediately before us—Sub-section (a)—I would advise the Committee not to make any modification, and I think I can meet the objections of the hon. Member for Edinburgh and the hon. Member for Caithness. They appear to think, and not unnaturally, that this sub-section is intended to relieve Parliament from an obligation which is embraced in the annual Votes—to provide a sum for dealing with the inspection and examination of these schools.

That is not the case. We propose to continue the Vote every year in precisely the same amount as in past years. But that Vote—£300—is not annually enough to meet the cost of inspection, which is about £2,000 per year. I think I have got the figures correctly. The difference between the £300 and the £2,000 is made up by contributions from the schools, or from the pupils; but in either case it is a burden the institution or individual can ill afford to bear. I think, after that explanation, the House will think this object is in itself so worthy that it will allow it to remain in the Bill.

*MR. BUCHANAN: We are indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for stating that the grant will still continue. I willingly accept his assurance, and ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. BUCHANAN: I will now move the other Amendment which stands in my name, substituting in page 2, line 16, the word "provision" instead of "grants."

Amendment agreed to.

(5.20.) MR. BRYCE: I propose, as an Amendment, to which the Government have agreed, to add the following words after "schools," in page 2, line 17:—

"Being schools wholly or partially under public management and control."

Amendment agreed to.

(5.22.) MR. JOHN WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I beg to move in page 2, line 19, to leave out sub-section 2. I desire to say that I move this Amendment without the slightest hostility to Scotch Universities. I think that this money, which is practically Scotch money, the Universities have no claim to, inasmuch as, according to the Treaty of Union, the Universities are entitled to be subsidised out of the Imperial funds, to the extent of their requirements. There is no one who believes more than I do in the benefits conferred by our Scotch Universities. They are recognised all over the world as institutions of learning second to none. At the same time, I hold that this £30,000, which in this Bill it is proposed to give to them, should be otherwise disposed of. I do not know in what way the Government intend this money shall be applied. If it is given in a lump sum to the Universities I fear this House will have but little control over it. On the other hand, if there were indications that the fees of those who attend the Universities were to be reduced on account of this grant something might be said in favour of it. I should like to hear from the Lord Advocate in what manner this money is proposed to be applied.

(5.27.) MR. PARKER SMITH: I have on the Paper an Amendment of exactly the contrary tendency to this, but I do not intend to move it, because, the Government having announced their determination of sticking to the mode of distributing the money as stated in the Bill, I do not think it worth while to put the House to the trouble of a Division. I do not think anyone would be found to grudge the Universities the money. My hon. Friend says that the money required by them should come from somewhere else. The Scottish Universities have claims on the national funds which are inadequately recognised at present. The fact, however, of this £30,000 being given now out of purely Scottish funds in no way prejudices the claims of the Universities upon the funds of the Treasury at some future time. I do not think £30,000 will be found enough for the needs of these institutions in view of the new Ordinances. But I do not see how the amount can be stretched at the present time, and no one with the interests of the Universities at heart would care to let drop £30,000, which is practically a bird in the hand, in order to prosecute claims under the Treaty of Union upon the hard heart of the Secretary to the Treasury. Therefore, I think Scotch opinion in general will be perfectly content to let this sum stand.

(5.32.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): The hon. Member for Govan (Mr. Wilson) says he objects to giving the Universities this money because he wants the people of Scotland to have the entire benefit of

it. I cannot see any way by which the people of Scotland can get more benefit from it than by granting it to the Universities, which are doing a grand educational and democratic work for the Scotch people. We know the Scotch Universities are poor, and will be poorer in future, because the Ordinances of the Commissioners will cut down some of the emoluments, and competition is also making headway. A greater strain will, before long, be thrown on the resources of these Universities, partly on account of the Ordinances which will compel new Chairs to be established, partly on account of the pension fund which grows more serious year by year, and partly because the teaching of the future—which will be of a more technical character—will require more elaborate appliances in the way of museums and laboratories, and these will have to be maintained out of the funds of the Universities. I am sorry that my hon. Friend (Mr. Parker Smith) does not intend to move his Amendment, because I consider £30,000 is too small a sum when divided between four Universities, and I think £50,000 would be a more appropriate amount. As he is not going to move his Amendment, I will not move the Amendment standing in my name. I hope, however, that the Government will stick to their guns in this matter, and that the Committee will vote in favour of this grant.

*(5.35.) SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): As I was one of the former University Commissioners for Scotland, I know by experience how difficult it is to bring up the Universities in Scotland to a line with those in England. Formerly Scotland was in advance of England in relation to many modern subjects, but lately it has fallen behind, and the English Universities have improved their teaching and the variety of their degrees. The Scotch Universities are unable to do that because they have not enough money; and if you take away the monopoly of arts—by extending the selection of subjects for degrees—you take so largely away from the fees of existing Professors that they will be unable to continue to furnish education. The reason why this £30,000 is given to the Scotch Universities is to enable the Commissioners largely to open up the teaching of the Universities so as to adapt it to modern times; and if the hon. Member (Mr. John Wilson), who represents a district which has done so much for popular education, knew that the money was to be given for that purpose, and not for increasing salaries, but purely for the purpose of putting these Universities on a level with the Universities in England, he would not oppose this grant.

(5.37.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I do not think that Parliament ought to be asked to vote money unless we know how it is going to be spent. We have heard something on the subject from one University Commissioner, and I see another Commissioner present from whom I should also like to hear what is to be done with this money. At present we do not know what this money is for. It may be for increase in the salaries of the professors, or for new buildings, for new Chairs, or for bursaries, but whatever it is for, I think that from the Government, or from a Member of the Committee, we are entitled to some information, and then we may consider whether we will grant the money or not. I feel very strongly inclined on the grounds urged by the Member for Govan, to vote against this proposal, and when I bring to the recollection of the Committee the causes that have produced this Bill, I hope it will be seen that there is force in the opposition. We have been complaining of the inadequate grant given to Scotland, in comparison with England and Ireland, for local purposes, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to give us the Probate Duty, and it was understood that all local grants were then to be taken off the Paper. But that has not been carried out so far as England is concerned. There are still local objects in England for which we vote money, but all that has been taken away from Scotland. We have been using our money for educational purposes, and now we are asked to use Scotch money not for local but for Imperial purposes. It is not more than three or four years ago—it was in 1889—that an Act was passed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, called the University of Scotland Act, 1889, discharging all claims on public money so far as the Universities are concerned, in consideration of a sum of £42,000. That means that from the Union until 1889, the Scotch Universities were maintained by the Government in accordance with the articles of the Union, but then the demands of the Scotch Universities for additional new buildings alarmed the Treasury, who determined to stop that kind of thing, and so brought in this Bill to which I have referred, and by which for £42,000, this House and Scotland were to give a full discharge to the Treasury. I voted against that proposal, and you, Mr. Courtney, took the extreme course at that time of refusing to put some of my Amendments. At one time Scotland had only one more Member than the County of Cornwall, and we could not help ourselves. The policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in repudiating an honest obligation, and giving us this miserable £42,000 in lieu, comes out again in a new form in this proposal. I protested against and repudiated the fraud on the Scotch people and the Scotch Members in giving us this money in full discharge, and I say that the honourable obligation remains, and I hope that the Government will not compel us to be bound by this decision. Then, again, ought the maintenance of Universities to be a local or an Imperial question? If, since the Union, the policy had been to defray all the costs of the Universities from local sources, something might perhaps have been said, but at present all the costs that are required, and everything necessary for the University of London, are defrayed by Parliament. Parliament runs the University of London as if it were an adventure school—it takes all the fees, and pays all the costs, and in order to attract students to that University there are scholarships and degrees. All these expenses are defrayed out of public money, and the maintenance of this University is the care of Imperial, and not of local, funds. The same thing practically occurs in Ireland, for in the case of each of the three Queen's Colleges, there is a grant in augmentation of the salaries of the Professors. Then there is a grant of £15,000 to the New Victoria University, and a grant of £12,000 to the Welsh College. So far as Ireland, Wales, and England are concerned, the policy of subsidising and supporting the Universities has been carried out since the Union, and hence I repudiate, as far as I possibly can, this attempt on the part of the Government, for a paltry sum of £42,000, to get rid of the obligation they incurred under the Union. Just now the University of Aberdeen requires new buildings, and I do not know whether the money required for that purpose will have to come out of this grant, or whether we shall get it from the Treasury, who do not seem very willing to part with it. I think the Government ought to withdraw this part of the Bill altogether, and they ought to consider the question of putting upon the Imperial Estimates what is required for the maintenance of the Scotch Universities, and for keeping them in accordance with the development of education on a level with the English Universities. If it were impossible for us to get money from the proper source, we might, perhaps, consider using our own local money, but I do not see why we should do that until it is perfectly clear that this Government, or the next Government, will not carry out an honest obligation and will get rid of it in the mean and dishonourable way that I have alleged this Government has tried to do.

*(5.46.) MR. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): I have pleasure in acknowledging the manner in which the merits of the Scottish Universities have been referred to by everyone who has spoken, and even the hon. Member who has just sat down (Dr. Clark) has not said anything against them. The question before the Committee is whether this provision in the Bill is a proper one. The hon. Member for Govan (Mr. J. Wilson) thinks it is not, but although I agree with him that under the Treaty of Union there is a strong obligation on the part of the Imperial Exchequer to see to the interests of the Scottish Universities, yet I must say it is an obligation which can only be put in operation from time to time with some degree of difficulty and delay; and in the meantime, while these Universities are in need of assistance, we have here a provision which meets the case, and is, in my humble belief, a very proper provision. It is said that this is Scotch money, but here is a purpose that is of general interest to Scotchmen, and for that reason I shall support the grant of £30,000 to the Scottish Universities. It may seem a little unusual for anyone to decline a larger grant for any purpose in which he has some interest, but I must say that, if we went to a Division on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Partick (Mr. Parker Smith), I should not support him in his proposal to increase the amount. I am too anxious to see the Bill passed to make any difficulty with regard to the distribution of the money, and I would say that, considering the whole circumstances, a grant of £30,000 to the Scottish Universities is a very fair one. The question has been asked, "What is to be done with this money?" This money is required for carrying out the provisions of the Universities Act of 1889, by which very large additional charges were thrown upon the Universities, and a scheme of great extension was opened out which will entail large additional expenditure. The Commissioners reported to the Government some time ago how inadequate were the funds placed at their disposal by the Act, and it is in answer to their representations that this additional grant is proposed. The hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) has questioned the whole conduct of the Government in connection with the Universities, and has complained that the annual grant of £42,000 provided in the Universities Act of 1889 is stated in the Estimates to be a full discharge of all claims on public money. But a reference is made in the Estimates to the Act of Parliament, and in the Act there is an explanation of that expression. The £42,000 was in lieu of what had been spent on the average upon the Universities for annual charges for a certain number of years, with such addition as the Government consented to make. And this £42,000, which included an addition to what had been annually spent on the Universities, was given in lieu of all claims, past and present, at that time. There were claims then running upon the Exchequer, and it was in satisfaction of these that this money was given. It by no means covered all claims for the future for annual wants. Grants for buildings were never included in these annual charges, and neither the grant of £42,000 under the Act nor the proposed new grant of £30,000 has anything to do with buildings. To show that that is so, I may state that an application was recently made from the University of Aberdeen to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a grant for additional buildings, and, if the House approve of it, we are to receive an instalment towards a total grant of £40,000 from the Exchequer provided there be a local subscription of like amount. The hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) is either mistaken, or has expressed himself in such a way as to leave the Committee under a wrong impression, with regard to what is done in the case of the University of London. He said the Exchequer takes the whole burden of the University of London, applying the fees towards defraying it. The result of that arrangement, however, is that last year the expenditure on the University by the Treasury, in the first instance, was £15,480, but the fees received amounted to £15,200, so that the whole burden on the Imperial funds was less than £300.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg respectfully to remind the Committee that somewhat less than an hour remains for the completion of this stage of the Bill. All present are aware that a pledge of very binding character was entered into last night that it should be concluded at this Sitting. There are still questions of some interest to be disposed of, and I would very respectfully press on the Committee the necessity of advancing as rapidly as possible.

(5.48.) MR. CALDWELL: I do not desire to detain the Committee, but it is an important question whether the Universities should get the £30,000, and whether it should be Scotch or Imperial money. It was well-known that the scheme of the Commissioners would involve more than the £42,000 in the Act, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave an undertaking during the passage of the Bill that more money would be given out of the Imperial Purse if the Ordinances of the University Commissioners showed that more was required; and the hon. Member for the Glasgow University (Mr. J. A. Campbell) admits that the claims of the University for further funds were in no way discharged by the £42,000. I hope my hon. Friend will go to a Division as a protest on the part of Scotch Members that this £30,000 ought to come from the Exchequer and ought not to be introduced, as the thin end of the wedge, to attempt to settle the burden of the Universities on the localities in future.

(6.10.) MR. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to move, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 23, at end to add—

“To take effect after a Resolution approving of the same has been passed by the House of Commons.”

Though this Amendment raises rather a large question, as I have no desire to detain the House, I shall confine myself to a very few moments. I call the attention of the Committee to this: Under the Bill, as proposed, the ordinances made by these Commissioners must be submitted to Parliament. The principle, as I said before, is that in these matters we should make the grant dependent not upon the joint vote of both Houses, but upon the vote of this House alone. I believe there may be a constitutional question of some difficulty here. I believe this is a Money Bill. This Bill originated in the House of Commons; and what the House of Lords can do with a Money Bill, if once it gets there, is more than I can say. There is a sort of impression abroad here that the House of Lords ought not to amend a clause in a Money Bill. If, instead of leaving the matter to the University Commissioners, we should dispose of it ourselves by a clause in the Bill, I take it that the House of Lords would not be doing right in either amending or rejecting that clause. In other words, the House of Lords have no power to amend a Bill of this kind. By leaving it to the University Commissioners, and by leaving the House of Lords a direct veto on the ordinance of the Commissioners, it seems to me that by a side wind we are giving the House of Lords power which constitutionally it ought not to have. I daresay the Government are not disposed to consider the possibility of accepting this Amendment. It is in deference to the conciliatory spirit shown by the First Lord of the Treasury last night that I refrain from dealing with the question with that scope which I think the importance of the question demands. But I put this distinct point and suggestion as a protest against the lassitude with which the pretensions of the House of Lords are now received on this side of the House. I believe the time is come when we must make a stand against anything like co-ordinate authority between the two Houses. For my part, I am tired of going about the country and demanding the abolition of the House of Lords. I am not satisfied to repeat the jingling phrase, “You must mend it or end it,” and then come to the House of Commons and calmly see the most extreme pretensions put forward on behalf of the House of Lords without any protest.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 23, at end, to add, “to take effect after a resolution approving of the same has been passed by the House of Commons.”—(Mr. Robertson.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

*(6.16.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: I hope the hon. and learned Member will not press his Amendment to a Division. A scheme has only recently been laid down by Parliament for the guidance of the Commissioners, and for giving effect to their ordinances. The effect of this Amendment would be to alter the Rule which has been so long in force with respect to both Houses of Parliament.

(6.17.) MR. CRAWFORD: I do not often appear very favourable to the House of Lords, but I think a far stronger case could be made against that establishment than was contained in the remarks which the hon. Member just offered to the House. The proposal to treat this money which is to be administered by the University Commission, of which I have the honour to be one, in a different way from the rest of the money under their control is not merely an inconvenient proposition, but it suggests what is an act of impossibility. We cannot separate the £30,000 from the rest of the money which we have to administer.

Mr. Caldwell

(6.19.) MR. HUNTER: I think this is an Amendment which, under other circumstances, ought to be pressed on the Government. I had no confidence in the University Commissioners; and, after seeing their ordinances, I have still less confidence in them. I think my hon. and learned Friend should withdraw his Amendment.

(6.20.) DR. CLARK: If this Amendment is carried it will compel the Government to have these questions discussed before twelve o'clock, because these ordinances will not become law until they are sanctioned by the House of Commons. For this practical reason, as well as for the very weighty ones of my hon. Friend, I trust he will take a Division.

(6.21.) MR. ROBERTSON: I should like to say that when I ventured to put this Amendment on the Paper I had entirely forgotten the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire was a Member of the University Commission. Had I remembered that, I would not have proposed this devolution of his duties. I shall agree to the suggestion of my hon. Friend, and ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.23.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): In moving the Amendment which stands in my name, I shall be as brief as possible. Sub-section 3 purports to give the sum of £25,000 to the Parochial Boards for the maintenance of pauper lunatics, but the Parochial Boards are obliged to apply the rates for their maintenance; and, therefore, if you give them the £25,000, you will only be giving it in relief of rates. Now, the rates are paid half by the occupiers and half by the owners, and, therefore, by this sub-section it is proposed to give £12,500 directly to the owners in relief of rates. And as it is now recognised by everybody that the relief of rates benefits not the occupier, but the owner, you are giving a further sum of £12,500 indirectly to the owners of Scotland. I object strongly to raising money by general taxation—by the taxation of industry—and to devote that money to alleviating the burdens that now fall upon land in any shape. I am pledged to my constituents, if, and when, possible, to increase the proportion of the taxation of the country that is paid by the landlords. Therefore, I feel it is my duty to take every opportunity of not, at any rate, decreasing the burdens falling upon landlords at the expense of the industrial community.

Question proposed, "That sub-section 3 stand part of the Clause."

(6.24.) DR. CLARK: This is the first of two Amendments which, I trust, may be carried in the form of a compromise, because I take it that all the rest of this money will now go to the Town and County Councils; and that the balance, if it does not go to the Parochial Boards, will be equalised by them. So far as the rate-payers are concerned, probably it is a matter of six and half a dozen whether it is a reduction of rates through the Parochial Board or through the Town and County Councils. The only difference is that if the whole of the money goes to the Town and County Councils, under this modified form, then it will not all go to the landlords; if it goes in its present form, the bulk of the money will be paid not by the landlords, but will come from the taxation of industry. The effect of the Bill will be to at once place £37,500 in the pockets of the landlords, because they pay one-half the rates. That will increase the value of their property, and even the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he wrote about this matter, protested against these hereditary charges upon the landlord being taken off him, although he may have changed his mind since then. I think this will be a sort of compromise that, instead of giving it to the Parochial Boards you give it to the County and Town Councils, when it will be used for other and more useful purposes.

(6.28.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government have not intervened in this matter at an earlier stage because they desired to carry out the agreement that was entered into last night for shortening the discussion. This Amendment opens up a gigantic question, and I do not suppose that it is expected that we should enter upon a discussion of it now. We do not agree with the view expressed as to the theory of taxation, and we must adhere, as far as we can, to the lines of the distribution of the money which have already been laid down. That being so, we cannot accept the Amendment.

(6.30.) DR. HUNTER: I should submit to the Government that this is the point where the compromise should begin. Why should not the whole of the £75,000 go to the Town Councils and the County Councils? So far as the ratepayers in the counties are concerned, it is absolutely immaterial whether you give it to the County Councils or to the Parochial Boards, because, both in the case of the County Councils and the Parochial Boards, the rates are paid half by the owner and half by the occupier; and, therefore, so far as the relief of the rates is concerned, it is absolutely immaterial whether you give it to the one or to the other. If you are desirous to give them the opportunity of using this money for any wise public purpose, then you will give it to the County Council. If you are determined that this money shall be misappropriated—misappropriated for the relief of the landlords—then, no doubt, you will adhere to the provisions of the Bill. This is a question of great importance, and I hope my hon. Friend will take the sense of the House upon it.

MR. ESSLEMONT: The discussion has turned somewhat on the same subject as my amendment concerns. I think there was some excuse for giving £25,000 for pauper lunatics, because in Scotland we are in this respect differently treated to England. But the relief to the ratepayers should take the form of an extra shilling per head of pauper lunatics, putting us in the same position with England. The reason which induced many Members to vote for the previous amendment was the expectation that there would be better treatment for the pauper lunatics if sent to asylums than under the administration of the Parochial Boards. But as regards Sub-section 4, the question resolves itself into a contribution from the poorer to the richer part of the community, that is to say, it is a relief to the landlords. If Sub-section 4 were omitted, the effect of the clause would be that we should have £50,000 to give to Town Councils and County Councils, and after the concessions made by the Government this amount could be distributed for any good purpose required in the neighbourhood.

MR. HUNTER: I ask your ruling, Sir, on a point of order. Am I right in my opinion that a decision on a motion to omit a Sub-section precludes an amendment being proposed to this Sub-section? I have an Amendment to propose the omission of the words "Parochial Boards in Scotland."

THE CHAIRMAN: The question will be put in a form to preserve the possibility of such an Amendment if there is a desire to move it.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 31, to leave out sub-section 4.—(Mr. Esslemont).

Question, "That the words 'In distributing the sum of £50,000,' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

MR. HUNTER: I now move the omission of the Reference to Parochial Boards, in order to follow that up by a subsequent Amendment to provide for the introduction of the authority of County Councils, Town Councils, and Police Commissioners of Burghs in Scotland.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I rise to order, Sir. My Motion was to omit Sub-section 4.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Aberdeen intimated his intention to move an Amendment altering the words "Parochial Boards." Consequently in putting the Question I did so in the form "That 'in distributing the sum of £50,000,' stand part of the Clause." The Committee affirmed that Question, the words stand, and now the hon. Member for Aberdeen moves his Amendment.

MR. HUNTER: It is a question of the substitution of County Councils for Parochial Boards, and upon that question I should think the Government would be prepared to meet us without any further argument.

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL [Lords].

(No. 232.) THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I move the Motion of which I have given notice. I need not explain it, for I think it has an object with which we all agree.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order be discharged. That the Bill be re-committed." — (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged.

Bill re-committed in respect of a new Clause.

Ordered: That it be an Instruction to the Committee on Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Acts Amendment (re-committed) Bill, that they have power to provide for the protection from injury, on the part of road authorities, of certain lands on the ground of public interest. — (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

New Clause—

(Preservation of lands from injury.)

"Notwithstanding anything contained in section eighty of the Act first and second William the Fourth, chapter forty-three, as incorporated in 'The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878' the exemption from the general right of searching for, digging, and carrying away materials, as made in the said section eighty, shall be extended to such land or grounds as it may appear to the Secretary for Scotland, on the application of the proprietor thereof, desirable to preserve intact on the ground of national or public interest or historical association," — (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

MR. ESSLEMONT: May I point out to the Lord Advocate that as the Bill left the House of Lords there was a clause providing for the construction of new bridges. Then doubts arose as to the imposition of new taxation by this means; but these doubts being resolved it was expected that the clause would pass unopposed in Committee, but to the great surprise of my constituents this, which they consider a most important clause, has no place in the Bill. So far as we know, there is no objection to the clause, which, as the Bill is re-committed, I hope the Lord Advocate will agree to have restored.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not speaking to the Motion for the new clause.

(6.55.) MR. MORTON: I think we had better report Progress. I do not see why the Government should rush the Business when Scotch Members evidently have matters to discuss.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: I hope the hon. Member will not make such a Motion. This is not really a Government Bill, and it has the concurrence of all Scotch Members.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I only intended a few words of explanation with the hope of receiving an assurance from the Lord Advocate satisfactory to my constituents.

MR. MORTON: Under the circumstances I do not press a Motion to report Progress; but I hope that similar consideration will be extended to me in reference to a measure in which I may be interested.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be reported as amended."

MR. ESSLEMONT: I hope the Lord Advocate will now make some statement.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I can only say that it was considered the question of building new bridges was foreign to the main object of the Bill, and that there was general agreement to the alteration of the clause.

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported with an Amendment; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (PURCHASE) BILL.—(No. 257.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Objection taken.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I hope objection will be waived. There can be no objection to the principle of the Bill, and I may mention that I have had urgent representations from the West Riding of Yorkshire that the County Council are anxious to acquire the authority the Bill would give.

DR. CLARK : The right hon. Gentleman agreed to consider a clause extending the Bill to Scotland and Ireland. Taking the Bill now offers no chance of proposing that.

MR. MORTON : I do not want to stand in the way, but I hope in withdrawing my objection I may expect similar courtesy when I want a matter considered.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I object on the ground that the Bill does not extend to Ireland.

Third Reading deferred till Thursday.

Lords Message considered.

Ordered, That the Select Committee appointed by this House to join with a Committee of the Lords on Statute Law Revision, do meet in Committee Room B, on Wednesday the 11th May, at Twelve o'clock, as proposed by The Lords.—(Mr. Whitmore.)

Message to The Lords to acquaint them herewith.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (PURCHASE OF LAND) BILL.—(No. 33.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(12.40.) Mr. HALDANE (Haddington): I think the House will agree that, having regard to the shortness of the time at the disposal of private Members, speeches on a Wednesday should not be longer than necessary. Therefore, I will proceed without preface to lay before the House the somewhat complicated provisions of the measure for Land Law reform I have to present. The Bill aims at the accomplishment of two purposes. In the first place, it seeks to provide Councils for counties and boroughs, now thoroughly representative bodies, with powers for the compulsory acquisition of such land as is necessary in the interest of the population they represent.

D

In the second place, the Bill seeks to deal with the problem of unearned increment, a problem which has interested many statesmen and economists for years gone by. Land in this country stands in a different position from any other form of property. In the whole of it society is interested; in some of it, that which is in the occupation of those congested portions of our population which are drawn into our towns and cities, society is deeply and vitally interested. This land, called for brevity urban land, is essential for the existence and life of the urban community, and it is in view of this that we feel some change must be made in the existing condition of the law. You have created these Local Bodies, you have made them representative of the inhabitants of the locality, yet you have not provided them with the power which of all powers is the most important to them—the power of acquiring and controlling the land which is necessary for the existence of the inhabitants whom they represent. Well, Sir, as things stand at present, a whole city may be at the mercy of a single individual. Land is, after all, a monopoly; it is something which cannot be provided but in a definite and specific form. It is not like money or any other form of property, one portion of which may do as well as another. This particular portion of land, and no other, is essential for the purpose of the people to be benefited. Under this condition of things, it seems to some of us right that you should provide the Local Authority with such power as will enable it to acquire and control land which is necessary for the health of the people whom it represents. Now that, of course, involves compulsory purchase, or, in other words, it involves the expropriation of the present landlord. But that is no new procedure; it is one with which we are extremely familiar nowadays. We have extended it to Railway Companies in the public interest for half a century. We have had it extended by a Conservative Government for the building of artisans' dwellings under the Act of 1875. Only a year ago the right hon. Gentleman who represents the Local Government Board in this House and who has attended to the question of the housing of the working classes in so fair and so keen a spirit, that right hon. Gentleman brought forward a Bill consolidating and amplifying that power of expropriation given to the Local Authority. But even probably more familiar than that, though I doubt whether Members realise the extent to which the House has gone in the direction of expropriation—is the instance of 1882, when a Conservative ex-Lord Chancellor of immense ability, the late Lord Cairns, brought forward a Bill, which passed through Parliament, for amending the law relating to settled land. That Bill, promoted and enacted in the public interest, provided that where a man had only a subordinate and life interest in property he, for the public interest, should be enabled to turn that property, including the interest of the remainder-man, into money. This involved the principle that in the public interest the expropriation of the remainder-man may be made; that even where a person has a limited interest in it, he may be empowered to change that property into money subject only to the restriction that no portion of the value shall be taken from the person so affected. That is the principle of the Bill we propose to the House, and that is our case to be debated. We propose to give to the owners of the land which it is necessary to take in the interest of the public the pecuniary value of that land—the full pecuniary value. We say that under the provisions of this Bill, if it passes into law, there will be taken from the landowner not a single penny to which he has any legal or moral right. So much for the first purpose of the Bill. Now, as regards the second purpose, connected with unearned increment, urban land stands in a peculiar position. In the case of the land upon which the town is built, and which lies immediately around the town, there is a special increment of value which is absolutely diverse from anything else in the nature of property. It is not like the increase in value of Railway Stock, which rises and falls with the market; it is unlike the increase in value of any form of movable property; it is not even like the increase in value which takes place in land generally owing to agricultural reasons and the greater demand for land on the part of the population generally. It is a specific increase arising from this, and solely from this, that a certain piece of land is vitally necessary in the interest of a particular community, and that a particular landowner who has the monopoly of the land has the power to dictate his own terms, and who says, "You shall not have the land except at my own price." That is the present state of things which differentiates the unearned increment in the case of urban land from the increase in any other form of property, and it is with that exceptional form of unearned increment, and that alone, we propose to deal in this Bill. It is instructive to look at the way this works. There is land around London which the people of London could, 40 years ago, purchase at the rate of £300 an acre, but the price now is from £5,000 to £10,000 an acre. What has been the cause of this increase? Certainly nothing that has been done by the owner, certainly nothing proceeding from any cause of a general nature. This growth—this enormous growth—is due to this, and this alone—the necessities of the population; and that those who represent the people have, on their behalf, to pay the owner what he chooses to ask and what it is right to give him, for the law allows him to make the demand. We cannot go back on past transactions; we cannot take the value which has accrued to the owner and which the law allows him, but we may alter the law for the future and prevent those scandals, for I can call them nothing else, which have occurred in the past from being repeated in the future. This Bill, then, is of a prospective nature altogether; it proposes nothing in the way of confiscation of increment, the title to which has already accrued. There is another view of the question. In London, in the course of the 21 years since 1870, annual ground values have increased, as distinguished from the buildings and erections on the land, by the sum of seven millions. If the people of London, so lately as 1870, had purchased the land on which their city stands, that city would be now in receipt of this enormous annual income of seven millions, which would go a great way towards the furtherance of public purposes, and certainly would have put them in a very much better position than they are in at present. When I take the period between 1870 and 1891, I do not mean the annual amount each year—I mean the total amount. We say it has been a great error and mistake in the legislation of the past—that a Municipality such as that which represents London should not have had the power to take land and to divert into the pockets of the persons who created it, the value which has hitherto gone into the pockets of the owner. That is the aim and object of this Bill. It proposes to deal with the future, and I regret that it cannot deal with the past. I will now say a few words as to the reasons which induced us to bring it forward at the present time. Nothing is more striking than the way in which the extension of the franchise in 1885 has educated the public mind, and I might also say the minds of Members of this House, on this question. We no longer come to this House to represent individuals, however numerous and important they may be. We come here to represent the large mass of the people, and the consequence has been that the mind of the Legislature has been directed much more than formerly, to what I may call the collective, rather than the individual, interests and grievances of the people. The question about which we are now concerned is not that which relates to the diffusion of ownership, and to the breaking up of estates; but as to how the public may most effectually maintain and preserve their interests in the land. An illustration of the present position of affairs was provided in the controversy which took place the other day on the Small Holdings Bill and other Debates which took place last year, especially on the Leasehold Enfranchisement Bill. We felt that the Leasehold Enfranchisement Bill was brought forward not in the interest of society in general, but of a body of individuals, and that the effect of it would be to transfer the annual increment from one class of owners to another class who had no better right to it. We considered that, while leaseholders had grievances which ought to be redressed, that redress should come from some public body through a measure which should not give uncontrolled power to individual leaseholders.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I would put in Clauses of Control.

*MR. HALDANE: My hon. Friend says he would put in Clauses of Control, but we feel that the time has come when a measure of land control should be brought forward on a wider basis. I will pass now to the machinery of this Bill. In order to accomplish its objects, which I have attempted to describe, Local Authorities should be enabled to purchase land in the interest of the community, and to deal with it in a perfectly free manner. Now, it has been said, in quarters of this House from which I should hardly have expected it to come, that a proposal to give compulsory powers as to land to Municipalities is objectionable, as tending to lead to jobbery. It has been our business of late years to enlarge the number of these local Representative Bodies, and to extend their powers, and I think it comes with bad grace from some hon. Members to say that they distrust the power of dealing with land which has been given to Municipalities on account of the risk of jobbery which it might involve. If there is anything which characterises the Democracy of this country it is this--that it hates and detests anything like corruption; and I think we may safely trust to the Democracy, when it comes to the election of these Local Bodies, to see that they are elected on a basis which will preclude any danger of that kind. The awakening which came to London in connection with the abolition of the late Metropolitan Board of Works, and the zeal which has been shown in the Metropolis in regard to the County Council Election, has produced a body of members for the Council as pure and free from any suspicion of jobbery as it would be possible to find throughout the length and breadth of the country, and I have no doubt that the same may be said with regard to the Municipality of Birmingham. It is unworthy, therefore, of those who believe in these Local Bodies to suggest a suspicion of jobbery in this case. They may rest assured that the people who elect these bodies will take care that the risk is very small. Now, there is nobody in this House who has more closely associated himself with municipal life than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and I confess I should have been glad if I could have seen him sitting in his place during the discussion of this question. He has been one of the pioneers in the movement for increasing the powers of our Local Bodies, but it sometimes happens that he finds himself unable to give us that support which we should like to receive from him in regard to these matters. I trust, however, that in the Division we shall have the support of hon. Members who have been associated with municipal life in the past, and who are in a position to render yeoman service in the future. I would like to point out, with regard to the machinery of this Bill, that it proposes to enable the Municipal Authority to purchase the land in the first place, and to use it in the manner it thinks best. It may be stated that injustice may arise in the case of individual owners of land, but I think that the Bill will put an effectual and thoroughgoing check on any abuses of their powers which may be contemplated by Local Authorities. Before there can be valuation of land and compulsory purchase, the authority of the Local Government Board must be obtained, for the Local Government Board must have notice and hold an inquiry, and say whether in its opinion what is being done is for the benefit of the inhabitants. If the Local Government Board sees that there is any real ground for suspicion in the case it will not sanction the proceeding. Then, again, public notice must be given of what is proposed to be done, and it will be in the power of the inhabitants concerned to draw the attention of the Department to the position of affairs. The Bill has been carefully drawn to prevent any such objections with regard to compulsory purchase. I now come to the question of unearned increment. Many propositions have been brought forward for the purpose of getting at the unearned increment. It was once proposed by Mr. Mill that there should be a general valuation of the land in the country, and that the subsequent unearned increment should be obtained by means of taxation. We do not look forward to the carrying out of any such far-reaching proposition. On the other hand, we think that a mere rating power is insufficient. I would point out that a rate for such a purpose is either a rate, or it is something more. If it is a mere rate, then it only gets a fraction of unearned increment; whilst if the whole is to be taken, then it is not a rate.

and you will be doing a very great injustice, because you draw no distinction between accrued increment and that which is to accrue after the passing of your reform. We propose in this Bill to deal only with the unearned increment which is created in the future, after the alteration of the law, and after notice has been given. We propose the adoption of what we consider is the only remedy—the remedy of purchase. By enabling the Local Authority to purchase the land you put them into the position of getting unearned increment. But it may be said that the Local Authority, such as the County Council in London, has not sufficient funds to enable it to purchase the land it requires for the purpose, and which it believes is likely to be the subject of greatly increasing value. Accordingly we provide powers of compulsory valuation. Suppose there are 100 acres of land on the confines of London which will probably go up in value, and that the County Council wishes to purchase it and to divert the stream of population in that direction. Suppose that the County Council further thinks it expedient to put the provisions of this Bill into operation. The result would be that it would have a valuation of the land, and that valuation can only take place with the consent of the Local Government Board. The valuation would take place, and it would be the duty of the arbitrator or umpire to give the owner of the land its actual value—that is, the sum that a willing buyer would give to a willing seller. The first valuation would take place on the basis of giving the owner the full market value of the land. The County Council may at any time within twenty years afterwards come forward and say—“We now require this land, and we will pay you the actual value at the time of purchase, minus only so much as is ascertained, upon the basis of the first valuation, to be due to the movement of population in the meantime.” The result of my inquiries has been that the problem of the valuation is much simpler than many solved in the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and that men of skill would quickly make rules which would enable them to determine this matter without the slightest difficulty. They would sit as jurymen and come to a kind of approximate estimate such as pertains to the purchase of railways, and even more difficult elements than we have to deal with on this occasion. Having arrived at that value, the County Council would be able to purchase at the capital price of the time being, minus so much as represented this special unearned increment accrued since the first valuation. The owner of the land would get everything he had expended in the way of improvement. For instance, he might have desired to lay out the land as building land in order to attract people there; and it would be perfectly safe immediately after the first valuation to erect his buildings, lay out the land, and bring tenants there, and so increase the value of the estate in that way, because the value of all that he had put there would be secured under the provisions of this Bill. I wish now to deal with one or two objections which will be raised. It will be said that this Bill would depreciate the value of the land. Let me first say that as regards future owners it is, of course, absurd to say that they would buy without notice that the change had been made in the law under which this special unearned increment was no longer to be appropriated by private parties. Therefore we may dismiss the case of future owners. In the case of existing owners I agree there would to some extent, but not to the whole extent alleged, be depreciation of the value of the land. It is part of my case that it ought to be so. The matter stands in this way. Anybody owning the land would be paid for it at the full market value at the time of the purchase; but assuming there was a valuation with a view to subsequent purchase, then it would be paid when the time came on the basis of what I have described as the value at the time of purchase, minus special unearned increment accrued in the meantime. Of course, in the minds of purchasers who were speculating in the land, that would affect the value of the land, and to that extent they would not be in a position to give as much as if the Bill had not been passed, and the law left in the same unaltered condition. But such a purchaser would get the actual capitalised value of his income to begin with, and all actual value which had accrued up to the date of the first valuation and had entered into the market value. He would get everything which would be his as the law stood, apart from the passing of the provisions of this Bill, as at the date of the first valuation; and he would be in a position to realise that value and to sell the land, because the purchaser of the land would know that the County Council could not then take it for less. There might be a general drop all-round, because of the existence of powers of compulsory purchase, but that is what you have to face, in kind at least, in all instances of giving powers of compulsory purchase. Take the case of a man who sells during the period within which the second valuation and purchase can take place, that is, 20 years, and it is the only case which distinguishes what I am describing from what occurs under any scheme of compulsory purchase. The seller may go into the market and say—"Here is my land valued at so much; the County Council cannot take it for less, and accordingly you may take it with this certainty—you buy it knowing you get that much for it. You can develop it and lay out money upon it, and you get the value of your improvement, and you get the income in the meantime which may be largely in excess of what you would get in the shape of ordinary interest on your money. You take it with the certainty that the County Council cannot take it for less than the capitalised value of the income, and with the chance that the County Council may not purchase it for some time." What this Bill proposes to do is to give everybody who owns this kind of land exactly the same price he would have if it were ordinary land. It proposes to secure that. It is only in the case of speculative purchasers that the price could be affected. In all the other cases, in the case of people buying for occupation and objects of that kind, matters under this Bill would stand as at present. And, therefore, while I admit that the effect of the passage of this Bill must be to bring about a certain depreciation in the value of land in the hands of some existing owners, I also say that what would be affected would be merely the speculative value, and not the legitimate and ordinary value of the land, treated as upon the same footing as the other land in the country. There is another objection made to this Bill. It is said that if you are going to take the unearned increment you ought also to compensate for what was described the other day in a Debate in this House by the hon. Member for the Stamford Division (Mr. Cust) as the undeserved decrement. It is said—"If the land goes up in value you are going to take this increment, you ought, by another provision, to pay the man if it drops in the meantime." That is founded upon a complete fallacy and misapprehension. What you do is to value the land, and in that valuation you get at the market value, and it is open to the owner of the land to sell it at the amount of the valuation. He can get his money and pocket it. If he desires to continue the ownership, he only does so because he hopes for, and takes his chance of, an increase in his income and in the value of the land, and with it the risk of drop which attends that chance. The effect of this Bill is merely to give notice that you are not going to allow this form of increment to be appropriated in the future as it has been in the past. Involved in that there is no correlative obligation to make allowance at the public expense for the diminished value. That is due to the ordinary incidents of which speculators take the risk; and if a man does not choose to realise at once, and a worse time comes to him, that is his fault and misfortune. Certainly, the population of the town or its representatives, the Local Authorities, cannot be blamed. It seems to me that is an answer to the two objections—the only two real objections—which can be made to this measure. It seems to us that this measure is one which does not involve the confiscation of a single penny to which any man has a legal or moral title. We know the law may be altered, and the only change as regards the landowner is that the law has been altered. The objections brought forward to this Bill are objections which in kind may be brought forward in precisely the same way to every Bill giving powers for compulsory purchase. Does the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Ritchie) imagine that in his Bill giving enlarged power to Local Authorities to acquire land for the purpose of artisans' dwellings he did not thereby affect the value of the land which was likely to be so taken? I venture to say that he brought about a great change in the value of certain urban properties in London, and I will go further and say that the change is one of the best things which the right hon. Gentleman has accomplished in his administration.

MR. RITCHIE: Compulsion in regard to unsanitary dwellings.

*MR. HALDANE; In the machinery which you had established by successive Acts of Parliament you had created the theory of these unsanitary conditions, and then you gave compulsory powers to take the land to which they apply, and now you say there is a distinction between that sort of thing and what we contemplate. But we are laying our hands upon an unsanitary spot in the administration of these affairs by urban authorities, and we want to deal with it on the same principle and in the same way the right hon. Gentleman did in the case of the Housing of the Working Classes Bill. All measures for compulsory purchase must affect the value of land, but it is time we ceased to recognise that as a valid objection. I remember how in 1886, in that January Debate which has been so often referred to, the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture denounced my hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division (Mr. J. Collings) and the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) for their proposition of compulsion at that time. He said those were the proposals of a class with predatory instincts represented by the two hon. Members. Well, there came a time when the Minister for Agriculture was working in harmony with those two Members, calling them his friends, and agreeing with them as to the principles of a measure they were bringing forward in common, and which, only the other day, they were all supporting. It seems to me that experience is not unlikely to be repeated. I dare say we shall have a speech from the Minister for Agriculture denouncing this Bill as confiscation and robbery, and I shall attach as much importance to that speech as I attached to the speech on that January afternoon in 1886. Years will pass, perhaps it will take two or three or more, but the time will come when this Bill, which I am now bringing forward, will, in principle at all events, be advocated from the Benches opposite. Do you think as the franchise is still further extended, and as the people begin to feel more and more the power you put into their hands, that they will tolerate a state of things under which value, properly theirs, and which ought therefore to go into their pockets, is to go into the pockets of a few monopolist landlords who have no more right to it than I have? It appears to me that the Bill we are introducing from this side of the House is a Bill of really Conservative policy—it is a Bill which seeks to give effect to the tendencies of our time, and to recognise the new views of Land Law reform which have been forced upon us as a result of the wider franchise which now obtains. We who sit here are, after all, the people's men of business, and it is our duty to be responsive to their opinions. There was, a few years ago, great agitation on the subject of the land. There came to this country a gentleman of great oratorical ability, who went through the land rather in the character of a preacher than in any other guise, and he preached the doctrine of the iniquity of private ownership of land, and the doctrine of expropriation without compensation. I bring forward this Bill, not because I agree with Mr. Henry George, but because I disagree with him. If you are to stop the agitation which then began, and which, it seems, has been acquiring force ever since, something must be done. The mind of the people is awakened on this subject; and I think in this connection we owe something to Mr. George instead of having a grudge against him. He has made the people see that the time has come when something must be done; and what we seek in this Bill is to do that something, not in the unjust form he proposed, but in a just form. And we feel that in the proposition we are laying before the House we are taking that step. I do not say that this Bill deals with the whole land question, or even with more than a small part, but I do say that it seeks to grapple with a real grievance, perhaps the most important the people have. In seeking to deal with that grievance, we seek to deal with it by altered law for the future, avoiding those doctrines of confiscation which have been talked about so much and denounced so often, but the true significance of which has not, I think, been understood. Our business is to disengage the nature of the real difficulty, and to find a remedy for it. It is not in any revolutionary spirit that I bring forward this Bill. It is with a desire to grapple with a grievance, a most real and substantial one, in a way which is consistent with justice, and it is in that spirit that I venture to commend this Bill to the favour of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Haldane.)

(1.27.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I shall move, Sir, that this Bill be read a second time this day six months, and in doing so I must say that if this Bill had been moved by anybody but my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane), and if it were not to be seconded, as I understand it is, by the hon. and learned Member for Fife (Mr. Asquith), I should have regarded the Bill as an elaborate joke, not a very good joke, but as a Wednesday frolic. The characters of the hon. and learned Members, however, preclude such a suspicion. These two hon. and learned Gentlemen have professional reputations to lose, they are both looking for office in the next Radical Government, and we are obliged, therefore, to regard this Bill, this ugly and sinister Bill, as the serious conception of the rising lawyers of the Radical Party. The Select Committee on Town Holdings recommended that in the case of large industrial populations in permanent employment living close to their work, and where the people were able and willing to buy the freehold of their houses, the Local Authorities of such places—places, for instance, like Woolwich, and such communities as are to be found in the neighbourhood of slate quarries or coal mines—should be armed with the powers of compulsory purchase. In that recommendation I heartily concur; but, Sir, this Bill proposes something very different from that. This Bill says that "where it appears to any County Council that it is for the interest of the inhabitants of any district within the county that any lands shall be purchased . . . the Council may purchase those lands." No public object stated; simply for the interest of the inhabitants. Sir, I say it never can be for the interest of any of the inhabitants in any county in England that any lands should be bought under the terms and conditions of this Bill, because it is for the interest of all the inhabitants of all the counties in England that security of property should be maintained, and I am old-fashioned enough to believe that what is wrong in morals cannot be innocent in politics. In these modern days, with the extended franchise, there are many limitations imposed on the rights of property, as the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Haldane) has reminded us. I know a man cannot do what he likes with his own if, by so doing, he injures his neighbours. I respect the maxim, sic utere tuo ut rempublicam non lœdas. But, Sir, I ask this House if the hon. and learned Gentleman has produced a single argument to show that the present ownership and distribution of landed property in England inflicts on the community evils half so serious and grave as those that would flow from the shock to security which would be given by this Bill, and from the open war on property which he proposes to wage? When you make war on property, as Burke says, you make war on human nature. But, Mr. Speaker, the proposals in this Bill for the immediate purchase of land, though monstrous enough, and unjustified by any public object, are mild, innocuous, and even laudable when compared with the provisions in the Bill for valuation with a view to subsequent purchase. It appears from Clauses 4, 5, and 6 of this Bill, that if the County Council should cast its covetous and regal eye upon the vineyard of any Naboth in the country or out of the country, and if the envious monarch should not feel inclined to force a sale at that particular moment, either from scarcity of funds or because the market is brisk, then the vineyard in question is to be tied up for 20 years to await the royal pleasure of the County Council, under a valuation which is pleasantly described as a charge on the land, and which is to be registered under the Registration Act of 1888. And if at any period within the 20 years the County Council think they see a favourable moment for buying, down comes their hand upon the property. And, Sir, the price to be paid for it is to be the price which is described as—

"The fair market value of the lands at the time of the purchase thereof, after deducting the proportion of any increase of that value over and above the value of the lands as the same was ascertained when the lands were previously valued under the provisions of this Act, which may be ascertained to be the special increment due to the increase or movement of the population in, or to the industrial or other development of any town or other populous place in the neighbourhood of such lands."

Now, Sir, that is not easy to realise at first. It requires an effort of the imagination to gauge even approximately the bottomless injustice of this proposal. It is, again, a case of "Heads I win, tails you lose." If the land rises in value the owner is not to receive the increment, if it can be traced to any of those causes which usually produce a rise in the value of landed property. If, on the other hand, the property falls in value, the owner, after having been prevented from dealing with his own property for 20 years, will then have it left on his hands damaged and depreciated by the County Council, because the House will observe there is no power in the Bill to force the County Council to buy the land which they have locked up for 20 years under the blight and padlock of their valuation. In other phraseology, Sir, the County Council is to have the call of any land it likes to put its finger upon; it is to have an option of purchase extending over 20 years, and for that option not a single farthing is to be paid! Mr. Speaker, that is a proposal which most business men will regard as the fantastic scheme of young lawyers who dream nightmares, because, Sir, I do not think any man will deny that the effect of this clause will be to make any lands subject to the County Council valuation absolutely unsaleable. What man would be such an ass as to buy lands from which he would be liable to be expropriated at any moment by the County Council, particularly as he would not be allowed to make the ordinary profit that might attach to a judicious investment? Now, Sir, I am bound to say, with all due deference to my hon. and learned Friend, that of all the blundering and plundering fallacies propagated by modern Radicalism, this so-called doctrine of unearned increment is the most shallow and sinister. The hon. Gentleman very conveniently proposes to confine this doctrine to landed property in the neighbourhood of towns; but I entirely refuse to accept that limitation from the hon. and learned Gentleman. He will find, as the franchise is extended, that what is sauce for the landlord is also sauce for the commercial millionaire. I want to know with what object any man buys property of any kind? Is it not in the hope and belief that the property will rise in value? And every man expects to be allowed to enjoy every chance, whether from accident or his own exertions, to augment any part of the value of his property. Why does a man buy shares in a mine or a bank? Why does he buy Government securities? Not only to get interest for his money, but in the hope and belief that his investment will improve in value. I buy Consols at 90, and they go up to 95. I have done nothing, except as an ordinary citizen who shaves, and pays his debts and says his prayers. I have done nothing to increase their value and yet they rise. If ever there was a case of unearned increment, it is that of the increased value of industrial undertakings; and I will venture to say that most, if not nearly all, of the hon. Gentlemen opposite who are going to vote to-day for the confiscation of the unearned increment in land have made their fortunes and to-day draw their incomes from the increased value of industrial undertakings in different parts of the world, and to which they have never contributed one moment's thought or exertion. I will go further, and say that the fruits of the earth contain as large an element of unearned increment as the earth from which they are derived. The farmer gives his care to the cultivation of the soil, but his labour and anxiety differ not at all from the labour of managing an estate, and the prices which the farmer gets for his produce—the value of his corn and beef—depend almost entirely upon facilities of transport, the railways and canals in his neighbourhood, and the proximity of markets. The farmer has done nothing to make the railway and very little to increase the population that consume his produce. But since the railroad was made the farmers' profits have doubled. Is the County Council coming down upon that farmer for his unearned increment? Because it seems to me that with precisely the same logic as they propose to come down upon the landlord they might come down upon his tenant. Mr. Speaker, the real issue raised by this Bill—although it is not avowed—is whether private ownership in land is to continue to be recognised by the Legislature of this country. If it is not to be recognised, let us say so plainly, honestly, and openly, and let us say to the Local Authorities, “Buy up existing landlords,” but do not let us pretend to recognise the principle of private property in land, and then destroy that property piecemeal by depriving the owners of the rights and profits and advantages of possession. I may be told by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite that property is only an idea: that it has been created by law, and that it can be destroyed by law. I agree with that to some extent. But do hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite, whose profession has battered and fattened upon property, who are the children and who should be the champions of property—do they really wish to destroy the idea of private property in land in this country? What is that idea of private property? It is that established expectation—that certainty of power—based upon the law of the country, which prompts a man to enclose a field, and to give himself to its cultivation in the distant hope of the harvest. Destroy that expectation, diminish that certainty, and your complex society tumbles to pieces like a house of cards. Sir, this legislation may appear to some to be progressive and enlightened. It strikes me as a remarkable piece of political atavism. To the principle of private property in land we owe what is admitted to be the most marvellous achievement of modern times—namely, the cultivation mainly of that modern Continent of North America. But the legislation embodied in this Bill strikes me as a curiously applied determination to employ the machinery of the 19th century to introduce into this country the barbarous economy of Russia or a Hindoo village community. Not very long ago, Mr. Speaker, Sir Charles Dilke recommended the rising generation of Radicals to read their Bentham. There is no man better qualified to guide the rising Radicals than he, and I wish they would take his advice. I do so, and I will give the hon. Gentleman opposite a concluding quotation from Bentham's Principles of the Civil Code. He says—

“With respect to property, security consists in no shock or derangement being given to the expectation, which has been founded on the laws, of enjoying a certain portion of good. The legislator owes the greatest respect to these expectations to which he has given birth. When he does not interfere with them, he does all that is essential to the happiness of society; when he injures them, he always produces a proportionate sum of evil.”

Mr. Speaker, I trust that this House will reject, as it has always rejected, these proposals to legalise confiscation. I hope this House will, by an overwhelming and decisive majority, reject the proposals of this Bill, which is really one of the coolest and most impudent attacks upon the security of property which I think has ever been submitted to the Legislature of a civilised country. I now beg to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

*(1.48.) MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.): I rise to second the Motion of the hon. Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) that this Bill be read a second time this day six months. The hon. Member said that he should have regarded the Bill as a joke had it been brought forward by any other gentlemen than the hon. and learned Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane) and the hon. and learned Member for East Fife (Mr. Asquith); but I regard it as a joke, and chiefly because these hon. Members have brought it forward. The ability, eloquence, and power of the two hon. and learned Members are admitted, but they themselves know that they are not regarded generally as having much power of joking; and therefore, I think, they wished to prove by this Bill that they had as much ability in the direction of joking as in any other direction. The matter of compulsory sale has many advocates in Ireland; but even the most advanced advocate of that theory in Ireland whom I have ever met has never had the audacity to advocate that a law should be made compelling landlords to sell in cases where the tenants wished to buy, unless the same law compelled the tenants to buy where the landlords wished to sell; yet this Bill compels the landlords to sell, and leaves the County Council perfectly free, to buy or not as it may wish. Indeed, the principle is that the County Council ought not to buy where there is any risk; they shall buy only where the gain to them is immediate and certain, and the loss to the landlords or owners equally certain. I thought that some parts of Ireland led the way in the desire to rob landlords; but here is a Bill that goes beyond anything that any Irish land reformer has ever dreamed of, and beyond anything of which any man has ever dreamed; and really, in certain respects, this Bill goes further than the wildest theories of Mr. Henry George. But my hon. Friend who moved the rejection of this Bill said that it never could be for the advantage of the inhabitants to apply its proposals, because security of property was for the general good. I think my hon. Friend is partly right and partly wrong—right if he looks away into the future, and to the general unsettlement and insecurity which would arise; but wrong if he looks merely at the near present, because, if there are in a given area thirty thousand people, and if thirty of those are the ground landlords, it will, undoubtedly, be a present advantage to the twenty-nine thousand nine hundred and seventy that the thirty shall be robbed, and the proceeds distributed among the others; therefore, robbery is present gain to those who share the plunder, but future loss to the whole community by unsettling the rights of property, and of all kinds of property, should the principle of this Bill be fully extended. The hon. and learned Member for Haddington had the greatest difficulty in keeping from laughing while he was moving this Bill, and his Radical friends around him certainly seemed to be greatly amused. The audacity of the proposal was so boundless that no one could really treat it seriously. The Mover of the Bill said that land stood on a different footing from other property, but that I entirely fail to see. Where is the real difference between what may be called unearned increment in the case of land and in the case of a newspaper, a bank, the goodwill of a business, and especially of the business of a solicitor or a doctor, and, indeed, of almost all kinds of business adventure which grow with the growth of a locality? Take the case of a newspaper. A man purchases some land with or without houses on it, in a growing town, and, at the same time, and for exactly the same amount, he purchases a newspaper in that town. Well, in 20 years the town has doubled in population and in prosperity, and at the end of the 20 years the purchaser wishes to sell both the land and the newspaper. He will in all probability have a larger profit on the sale of the newspaper than on the sale of the land. All the time, during the 20 years, he has lain out of both the capital which he invested in the land and the capital he invested in the newspaper. He has, during the whole time, paid the outgoings of both—namely, the rent and taxes and other expenses regarding the land, and he has taken the profits, whatever they may have been; and in like manner he has paid the running expenses of the newspaper, which he has employed others to work for him, and has taken the annual profits therefrom. He has expended neither time nor personal labour, to any great extent, on either the land or the newspaper, and, in proportion to the capital expended, and the current expenses, his profits during the 20 years have been as great, or greater, from the newspaper than from the land. I want to know, in what single particular the two cases differ? The increase in value of the land and the increase in value of the newspaper have arisen from exactly the same cause—namely, the growth and improvement of the town or district. Does not exactly the same thing apply to a solicitor's practice? Two solicitors of equal ability start in two towns. The one town progresses, and so does the solicitor's practice. The other town goes back, and so does the solicitor's practice. There is no business I can imagine in which there is not what I may call unearned increment; that is to say, an increase in the value of the business which is solely dependent on the growth and improvement of the locality in which that business happens to be situated. It may be said that the people cannot live without land, but equally little can they live in this age without many of the businesses that grow with the growth of towns. But, if this Bill passes, who will purchase land, especially in towns? Will any man put one penny of capital into land when if it falls in value he loses, and if it increases in value he makes no profit whatever? Nay, more—his land will not be taken even at the price he paid for it. He may buy land at a certain price, and five years later it falls one-third in value. Then the County Council gets it valued when its value is at its lowest; then fifteen years later the land may be worth double the price paid for it, and then the County Council takes it, not at cost price, but actually at the lowest figure it reached in twenty years. That this would be so is clear; for a County Council must do its duty in a business-like manner, and it would not be business-like to value the land at the date when the owner buys it, except where there was an absolute certainty of constant increase in value—and that occurs in very few places. The County Council must be prudent. It must be business-like; it must wait for the lowest moment to value, otherwise it will not be doing its best for its electors. It is difficult to argue seriously about this Bill. It surely must be a joke. If it is good in principle, the principle must apply to all businesses in which an unearned increment is possible, and that I have shown is possible in any business I can imagine, as so much depends on the good fortune of placing the business in a growing locality. If this Bill undertook in any way, however slight, to compensate for loss, then I could see some reason in it. If it valued the property, and then gave the owner the option of forcing the County Council to take it in case it fell in value, there would be some shadow of reason for the Bill; but, as the Bill stands, no legislation like it has been attempted in the civilised world. But I think this Bill has a political tendency. Its promoter several times spoke of the electors, and of the extension of the franchise. Therefore, his idea seems to be that his Bill, looking like an attempt to rob the great landowners for the good of the people, will be so popular with the middle and lower classes. But in this respect it will fail if the facts are put before the people, for this Bill applies to the property of small owners as well as of large owners; and I find that while the gross rental of the large owners in the United Kingdom, who own each above one thousand acres, is 37 millions sterling, the gross rental of those owners, whose property is less than 20 acres, is 43 millions sterling. Thus it is the small owners who will be hit hardest by this Bill, firstly because they own a greater quantity of the land of this country than the large owners do; and, secondly, because, in the case of large owners, probably only a portion of the property of any given owner will be taken; whereas in the case of the small owners, if the property of any man is taken, it will probably be his whole property that will be taken. But let me show how entirely it would stop enterprise if the principle of this Bill were applied generally to all property, as I hold it must be if it is applied to land: let me take the case of a tramway in a new district. The County Councils say that at some future time they may probably take over all tramways; therefore a tramway is an appropriate illustration. A company makes a tramway towards a new suburb. At first the tramway will pay very little, but the Company makes it, knowing that as the district is growing, the tramway will pay well in the future. But suppose the County Council have power to value the tramway in the first year of its existence, with a view to taking it over at that valuation if it became a really paying concern, what Company will, under such a state of the law, ever make a tramway in a new suburb? Therefore in its earlier stages a new district will be deprived of any chance of having a tramway. Why, the more this Bill is looked at the more foolish it appears. But the hon. and learned Gentleman made a long speech, and he did not spend five minutes of it in dealing with the Bill. He only dealt with general principles. He was afraid to face his own Bill. The Bill appears to give to the Local Government Board a right, if it thinks fit, to refuse to consent to the County Council valuing any given land—but really the Local Government Board cannot withhold its consent, for the Bill, says the Board is only to withhold its consent where it appears that taking the land or having it valued would not be for the good of the inhabitants; and such a thing would never appear. How can it ever be for my disadvantage to have another man's land valued and power given to me to take that land if it rises in value, and to leave it alone if it does not so rise? In fact, I think it would be possible, if this Bill were passed, that the inhabitants of a district could mandamus a County Council to compel it to value all the land in the county and register the same with a view to its being taken in future in case it increased in value. But the hon. and learned Gentleman tries to put a gloss on the really terrible part of the Bill—namely, the part allowing a County Council to value land and then, at some future time to take the land, not at the market value at the time of taking, but at the market value at the time of valuation. He says, “Oh no; my Bill says, take the land at the market value at the time of taking, minus the unearned increment accruing since the date of valuation.” Where is the difference between this and taking the land at the value at the time of valuation? It is exactly the same thing, but the hon. and learned Gentleman shies at boldly saying, “Land shall be purchased compulsorily at a price perhaps only half the market value.” This is what his Bill says really, though he does not venture to say so much. But this Bill, though brought in by two Scotch Members, says that it shall not apply to Scotland or Ireland.

MR. HALDANE: There is another Bill before the House to apply the provisions to Scotland, but it was decided that the two countries should not be included in one Bill because the machinery was necessarily different in the two cases. Substantially, however, the Bills are the same.

MR. RENTOUL: Oh, very well. I wonder how the Scotch people will like it! But this Bill does not apply to Ireland. Is this another injustice to Ireland? But it is needless to say more. It is difficult to discuss the Bill seriously. It is only backed by one English Member. (Cries of “Three.”) Well, it is the production, the sole production, of two Scotch Members. They may deal with Scotland as they like, but better leave English Members to begin this new scheme in England. I am sure the Bill will be rejected by a great majority.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. Baumann.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

(2.27.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I regret that my hon. Friends who oppose this Bill are not present, as I should like to have made some remarks on their speeches.

They dealt with the Bill as a good joke, and, apparently, thought it better to treat it as a joke rather than to bring any serious arguments against it. They did not advance any very serious arguments against the proposal of my hon. Friend. There is no doubt that proposal is a very considerable new departure in regard to land legislation, but the reason for that is, that there is a growing feeling that the true mode of dealing with land legislation is to municipalise it rather than to increase the number of proprietors. The reason why this matter has made greater progress of late is twofold. First, that the present system accentuates year by year the injustice that the community should sow and the individual reap; and, secondly, we have in existence powerful representative Local Bodies into whose hands we can safely put these questions. The whole argument of the hon. Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) was, as far as I can judge, a question of property; he based the whole matter on the question of security of property, and said that the Bill would break down the whole fabric of society. It struck me that what the hon. Member was really more afraid of was the giving of further powers to the London County Council. The hon. Member never speaks in this House without taking the opportunity of saying something harsh, and in most cases, I think, unjust, about that great body, and I think that hon. Members on that side of the House seem to think that these public authorities being created, the powers which were originally given them ought to remain with them, that they ought to attend to, and deal with, our drains, and do nothing further; but I am glad to think that they have created what they themselves think is somewhat a monster, and that monster I hope will swallow up a great many of the duties which are at present performed by this House. The two hon. Members used very strong words and somewhat poor jokes in reference to this Bill. If the Bill be as bad as they represented it to be, it appears to me that their speeches in reply were singularly weak. Their great argument so far as I can judge was this—that if we deal with land in this direction and under these circumstances, we ought also to deal with all other forms of property. I have myself no particular objection to dealing with other forms of property as well; if the hon. Members will show us the way in which that legislation can be carried out. But I think my hon. Friend the mover of this Bill pointed out the very essential difference between dealing with land and dealing with other forms of property; because, as he pointed out, the land is limited in extent, it is at the bottom of all productions in this country, and it is really a monopoly which no other form of property can possibly be, and further—and I think this is an important point—while it is quite within the competency of our Local Authorities to deal with the question of the land, it is not by any means within their power to acquire great businesses and to carry them on for the benefit of the community. As regards the general question put forward by the two hon. Members who have spoken, as I understood the hon. Member for Peckham—who I am glad to see has returned to his place—he did not seem to understand this question of the unearned increment at all. So far as I can see, he said nothing in regard to what, after all, is the pith and marrow of the Bill of my hon. Friend, in regard to what we consider the injustice of the present situation. He made a few jokes—I am bound to say a few excellent jokes—but he did not deal with what we believe to be the present position in regard to the question of the unearned increment. It is a difficult thing to define the unearned increment. Every one can define it in a way. For myself my definition of it is this: that it is the value of the land, apart from its ordinary agricultural productive process, and apart from any capital, outlay or enterprise that may have been put into it by its owner; the value which is created by the existence, by the presence, by the outlay, the enterprise and the energy of the community at large. That is the portion and the value of the land which we desire, if possible, to obtain for the community, and which, at present, is confiscated by certain individuals throughout the country. I desire especially, in speaking in this Debate, to deal with it from a London point of view. I think the London point of view is, after all, the strongest case we have, because the number of owners in London is probably more limited than in any other town. They have a greater monopoly under the leasehold system over land of that kind, the rents are higher, and this unearned increment grows at a greater proportionate rate than probably anywhere else throughout the country. I suppose I may say that probably the agricultural value of the land is something like, or would be about £250,000, whereas the actual value of the land, apart from the value of the buildings, it has been estimated by many competent persons, at the lowest estimate out of a total rateable value of £40,000,000, is something like £15,000,000. That is what we may consider to be the unearned increment in regard to London itself. Everyone knows that it would be superfluous to discuss the question at any length. Everyone knows that the very large increasing annual value of the land of London is due in no sense to the energy or outlay of the owners of that land. It is due partly to the expenditure of the tenants, and partly to the buildings. Hon. Members will remember with regard to the evidence given before the Strand Committee on the betterment question, that there were cases mentioned in which it appeared that the sites had been advertised, with this additional attraction in the advertisement, that the Local Authority were going to make improvements; and that the result of that would be that it would greatly increase the value of the sites. And I suppose that no one will deny that the bulk of this expenditure goes practically into the pockets of the owners; the community at large is what we may call rack-rented for the benefit of those who happen to own the land. My hon. Friend below me when my hon. Friend the Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane) was speaking, seemed to imply that the best way of arriving at the value of the unearned increment for the benefit of the community would be by some form of taxation. In that I very much agree; and this proposal of my hon. Friend is in no sense of the word antagonistic to any proposition to get at this unearned increment by means of taxation. As regards the question of betterment, I may say that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board in his place the other day practically admitted the principle that is contended for by my right hon. Friend, and by hon. Members on this side of the House. He admitted the principle of betterment. The principle of betterment is this, that, where it can be shown that an individual is benefited at the expense of the community, that individual ought to pay a sort of ransom to the community for the benefit which is done him. That is the principle of betterment, as that is the principle which underlies the Bill of my hon. Friend. We were told by hon. Member opposite that there would be great injustice done in regard to this Bill; but as my hon. Friend pointed out there is no proposal in this Bill to take anything from anybody to which he has a just right, and to which he can show a just claim, and I must say that the object of the Bill seems to be one which ought to commend itself to the Liberty and Property Defence League, because it is really in the interests of property that this Bill will be carried through. Then we were told—I think the hon. Member who seconded the Amendment specially dwelt upon this—that, it would discourage enterprise, and the development of estates in London. How would that affect the question of the vacant land? Is there any enterprise or development in regard to these vacant spaces? The whole of their value is the result of the expenditure of the neighbouring inhabitants and out of the rates, and there is no doubt, as regards them, that the effect of the Bill would not affect in any way the question of dealing with them. As regards the owners themselves, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend opposite, the bulk of the improvements in London are not done by the owners, but by the builders, the leaseholders, and the occupiers, and where they are done by the owner they are done, not with the view of unearned increment, but with the view of immediate profit for any outlay they may have undertaken; and practically the bulk of the improvements are done under the leasehold system by builders and by the occupiers, and surely, theoretically, if one were asked, what system would be the most likely to encourage enterprise, and development under any system of land tenure, one would have thought that the leasehold system, which prevails in London, would certainly do that. It is under the leasehold system that, practically, the additional expenditure of the occupier is absorbed by higher rents and higher rates, first by the owner and secondly by the community. But no one would have thought that this would be the greatest possible discouragement to the development of enterprise, seeing that London has developed under it in the most extraordinary way. As regards the question of insecurity, I am bound to say this, that, so far as regards this Bill, we look at the matter more as a question of principle than as a question of detail; and if it were thought that the period of twenty years was too long—and I am inclined myself to think it is somewhat too long—I am quite sure that when the matter was considered, there would be no objection to reduce that length of time. And in regard to the question also of the interference of the Local Government Board as a check over the proceedings of the Local Body, there, again, I am sure, if it can be shown that a further check is necessary, there would be no objection to put in any fair proposal in that respect that might be made. But as regards the general principle of the Bill, we say that where an increase of value is due to the action of the community, there the community ought to be able to intercept that profit. It is mainly where the question of compulsion comes in, that this Bill—the novel portion of it, is in reference to the land valuation and the ultimate purchase of the unearned increment. My hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) said if you give what he called “the call for land” to the County Councils for public improvements, you ought to give it also in reference to tramways. That is exactly what exists under the present system, because in London, only the other day, a case occurred in which the tramway had been built; and in the very Act which enabled the company to build the tramway there was a provision that 20 years afterwards the local authority, if necessary, could buy, not with, but without the unearned increment. So that that is not an argument against, but a very useful precedent in regard to this Bill. The hon. Member for Peckham said if you give these powers to the County Councils, they will certainly deal with them in an unjust way ; and it will probably lead to jobbery and to corruption.

MR. BAUMANN : I did not say anything of the kind.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON : Then I am very glad, and it is not necessary for me to argue that point. There is this further to be said, that as I said just now, I think it very reasonable that a check in the interests of the public should be placed on the action of the Local Body in the use of these powers, and if any hon. Member can show, that further powers ought to be given to some public body to prevent any abuse of these powers we should be content to accept them. But we believe that our great Local Authorities are now so representative and efficient that these extra-additional checks on their proceedings are no longer necessary. The machinery proposed in this Bill is of a very simple and efficient character. The valuation will be done under the ordinary rules of valuation. As my hon. Friend pointed out, there will be no more difficulty in regard to the valuation of these properties than there is in regard to valuation for railways or for any other purpose. All that is required is that, if the Local Authorities desire to buy, a second valuation will be necessary in order to show what outlay has been expended on the land by the owner, and that, plus the first valuation, will be the price the Local Authority will pay to him. We believe that this is, to a certain extent, a middle course between the existing state of things, which is confiscation of the property of the community by a few individuals, and between what goes by the name of nationalisation of land, which is confiscation of the property and outlay of the landlords without compensation. One great advantage of this proposal is that it will not complicate in any sense the questions of contracts, or of individual interests in a particular property, or of the past. It will only apply to the question of the future, and will, to that extent, be very much simpler than any of the proposals with regard to ground rents. We believe it is right that the community at large should be able to intercept the increase of value which belongs to themselves ; and while we do not say that this is a very perfect or far-reaching plan, we believe that it is the first and the best step towards the municipalisation of the land in the interests of the community, and that it will be in the interest not only of the community at large, but also of the property owners themselves.

*(2.54.) MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) : I join with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) in characterising this Bill as one of the most fantastic and irrational proposals that were ever made to Parliament, although I do this from a somewhat different point of view. I claim to be a strong advocate of land law reform ; but I believe this Bill to be reactionary, and to be calculated to arrest the development of our towns, and to put a stop altogether to the improvement of agricultural holdings. I fully accept the doctrine laid down by Mill that the ownership of the land should be subordinate to the general policy of the State, and I differ from hon. Gentlemen opposite who deny that land is essentially different from other kinds of property. I believe myself that from the nature of things, as is admitted by all thinkers and economists, there is a fundamental difference between land and all other kinds of property about which it is not necessary to debate ; and I go further and say that I know from my own experience, municipal and Parliamentary, that there is a large unearned increment due to the growth of the community. I do not think it goes to the extent pointed out by the hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Sydney Buxton). All increment is not unearned, as he seems to imagine. A great deal is earned by the energy and industry of the small tenants and householders who have spent their lives in creating a value which has nothing whatever to do with the movement of population, and by the work of many who have themselves attracted the population, the movement of which is made one of the elements of valuation under this Bill. But with the unearned increment the Bill will not deal. The Bill engages Municipal Bodies in some isolated gambling transactions in land. It does not enable them to take the increased value of the property from time to time. It plunges them in the gambling of Tokenhouse Yard in competition with land companies and with individuals. Sometimes they may make a good shot; more often, as experience points out, they will probably make a bad one. We know that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Haldane), who introduced this Bill, is a very bold and uncompromising legislator. The House will recollect, from its recent experience, that the last measure which came from him was one to render women eligible for the office of Commander-in-Chief. This Bill which he introduces to-day will make it impossible for any person to occupy his home, to carry on his business, or to earn his livelihood without the leave or licence of the Local Authority, the County Council, or the Municipality. From all I have been able to learn, this Bill has a somewhat different origin from that supposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite. It comes, I believe, from a well-known body of "Possibilists," or Progressive Socialists, the Fabian Society, of which I think my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Haldane) is one of the chief priests. (MR. HALDANE: No.) I only know that this Bill is adopted by them, and that they oppose it to the measure of leasehold enfranchisement. My hon. and learned Friend very wisely and skilfully glided over the effective provisions of this Bill, and I wish to draw the attention of the House to the distinction between the objects stated by the hon. Member and the means as interpreted by the clauses. He told us that the land was to be taken, if required, in the interests of the population. There is not a word in the Bill about the community in that sense. He said it was partly done now for public purposes, and I am fully aware that land is taken for public purposes under Private Bills. (AN HON. MEMBER: And by Provisional Orders.) He said it was done in the interests of public health, and I know there are several Public Health Acts, including two for London. Under one of these, the Housing of the Working Classes Act, which contains the best terms ever yet accorded to a Public Body when it is a question of public health, the Local Authority may take land and refuse to pay the owner for the additional value which he derives from keeping it in an insanitary condition, thus trading on the misery of the tenants; and the other Act empowers the Local Authority to put houses into a sanitary condition at the cost of the owner. This Bill absolutely destroys all security of tenure. I should like to know how any person would spend anything on his home, when at any moment for a period of 20 years the County Council may send their officers to purchase and take possession? My hon. and learned Friend knows that the copyholder at one time "could not eat, drink, and sleep securely," and that is the condition to which he seeks to reduce every inhabitant of a corporate town, whose only resort in such a case would be to arbitration for compensation. There is a great deal, after all, in the sentiment of property, but there will be no compensation for the sentiment of "home," and I doubt whether there would be any compensation for the loss of that trade and goodwill which a person may have done a good deal to make, and which has increased the prosperity of the neighbourhood. There is a provision giving compensation for disturbance, but will that cover the case of the tradesman who has not yet reaped the full meed of all his efforts, and whose business may be in a more or less transient condition, although he may have expended large sums with the view to future business? Then I deal further with this question of valuation, and I ask any hon. Member who has had experience of municipal government whether he believes that in fixing the rateable value the Committee that goes round, assisted by experts, is in the habit of defining how much exactly of the rateable value is due to the movement of population. The building is valued as a whole. I admit that some surveyors said in evidence that in their own minds they did separate the land from the buildings, but I never heard any of them say that they attempted to define how much of it was the unearned increment, and how much the increment earned by the efforts of the tenant. But of course that is a practical difficulty which the hon. Member may think he may be able to get rid of by a re-assessment of the whole country. But then let me deal with the absolute improvement. What is the improvement of a house? It may add considerably to its value in the eyes of the owner, but it is very often doubtful whether it adds to its letting value. An artist adds to his house a large studio ; he receives notice from the County Council that he will be turned out. Will he get any compensation for that ? Will they allow him the expense to which he has been put for light, and all the purposes of his calling. They cannot do it under the Bill, and I venture to say that that artist would not receive much satisfaction from the thought that the Municipal Body would receive the reward if they were able to let the house at an enhanced rent to another would-be tenant. It is an adage in law that a man's house is his safest retreat. Under this Bill no man could be safe in the occupation of his house ; and I oppose this Bill most strongly, because I think it should be the aim of all land law reformers to increase security of tenure more and more to identify occupancy with ownership. This Bill does all it is possible to do to render occupancy and tenancy as unstable and as transitory and as uncomfortable as they could be made. The hon. Member objects to our talking of the possibility of jobbery arising under the Bill. I do not wish to use the word "jobbery." But unfortunately in London we do not think ourselves free from the suspicion of jobbery. The London County Council takes every means of avoiding suspicion. This Bill will plunge County Councils in a Serbonian bog of land speculation. It is a question whether land speculation in this country has been profitable. I ask the hon. Member to take the case of the great Land Companies working in and around London. They purchased in the open market land which they felt sure from the conditions of the neighbourhood was likely to considerably rise in value within a short period of time. Some of these companies are in liquidation ; others pay dividends of one or two per cent. Does the hon. Gentleman think it would be to the advantage of Municipal Bodies to embark in such a speculation ? They could not buy under such advantageous conditions as the land companies, because they are forced to buy compulsorily under the Lands Clauses Act. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), giving evidence before the Housing of the Poor Commission said that Birmingham paid thirty-three per cent. over the market value for land, taken for the purpose of municipal improvement. But I daresay the hon. Member would like to hear something of the experience of our own Council in London which has gone in for land speculation in the past, and which has taken a great deal of land abutting on new thoroughfares and likely to increase enormously in value on account of public improvements. I quite admit that the hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Sydney Buxton) was absolutely right when he said there has been a great increment of value on the frontages on account of public expenditure, and therefore it is the more striking to point out that in every case but one there has been an actual loss incurred by the method of recoupment over and above the cost of the work. I have a paper that was handed in to the Strand Betterment Committee, and from it I take the case of Charing Cross Road. Charing Cross Road was a thoroughfare pierced through the slums, and there were new lines on either side which you would have thought would have attracted a different class of buildings and led to the expenditure of capital in building fine houses, and, of course, it made an immense difference to our municipal revenue. As actually carried out the amount of compensation paid was £691,000 ; the amount realised by sale of surplus, £180,000 ; the net cost being £510,000. If only the property actually required to form the street had been taken the amount of compensation would have been £478,000 ; the amount realised by the sale of surplus, £55,000 ; and the net cost £423,000—or a loss of £80,000 by pursuing the method of recoupment and compulsory purchase by the Corporation. In the case of Shaftesbury Avenue, though the figures were not quite so significant, the result was the same. The only case in which the London authorities have reaped any benefit by buying land for the purpose of recoupment when they have made public improvements is the notorious case of Northumberland Avenue, where, the gardens of the Duke of Northumberland being uncovered, there was no compensation to be paid to the multiplication of interests that always arises in the case of buildings. In that case there was a surplus of £130,000. That is the net result that can be set against the 25 great schemes carried out in London by the method of recoupment. The advice of Mr. Charles Harrison, the Chairman of the Finance Committee of the London County Council, is very important from our point of view. He was asked, before the Strand Betterment Committee, whether this had been his experience, and he said—

Mr. Lawson

“A very curious set of results is shown by the table presented. I was alluding to the artisans’ dwellings scheme first. There was a statement of the artisans’ dwellings scheme under the Cross Acts. They give the list there—the amount paid for compensation in the whole of these schemes was one and a half millions in round figures. The other payments were £330,000, so that the gross cost was £1,850,000. The value of the land obtained was £365,000, and the net cost £1,483,000, and the recoupment is given in. The Chairman: Q. I am asking you upon the broad principle of recoupment—do you say that there is no necessity for recoupment because, in the case of land purchased for artisans’ dwellings, which is in no sense a public improvement of thoroughfare, which is simply displacing workmen’s houses and putting other houses upon that site, and which other houses will have a letting value, of course, which is not mentioned here—do you say the principle of recoupment should be abandoned where a street improvement is carried out? A. My own opinion is decidedly that it should. You find the recoupments, as far as we have been able to ascertain them, have invariably brought back a comparatively small sum of money in most of the cases compared with the outlay, and that it has not resulted in a profit. The net result is that the more land you take the more you lose.”

The experience of Liverpool affords another instance of the failure of municipalities to make a satisfactory profit out of their estates. I maintain that the difficulties surrounding Municipal Corporations as landowners are many and insuperable, and I do not wish to see our authorities “jobbing” in land. I think it would be a disastrous failure, even from the financial point of view. If there is unearned increment to be intercepted, let us fall back upon the methods of taxation, upon the division of rates and upon a municipal Death Duty, for example, which will give the locality a certain share in the unearned increment as real estate passes from possessor to possessor. This was Mill’s principle. The Bill is really not a Bill to enable Municipalities to obtain any large portion of the unearned increment. It is a cumbrous and fantastic way of dealing with the subject; it is an attack upon the whole principle of private property in land. I, for one, think it should be the object of all land reformers to put it within the grasp of every class in the community to secure possession of the great immovable land. It is because I feel that this Bill is vicious in principle, and absolutely unworkable, especially with the governmental restrictions inserted by my hon. Friend, that I intend to vote against it this afternoon.

*(3.15.) MR. ASQUITH (Fife, E.): The three hon. Members who have addressed the House in opposition to the Second Reading of this Bill commenced their observations by stating that they looked upon it as a joke; and, under those circumstances, I think they ought to be congratulated on having succeeded, without apparent difficulty, in treating it so seriously and at such great length. It has been refreshing to some of us to hear this afternoon, in these days of Democratic Toryism, from the hon. Member for Peckham and the hon. Member for St. Pancras, the old story about the rights of property, about the dangers and risks of invading them, and about the indefeasible sanctity of any law which happens to exist, even though it places the community at the mercy of individuals, and even though it may be proved to demonstration that the community at large is suffering grievously from what those individuals have done. The hon. Member for Peckham told us that property consisted in an established expectation. An established expectation of what? Apparently, according to the hon. Member, an established expectation that the law will never be changed. But this House has been engaged during the last fifty years in disappointing established expectations of that kind and in doing what the hon. Member and his predecessors, both leaders and rank and file, call legalising confiscation. There has not been a single great measure, from the time of the abolition of the Corn Laws down to the Irish land legislation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, that has not been denounced in exactly the same terms and ridiculed with exactly the same unctiousness as this Bill has been denounced and ridiculed this afternoon. I do not think that some hon. Members have quite realised the scope of this measure. The framers of it have two objects in view, which are perfectly distinct, although they may be combined. The first object is to enlarge the powers of Local Authorities to purchase land in the interest of the people they represent; to restrict the compensation payable to the vendor to such sum as will, at the moment of purchase, represent its market value as between a willing buyer and a willing seller; and to give him, in addition, a complete indemnity against all damage that he can show he has actually sustained. The second object is to enable the community to appropriate for its own purpose, and for the relief of public burdens, that share, and that share only, of the value of land which, after the passing of this Bill, can be shown to accrue, not from the efforts or the exertions of the owner or occupier, but from the growth of the community or from other social causes, and of which at the present time the owner, and the owner alone, reaps the exclusive benefit. Now, let me deal briefly with these two points. In the first place, I say that the object of the Bill is to enlarge the powers of Local Authorities to take land. In every respect I differ from the arguments of the hon. Member for St. Pancras in regard to this part of the case. The Bill, although it takes a step in advance, involves nothing in the nature of a new legislative departure. The President of the Local Government Board knows very well, and most hon. Members must know, that every Urban Sanitary Authority in England has at present the power of acquiring land compulsorily for sewerage and drainage works, for street improvement, for parks and pleasure grounds, for the erection of markets, the construction of baths and washhouses, and a multitude of other subordinate purposes of local interest; and also where a Local Authority has obtained powers from Parliament to supply gas or water, or to construct tramways, for the purposes incidental to such undertakings. Therefore we are not asking the House to initiate a new experiment, but to proceed upon lines which have been established during the last fifty years, and which—differing here, again, from the hon. Member for St. Pancras—I venture to think have been abundantly justified by their success. I challenge contradiction, on evidence supported by instances, to this broad and general proposition which I do not hesitate to assert—that the Municipal Authorities of this country, working as they do in the light of day, responsible to their constituents, subject to searching and sleepless criticism from public opinion, have amply justified the confidence with which the power of acquiring and dealing with land has been entrusted to them; and there is no ground for fear or apprehension that if these powers are enlarged, and the area of operation is extended, they will show themselves more indifferent to the public interest or more susceptible to corrupt influences in the future than in the past. Now, it is perfectly true that this Bill does make a change, for whereas, under the present state of the law, land can only be acquired by Public Authorities for certain specified statutory purposes, this Bill proposes to give to the Local Authority a general power of acquiring land wherever it is necessary in the interest of the people it represents. In our judgment that is a change not only in harmony with past legislation, but it is necessitated by the growing and shifting economic and social conditions of our large towns. Let me give an illustration showing how a Local Authority, if this Bill were passed, could deal with a matter of great urgency with which it cannot now deal. The case I will take is that of a comparatively small but increasing town, which has become the seat of an industry, or has been resorted to for the purposes of pleasure and recreation. The land of the town and its immediate environments belongs to a single person. That person, from good or bad motives, does not wish the town to extend, either because he desires to preserve the amenities of his property, or for other reasons. He says—"I will not let you have the land; or, if I do, it shall be only on my own terms," which may be unreasonable or exorbitant. Instances of this kind have been stated in the House. Now, is the House, with the experience we have had of Municipal Government, to allow private property in land to be carried to such a length that the whole growing life and development of a community is to rest upon the discretion of a single person, who may be wise, but who may be foolish; who may be public-spirited, but who may be altogether unfitted for the discharge of the responsibilities of the position in which he is? There is also another case in which the hon. Member for St. Pancras is interested—the short leasehold system which has done so much injury to London. I did not vote for the Leasehold Enfranchisement Bill which the hon. Member introduced, because I saw no advantage in substituting for a small body of large landowners, who from the fewness of their numbers and the weakness of their position are more or less amenable to public opinion—in substituting for them a large body of small landowners who could deal with the land as they pleased, and who were absolutely unrestrained by any public authority. Now, this Bill will enable the Local Authority to get rid of the system of leasehold tenure in towns where it is injurious. It will enable it to re-sell the land, or let it, or feu it out on reasonable terms, with adequate security of tenure, and subject to proper restrictions. There is one other point I will refer to, and that is the question of compensation. Those who read the Bill will see that the compensation which it gives to the vendor whose land is taken is everything he is entitled to. Apart from the valuation provisions, with which I will deal later, whenever the land is purchased he will get the market value of it at the time of purchase; and he will get, in addition, compensation for disturbance. Further compensation will also be paid for severance. Will then anyone say that the provisions of the Bill do not give everything which the owner is entitled to expect? We all know that Public Authorities are in the habit of purchasing land at extravagant prices. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham has been quoted as having put the excess of purchase money in transactions with which he has been connected in his public capacity at something like thirty or thirty-three per cent. over a fair value. That is a monstrous tax upon the community. It is due to two things. In the first place to the fact that the machinery of compensation is defective, seeing that you have to come to Parliament for a special Act, or even, under the Public Health Act, after the Local Government Board has given its sanction for a Provisional Order. Under this Bill you would do neither. Further, the cost to the community of making these advantageous works of public improvement has been enormously enhanced by the excessive prices you have had to pay in the form of compensation for compulsory purchase to the owner from whom the land has been obtained. Where it is to the interest of the community that the Local Authority should obtain the land, we say that if the Local Authority is prepared to pay the full value with indemnity for loss sustained, that is going quite as far as justice requires. I pass from that to say one or two words as to the other branch of the Bill—the provisions dealing with the unearned increment. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) denied the existence of the unearned increment, or at any rate, if he did not deny its existence, suggested that it existed in exactly the same degree and kind in the case of all other forms of property.

MR. BAUMANN: Hear, hear!

*MR. ASQUITH: I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for St. Pancras says likewise?

MR. LAWSON: I do not.

*MR. ASQUITH: He does not; but since the argument has been advanced, and since it appears to be supported by a considerable amount of opinion on the other side of the House, it may be worth while pointing out its fallacy. The hon. Member for Peckham referred to Consols. He took the case of a person who had bought Consols at 80 or 90, and had seen them rise to 100, which, I suppose, he regards as unearned increment due to the progress of society. ("Hear, hear!") I thought so. What is the difference? The person who buys Consols at 80 has the right to receive the sum of £3 per year, and when they have risen to 100 he has still the right to receive £3 per year, but not one penny more. The only difference that has taken place is this—that an annual return of £3 is worth so many more years' purchase after Consols have risen than before. Yes, but what is the case in relation to land? Why, that not only does the capital value of the landowner's land rise in the number of years' purchase, but that the annual income itself rises. He is able to let his land not for £3, but, say, for £30 per year, and even after he has got that he is able to sell that annual income of £30 at an increased number of years' purchase. Therefore, I say that the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman is not to the point. Then, take the case of industrial companies. The hon. Member says that we are all, as shareholders or as deriving profit in some form, participants in the unearned increment. To some small and indefinable extent, that may be so. But there, again, the hon. Gentleman mistakes, or fails to observe, the fundamental difference between the two cases with which he is dealing. Land differs from every other kind of property, and the owner differs from every other owner in this respect—that land is strictly limited in amount; that the owner possesses a monopoly; that there is no effective competition between him and other vendors of the same commodity, and that, therefore, he is able to demand what is practically a monopoly price. I am speaking of urban land. The case is not similar, I admit, with regard to agricultural land; because, owing to the abolition of protection and the development of the means of communication, we have, practically, a number of alternative sources of supply in relation to food. But when you are dealing with land as a site for human habitation and residence—and particularly land in and about great towns—it remains true, and will always remain true, that the owner of land enjoys a strict monopoly; that there is no alternative supply from which the demand can be met. The more population increases, the greater is the gravitation towards these centres of industry; and he, without raising a finger by way of effort or exertion, without even observing the virtue of abstinence, of which we read in books of political economy, while doing nothing, is exacting from the community that which, in the form of increased value, is neither more nor less than a toll on the progress of the country, and—

• SUSPENSION OF MR. CUNINGHAME
GRAHAM.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) [Interrupting]: Perhaps the hon. Member will explain how shareholders in swindling companies— (“Order!”) Oh, I am not going to be put down. (“Order!” and “Name!”)

Mr. Asquith

It is a matter of no importance to me whether I am named or not.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: What I want to know is, how do swindling shareholders in a company derive their funds? (“Order!” and “Name!”)

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The conduct of the hon. Gentleman is such that I must name him to the House. I name you Mr. Cuninghame Graham.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: All right! I am simply named for standing up for Socialism in this House in the face of a swindling speech endeavouring to draw ridiculous distinctions. That is why I am named.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I beg to move, in the terms of the Standing Order, that the hon. Member be suspended from the service of the House.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Suspend away! (To Sir J. Lubbock, London University, who had spoken to the hon. Member): Oh, leave me alone; I do not care a damn. (“Order!”)

*MR. SPEAKER: The Question is, “That the hon. Member be suspended from the service of the House.”

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That Mr. Cuninghame Graham be suspended from the service of the House. —(Mr. Matthews.)

MR. SPEAKER then directed Mr. Cuninghame Graham to withdraw.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, in withdrawing I wish to apologise for the discourtesy to you; but I wish also to say that I consider I am suspended for standing up for Socialism. I shall be glad to argue that question in the Park with 100,000 men; but this House is a swindle on them.

The hon. Member then withdrew.

Debate resumed.

*MR. ASQUITH: I was endeavouring, when the hon. Member intervened, to point out that there was a substantial distinction between the unearned increment in the case of land and of other forms of property. The increase in value of rateable property in London cannot be accounted for in any other way than by the increase of population. The gross rateable value of property in the Metropolis has risen, in twenty years, from £22,000,000 to nearly £40,000,000 a year; and although it may be true that during the time of that increase many buildings have been erected and street improvements made, nothing which has been done in that way can account for the enormous enhancement in the value of property in the Metropolis. To account for it we have to look to the ever-increasing aggregation of population, which has enabled the landlord to appropriate to himself the increased value he has done little or nothing to create. That being so, the question is, whether the unearned increment is or is not to become the property of the community? We say that it should; hon. Members opposite say that it should not. There a clear issue is raised, and it is upon that issue that the Division upon the Second Reading of this Bill will take place. I will now say one or two words as to the machinery of this Bill, to which so much criticism has been directed. I do not at all agree with my hon. Friend the Member for St. Pancras that the power of valuation given by the Bill, coupled with the power to purchase during the 20 years succeeding the valuation, will create a state of insecurity under which neither owner nor occupier of property will be able to make such use of it as he ought to be able to make in his own interest. My hon. Friend has failed to observe, or, if he has observed, has failed to give weight to the fact, that for everything which is done during the interval elapsing between the period of the valuation and the ultimate purchase, either in the way of improvement or in the way of judicious management, full compensation is to be made. The only thing for which compensation is not to be received is that part of the added value which is due to the progress and the growth of the community. Therefore, it is absurd to say that a man whose land has been valued will be in the least degree prevented from making use of it and developing it by getting tenants to occupy. He will be in exactly as good a position as if a Railway Company were to purchase his land, subject only to a difference in the measure of compensation which this Bill introduces. The fears that are founded upon the uses of that machinery appear, when carefully examined, to be altogether groundless. My hon. Friend has spoken as if the effect of this measure would be to plunge the Local Authorities of the country into land speculation. It will do nothing of the kind. He referred to the experience of the land companies in and about London, which paid very small dividends, and then went into liquidation. Those land societies, so far as I know anything of their operations, are companies which not only speculate in land as a thing to be bought and sold, but lay out and develop the land for their purposes, and sink a considerable amount of capital in these preliminary works, which, if they have mistaken the market, or if the site is unfortunate for the operations, result often in failure and disaster. It will not be in the power of any Local Authority under this Bill to indulge in operations of that kind. All it can do is to purchase land as required for public purposes, to value other land—a value to be confirmed by the Local Government Board—indicating thereby that the land so valued is likely to be required in the interests of the community, and that, therefore, the additional value which will arise in the interval from the growth of the community will belong, not to the owner, but to the community. Those are the proposals of the Bill. They do not in the least degree militate against any other plan which may be proposed for what I may call tapping the unearned increment; but they will have the effect of securing to the community that which is part of its own patrimony, that which is now diverted into other hands and to other purposes, that which the community creates, but of which it reaps none of the fruit.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): I always understood that the object of a Government was to protect individuals in the enjoyment of their property. For my own part, I am not, like my hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Fife (Mr. Asquith), able to distinguish between individuals and companies, because in my view the happiness and welfare of the community are best maintained by securing the rights and welfare of the individual members of both. My hon. Friend suggests that there is a difference between unearned increment on land and on other property. He took the case of Consols, and attempted to point out the difference. I propose to deal with that portion of his argument. He says the difference in Consols is, that if Consols bought at 80 rose to 100, the holder would only get the £3 per year—that there would be no difference in the income. But where do you get the £100 for that which has cost £80? He has admitted that the cause is the increase in capital value. He says, too, that you get an increase in the value of the land. Why? Because the capital value of the land has increased. Therefore in both cases the increment arises from an increase in the capital value. The same point arises with reference to industrial undertakings. In each case the increment depends upon circumstances which are altogether beyond the control of the owner. The truth is that money is the representative of all kinds of property, whether it be land or anything else, and that contention can have no better test than the ease with which money can be converted into land and land into money. This Bill has been discussed as if it were a mere question affecting the owners of the land, but it is not so at all. One of its principal points has reference to the ratepayers, because it empowers the County Councils to take any land they may think proper. Under this Bill the County Council would have power to take any property they wished. But where are they to get the money from? I know of no powers under the Local Government Act of 1888 for raising money for such purposes as this, either from borrowing, or from the rates. But I do not lay much stress on that point, because the Bill might be amended in that respect in Committee. What about the ratepayers? Are we to allow County Councils, by dabbling in land speculation, to increase the rates that had to be paid by those who elect them? Surely the people of this country are taxed enough now, and it is not right that they should be exposed to the risk of increased taxation to enable County Councils to indulge in fantastic schemes such as are suggested by this Bill. The

Mr. Ambrose

Councils will have to pay the full market value of the land, and they may have to bear the expense of assessing the value, which will largely add to the price. And suppose the County Council make a mistake; if, instead of improving in value the land deteriorated, who is to bear the loss? I suppose it is to fall on the ratepayers. Mr. Speaker, it is no part of the duty of Government to make speculations of profit and loss, with a possible loss that may fall on the ratepayers. A ratepayer pays his rates to maintain the necessary authority for doing the work of the parish or district, and there is no obligation upon him to find money to enable the County Council or any other Local Authority to indulge in schemes of this kind. I contend that the principle of this Bill is entirely new, and that no analogous case has been quoted as a precedent. If anyone could make out a case for the Bill, I am sure the hon. Member for Fife (Mr. Asquith) could, but he has been unable to do so. The hon. Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane) started with the case of Lord Cairns' Bill for the amendment of the law relating to settled land, but under that Bill the rights of the remainder-man had to be preserved, either in money or land. The other case quoted by my hon. Friend is that of railways. But in the case of railways, the necessity for the land proposed to be acquired compulsorily has to be proved before a Committee of the House of Commons. A specific case has to be made out, and upon that the House gives the necessary authority. Again, in taking powers for the construction of artisans' dwellings, proof has to be given of a distinct neglect of duty on the part of the property owner; and in all cases where land is taken for drainage and other purposes, under the Sanitary Laws, application has to be made to Parliament for a Provisional Order. I contend, therefore, that my hon. Friend is in error when he says there is a precedent for the principle contained in this Bill. But the worst part of the Bill seems to be that which deals with the question of the land-charge. Let hon. Members consider for a moment what will be the effect of having a land-charge registered against any particular property, under any circumstances. Why, Sir, it will be putting a dead hand upon the property, and sacrificing it, at all events, for 20 years. How could the owner deal with it? If he wanted to sell it he might get less—certainly not more—than the price fixed upon it by the County Council, and in addition to that his power of borrowing money on it would be greatly reduced. Supposing the owner wished to develop the property, and incurred considerable expense in making streets and laying down drains, and erecting houses. What then? “Oh,” say my hon. and learned Friends, “he is to be paid for all that. That is to be taken into account when the County Council acts”! But, Mr. Speaker, it may happen that the owner may lay out a great deal of money, and that there may be no unearned increment arising from it. Instead of being successful, the development may be an entire failure. He may lay out the streets and fail to sell the land on either side, or he may erect houses and not be able to let them. In that case the Council may leave the property on his own hands; but if there should be an increase in the value of the land, the Council might come in and claim the result of his improvements as unearned increment. Mr. Speaker, there is a fallacy underlying the whole of this talk about unearned increment. The prospective value—or unearned increment, as it is called—really constitutes a part of the present value, and this is a point well known to every person accustomed to the valuation of land. You never can assess and arrive at the real value of a property unless, and until you take into consideration the possible future of that property, which is the unearned increment some hon. Members opposite have been discussing. Take a foal for example, which has a pedigree, and concerning which great expectations may arise when it shall have grown to maturity. Are you to fix the value of that foal by its capacity as a foal? No one in his senses would think of doing so. You consider what it may do in the future, and in that way the prospective value is taken into account. It is the same in the case of land. Well, if there is one thing we may congratulate ourselves upon, I think it is this: We have heard the hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson), who is great on leasehold enfranchisement, and we have

(Mr. Haldane), who is opposed to leasehold enfranchisement. The Mover of this Bill condemns the scheme of the hon. Member for St. Pancras, and the hon. Member for St. Pancras condemns the scheme of the hon. Member for Haddington. Well, I think we shall agree that both the hon. Members are right in condemning each the scheme of the other. With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I shall have great pleasure in supporting the Motion of the hon. Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann).

*(4.5.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): I rise to support the Second Reading of this Bill upon the grounds which were eloquently and very discreetly stated by the hon. Member for Fife (Mr. Asquith). He so well submitted to the House the strong arguments in favour of the first part of the Bill that I shall not waste time in going over that ground again. But I should be unable to support the Bill if I had not this opportunity of saying that I am opposed to the three or four clauses dealing with unearned increment. As some hon. Members whose names are on the back of this Bill have still to speak, I hope they will give us a satisfactory reply as to whether they are not under a grievous fallacy in regard to the operation of those clauses. I understood the Mover and others to say that, however averse they might be to unearned increment, they are not prepared to meddle with the past. But my point is that they do meddle with the past, because, as the hon. Member who has just sat down has argued, there can be no doubt that in fixing the present value of land an expert valuer takes into consideration its prospective value. The County Council asks what is the value of certain lands. The valuer replies, naming a market price which includes the prospective value; but the County Council then has the option of purchasing immediately, or at the end of five, ten, or 20 years. Well, Sir, for argument's sake I will take a simple case, that of land in the City of London, where, as has been shown, it is rapidly rising in value. For simplicity I will assume that the owner makes no outlay in the meantime. Very well, the land may be valued at the present time at, say, £10,000, and in the course of 20 years it may be worth double that sum. Surely the owner has a just claim to sell at the present valuation. But if the County Council, instead of taking the land as valued or leaving it, can hang it up for 20 years, and the owner goes into the open market to dispose of it, I say he can no longer get £10,000 for it, because it has been deprived of part of its prospective, and, therefore, of its present value. I think that is an inconsistency in the Bill, and I challenge hon. Members supporting it to say whether they do or do not intend it to interfere with unearned increment already accrued. My hon. Friend the Member for Poplar says there is no proposal in the Bill to take anything from anybody to which he has a just claim. Well, I contend that if the County Council wishes to buy land, the owner has a just claim to the increment already accrued, yet these clauses would take it from him. I distinguish, however, broadly between unearned increment and betterment. I do not know how far the right hon. Gentleman opposite has committed himself to that principle, but I think it is a fair one if properly defined. If Public Bodies expend public funds on improvements, which will be greatly for the good of private persons, I think it should be arranged so that a portion of the cost falls, say, by way of a special rate, upon those who are thus benefited. But that is altogether a different case from that of unearned increment. I will not detain the House longer, but I hope that hon. Members who are supporting this Bill, will explain whether they do, or do not, propose to interfere with the increment already accrued.

(4.10.) SIR G. RUSSELL (Berks, Wokingham): The hon. Member who has just sat down was apparently prepared to support the outside of the Bill but not the inside, but as the inside is virtually the whole of the Bill I really do not see how he can support any part of it. Not a few hon. Members have been disposed to treat this Bill as a joke, and I am not surprised at that; but I must say that it appears to me not only to be a joke, but a very bad joke, and I should almost be disposed to consider it a practical joke if there were anything practical in the Bill at all. The hon. Member for Peckham told me last night for the first time of the existence of this Bill, and when he told me what were its provisions, I was unwilling to believe that he had arrived at a correct estimate of them. I have now, however, satisfied myself that he was correct, and having done so, I looked to see who were the Gentlemen who were interested in this extraordinary Measure. I find that they consist of three Scotch Members, two philosophers, and one English County Member. As regards the three Scotch Members, I would remark that the only sensible clause in the whole Bill provides that it shall not extend to Scotland. As regards the two philosophers, I will content myself with saying that England never has been, and I am perfectly confident never will be, led by philosophers. With respect to Sir Edward Grey, I have the greatest respect for him as bearing a name honoured in this House and in this country, and I can only imagine that being the Member for Berwick, which is so near Scotland, he believed, when he put his name at the back of this Bill, that he was a Scotch Member. We have heard a great deal this afternoon with respect to the operation of this Bill in urban districts, and I, as a County Member, should like to say something with respect to its effect in the counties. As a matter of fact, under this Bill the whole of England could be scheduled, and if land were hung up in the manner that is suggested, no landlord would expend a shilling on the property so hung up, no tenant would dream of renting such land, and anything more disastrous to the productivity of the land of this country, if this measure became operative, I cannot imagine or conceive. There is one portion of this Bill which hon. Members seem disposed to glide over as if they do not like it. The hon. Member for Fife (Mr. Asquith) gave a sort of veneering aspect of seriousness to this preposterous and ridiculous measure; but I should like to ask him, as a practical question, how he would like some Society, like the Incorporated Law Society, to have power to-morrow to value his practice with a view to purchasing it, at that price, at any time within the next twenty years. How would he like to have his income fixed at its present rate by Act of Parliament for the next twenty years? I expect he would not like it at all. And we do not like it, and on that ground we intend to fight against this measure. The great inducement which is held out to hon. Members on the other side to support this measure is that it introduces their pet and favourite principle of compulsion. Nothing will go down now with them but compulsion. They will not let me be sober of my own free will and choice; I am to be sober by Act of Parliament. They will not let me sell my land of my own free will and choice; I must sell it by Act of Parliament. They will not let me work as many hours in the day as I please; I must have my hours limited by Act of Parliament. In the whole range of public questions I only know of one on which the new fashioned Radical has adhered to the old principles of liberty and freedom, and that is the one single question in which compulsion ought to be applied—the vaccination question. I will give them the credit that they do remain free traders in small pox. But with that one isolated exception they introduce compulsion into everything, and it has found its way into this ridiculous measure which has been introduced to-day. It has been said that this measure is a joke. I should like to hear the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) in his most jocular spirit dealing with this measure. It would be a real treat. He would make it a hundred thousand times more ridiculous than I can make it appear, and he would possibly make it appear even more ridiculous than it is. I hope it will be rejected by a large majority, for it is a measure which deserves to be kicked out with ignominy and contempt.

(4.20.) SIR E. GREY (Northumberland, Berwick): I am perfectly willing to admit that it is a failing on the part of any person who is unable to see a joke where one exists, and I honestly admit that I do not see a joke in this case. But I think there is one thing worse than failing to see a joke, and that is seeing a joke in a serious matter. Opposition has come to this Bill from several quarters. It has been complained that my hon. and learned Friend who introduced the Bill (Mr. Haldane) dealt too much with general principles. I am glad he did, because it has brought out clearly the fact that the great difference between us and hon. Members on the other side of the House is on general principles. They maintain that the land is to be treated just like any other commodity, and they maintain that the unearned increment is to go into the pockets of private individuals. I think that is not an unfair construction to put on the argument of the hon. Gentleman who moved the rejection of the measure. At a time like this, when the great question which is agitating the popular mind is that of the condition and profits of the ownership of land and the general distribution of wealth, it is impossible that the question of the land can do otherwise than receive its full share of attention. It is as important as capital, and is discussed enough in connection with the profits arising from it. It is as necessary to industry, and it is fixed, and thus offers facilities for treatment in a way that capital does not. It is limited in quantity, and comes under a category which this House has always considered worthy of special treatment. The Member for East Down (Mr. Rentoul) seems to think that land is like goods in a shop window, which can be increased at pleasure. If the hon. Member has not got beyond that point of view, it is not possible for him to understand the reasons that have induced us to bring forward this Bill.

MR. RENTOUL: The hon. Member says I referred to the goods in a shop window. I said nothing of the kind. I referred to a newspaper, or to the practice of a solicitor or a doctor in a growing town.

SIR E. GREY: I will take the case as the hon. Member puts it now, and speak of a newspaper in a growing town. In a town where land is rising in value, and a newspaper is rising in value, the increase in value does not necessarily arise from the same cause. The land may have been lying idle for years. It may be a rubbish heap, and no money have been spent on it, and yet, because of surrounding conditions, the land may have increased in money value. But the newspaper if it has risen in value, however greatly the population of the town has increased, must have had expended on it industry and ability, and that is the difference between the two cases. The hon. Member asked also where was the demand for this Bill. I believe he is in the habit of addressing popular audiences, and I cannot understand how it can have escaped his attention that nothing excites more interest with popular audiences than the question of land reform. There is a great desire for it, and it is as wide-spread as any feeling can be. Many schemes of land reform are brought forward, and it is not enough for us to content ourselves with criticising schemes for land nationalisation, and with saying that many of these schemes are crude, unworkable, and unjust. It is our business to bring forward better considered, more matured, and more equitable measures. The business of Members of Parliament is not to wait till a popular demand has arisen for some particular Bill, but to recognise the difficulty which the public mind feels in dealing with such measures, to elucidate and elaborate the details, and put them into practical and workable form. That is why this Bill has been brought before the House. The second principle contained in this Bill is that we wish to extend the public ownership of land. I quite admit that private ownership of land has served many useful purposes. But the most useful purpose is that it develops energy and enterprise in the cultivation of the soil perhaps better than public ownership can do. But the land has ceased to be wanted solely for agricultural purposes, and it is when it is wanted for purposes other than agriculture that this Bill will come into operation. The hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) seems to regard Public Bodies as in some way hostile to the community at large, and intimated his belief that they were the worst owners of land that could exist.

MR. LAWSON: I did not say so.

SIR E. GREY: I understood him to say that public ownership of land, so far as it had been tried, was unfortunate, and I read somewhere the other day a remark of his that Corporations were about the worst owners of land it is possible to find. I think we ought not to be guided entirely by the experience of the past. Local Authorities are developing in life and energy every day, and public opinion is developing and paying more and more attention to the action of the Local Authorities and founding greater hopes and expectations on the work of the Local Authorities. I do not mean the public feeling of the moment, but that steady and continuous feeling which is turning more in the direction of the Local Authorities. Look, for instance, at the election for the London County Council the other day, when a large Progressive majority was returned. What did that mean? We are told that many persons who are by affinity and for Party purposes Conservatives, and who are prepared to vote for Conservative Members at a Parliamentary election, had yet voted for Progressive members of the County Council. That means that they have overcome their natural affinity, because they are interested in the scope of their own Local Authority, and that that Local Authority has attracted to itself men of enterprise and ability, who possess the confidence of the community. Surely this is the time when we ought to give Local Authorities more power, and I maintain that this Bill will place in their hands a power which will stimulate public interest in their work; and it also provides an opportunity the best calculated to draw out the interest, the energy, and the ability of the members of those bodies. And there is no other way. We cannot progress in any other way except through the Local Authorities. There are people, of whom I think the hon. Member for Peckham is one, who say that the unearned increment should go into the pockets of private owners. The hon. Member has used such strong language in denouncing this Bill that I do not know how he will be able to denounce any future Bill which may be introduced for taking not only the future, but the present, property of persons without compensation. The point of view of the hon. Member, as I understand it, is that a certain favoured class is to be entitled not only to what they have earned, but to a great deal that they have not earned by their own exertions or capital, and land is to be maintained at monopoly prices. We are also opposed on the ground that the unearned increment of land is not different to that of other commodities in which it is difficult to distinguish it from other increased value. Even if we admitted that, I should contend that the unearned increment of land can, to some extent, be distinguished, and the fact that we cannot get all unearned increment is no reason why we should not get that which can be so distinguished. Some hon.

Sir E. Grey

Members oppose this Bill because they have plans of their own which they prefer for dealing with land reform. The hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) has a Leasehold Enfranchisement Bill which he prefers, but I utterly fail to understand his position. He said he was in favour of acquiring the unearned increment of land; but surely there is opposition enough to that principle, without the hon. Member proposing to increase manifold the number of persons resisting our efforts to get the unearned increment for the State. The Bill before us is not perfect or complete, as it will only acquire the unearned increment of the land which the Local Authority has had valued, so that one owner may be valued and have to pay, and be side by side with another who is not valued and is getting the increment; but the good fortune of the one man is no reason why justice should not be done in the case of the other. To meet the case we might invoke the powers of the Bill of the hon. Member for St. Pancras for special rating. This Bill is put forward as an instalment. I wish to deal with the alleged injustice in the Bill. The hon. Member for Perth (Mr. C. S. Parker) put the case very clearly when he said that the Bill might lower the speculative value of land, as in valuing for the purposes of the Local Authority the prospective value will not be taken into account, and the Local Authority will be able to purchase at a price which does not include the prospective value of the land. I think the Bill will have a tendency to lower the speculative value of land, but will not touch its agricultural value or the increased value due to the expenditure of capital and labour upon it. The answer to the charge that injustice will be done in that respect is that the value which will be lowered is purely speculative, always has been, and will always remain, open to risk. There have been many schemes for obtaining this unearned increment; the principle of betterment is one; John Stuart Mill proposed another; and from that time everybody has been bound to run the risk of Parliament adopting one of the numerous plans, and thus interfering with the speculative value of land. We believe that in giving the Local Authorities power to value the unearned increment we are asserting the right of the community to that which is its own, which it has always been entitled to, but which it has, for want of knowledge of its powers, or from laziness, not claimed hitherto. As to the argument that the unearned increment will be taken from the owners, and the undeserved detriment fall entirely on them, I believe that future buyers will buy land with their eyes open to the risks they run, and they will take account of them in the price they pay. When we consider how vast the unearned increment has been, and what a difference it would have made if the public had acquired it years ago in relieving the pressure of rates and in the amount of money available for public purposes, I am inclined to defend the generosity of the Bill in being so little retrospective rather than to defend it from the charge of injustice. We contend that land is a monopoly, and that the State has a right to limit the conditions under which it is held. In the case of a Railway Company, the profits are affected by the limits placed on the rates which the company can charge; but if the company fails through a change by depopulation in the character of the district through which it runs, the country does nothing to compensate it. If profits are made in trade the income is taxed; but if there is no profit in consequence of bad trade, the State pays no compensation for the loss. I claim for the Bill that it is one advisable in the public interest, and that it has proper regard for private interests. It is an experimental Bill, which will enable the Local Authorities to advance on right lines—the lines of experience. They will be called upon to run no risks, nor will they be called upon to buy land until it is rising in value. Yes; I am using that argument against the hon. Member for St. Pancras, who has spoken of the risk the Local Authorities would be called upon to run if the Bill were passed. The Bill has a third merit—it is capable of progressive application. It can be extended from town districts to county districts; in fact, there is nothing in it to prevent its immediate application to country districts. The President of the Board of Agriculture complains of the hardship of men wanting allotments having to pay three or four times the price paid by a neighbour who has a larger holding; he might find some method of extending the Bill to remedy that injustice. Hon. Gentlemen opposite may admit some of our arguments, but I do not expect they will admit the conclusions we draw from them. We who consider ourselves the guardians of the Public Purse are bound either to accept this Bill, as it is, to improve it, or to reject it in favour of a more complete measure, which is not at present forthcoming. It is said that public opinion does not call for it. It is our business to rouse public opinion to a proper sense of its own rights. When hon. Members talk about justice in connection with this Bill, what they call justice does not deserve the name, because they look at it from the point of view of the individual and monopolist. In talking about justice between man and man, you must take the view of both, and draw the line fairly between the two. So in this Bill you are bound to occupy the position of both the individual and the State which is interested in the rising value of land. Hon. Members opposite only look at the question from the point of view of the owners of land, and it is not possible for them to decide equitably where the line of justice lies. The Bill takes a larger and fairer point of view; it proceeds on principles, sound and just, which will, sooner or later, commend themselves to the larger body of people in the country, and on these grounds I have endeavoured to defend and justify it; and I hope to see it, or some measure of the same kind, passed in the not very remote future.

*(4.43.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The hon. Baronet has made a very able speech in favour of this Bill, but I was very much astonished at one of the reasons he gave for considering that it was a fair and generous Bill. He pointed out, in answering another objection to the Bill, what a commendable feature it was that it did not compel County Councils to buy land until it is increasing in value. That may be very generous from the County Council point of view, but it is hardly generous to the landowner. I will deal with one or two others of the hon. Baronet's arguments later on. I would like to say, first, that there is hardly a Member who has supported the Bill in its entirety. Some hon. Members have supported one portion and condemned another; some have endeavoured to pin the House to the question of principle and have asked it to altogether disregard the question of details. One hon. Gentleman said that the Division to-day will not be on the question of the details of the Bill, but on the question of whether or not the community is to obtain a share of the unearned increment of land. I can very well understand, looking at the details of the Bill, that hon. Gentlemen who desire to support the Bill are extremely anxious to pin the House to its principle rather than to its details. But I would suggest for the consideration of the House whether, when it is proposed in a Bill to alter so fundamentally the existing law of the land, it ought not to be shown by the authors of the Measure how it can be done, and that it can be done without manifest injustice. That is the great difference between a Resolution and a Bill. One of the many objections taken to a Resolution is that it commits the House to the assertion of a principle which it may be impossible to carry out in detail. But if you ask the House to insert in a Bill a novel principle, you ought to show how it is to be carried out. I shall have to allude to some of the details of the Bill which I do not think are defended in their entirety by any hon. Member. The hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Sydney Buxton), who is as thorough-going a supporter of land reform legislation as anybody, asked the House to confine itself to the principle, and said he did not care much about the details, but was prepared to amend or cut them about in any way the House thought fit. The Bill consists of two parts—one part gives compulsory powers to Local Authorities to purchase land and facilitate its purchase; and the other part deals with what is understood by the term unearned increment in the value of land. In regard to the first part of the Bill, the hon. and learned Gentleman who brought forward the Bill spoke of the difficulties Local Authorities have in obtaining the land they require in consequence of the existing state of the law. He spoke in an extremely general way, and gave no illustration of the kind of difficulty in which Local Authorities found themselves. So far as I am concerned, having some knowledge of the subject, I say without hesitation that no difficulty of any moment exists at the present time in enabling Local Authorities to obtain land for all the various purposes for which they have statutory powers. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, I think it was, completely answered the hon. and learned Gentleman who proposed this Bill with regard to that. The hon. and learned Member enumerated a large number of Acts of Parliament connected with the public health, and many other matters in respect to which the Local Authorities have full powers to acquire land. The only cases in which, so far as I remember, the hon. and learned Gentleman said they were restricted were one or two particular ones—he did not specify them—in which some greedy landlord possessed the land outside a town, and thereby interfered largely with the development of the town. That was the only instance he alluded to, and he gave no particulars with regard to it. I have no doubt there may be one or two cases of that kind; but what I venture to say is this—if this Bill were passed it would add enormously to the difficulties of the development of towns, because it is perfectly clear that the landowners who have land in the neighbourhood of a town would be prevented—and effectually prevented—from dealing with their estates in such a way as to relieve the pressure on the town. But there is this further difference between what the hon. and learned Gentleman proposes by this Bill and the existing law with regard to the acquisition of land by Local Authorities. Parliament has laid it down that Local Authorities should only acquire land for the purpose of carrying out the duties which devolve upon them by Statute, and the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman is that they should acquire land—

“Where it appears to any County Council that it is for the interest of the inhabitants of any district within the county” to acquire land. My own view is that this is entirely a novel, and, I think, quite an unjustifiable extension of the powers of Local Authorities. One of the reasons, I take it, why it is that Parliament has restricted Local Authorities in acquiring land to the acquisition of such land as may be required for the purposes of the duties which devolve upon them is to secure that the ratepayers' money should be safeguarded, and that the Local Authority should not embark in land speculation or any other speculation which might be foreign to the powers and the duties that devolve upon them. But I think the proper course to pursue, if the hon. and learned Gentleman believes that there are any duties which ought to be devolved upon Local Authorities which they do not now possess, is to let Parliament consider what these duties should be. I do not pretend to say that Parliament has clothed Local Authorities with all the powers and duties which ought to devolve upon them; but I say that Parliament ought to consider very carefully what additional powers should be conferred upon them, and ought to decide for what purposes the land is to be acquired before it gives to County Councils or Local Authorities such a roving dispensation as that proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. I say it is not for the interest of the community, and certainly it is not for the interest of the ratepayer, that any further powers should be conferred on Local Authorities for embarking in an undertaking which might be foreign to their duties, and might involve speculative enterprises such as, I think, ought not to be encouraged. But there is the further question which has been alluded to by subsequent speakers, by the hon. Baronet who has just sat down, and, I think, by the hon. and learned Member for Fife—namely, that certain conditions which are now imposed on the action of Local Authorities in regard to the compulsory acquisition of land ought to be removed, and that instead of coming to Parliament with the cost attendant upon it, the Local Government Board ought to issue an Order which should not be provisional, as it is now, but an Order that should require no Parliamentary sanction. Well, that is a proposal which requires, and which ought to receive, very careful consideration. The first point to be considered is whether or not the existing conditions are such as entail great expense and a great grievance. I deny that they do. It will be, perhaps, a matter of surprise to hon. Gentlemen who complain about the difficulties which Local Authorities now have to acquire land compulsorily for the purpose of their duties, to know that out of 2,130 Provisional Orders granted by the Local Government Board and their predecessors up to 1890, not more than 105 were petitioned against and referred to Select Committees; and that of those 105, no less than 88 were afterwards confirmed by Parliament. With regard to the inquiries held upon the applications of Local Authorities, the interference of the Local Government Board is very largely regarded as an assistance by such authorities. When works are undertaken with regard to drainage, or water supply, or gas, or matters of that kind, an experienced and professional expert is sent down from the Local Government Board, and he assists very largely by his advice and by his suggestions Local Authorities in dealing with the questions which come before them at that time; and, further than that, the way in which an Inspector is often able to reconcile the various conflicting interests leads to a harmonious settlement of the question hitherto in dispute, and no appeal to Parliament is required. It may be said, "Why not, then, abolish the right of recourse to Parliament?" But I do not think that is a good argument, because the Local Government Board, in dealing with these questions, knows that it has behind it an appeal to Parliament, if it should be considered necessary, and the Local Authorities know also that an appeal to Parliament may be taken; and I think that in all probability this inquiry and negotiation with regard to the acquisition of land by Local Authorities would not be half as well done, would not be half as successful, and would not be half as sound, if Parliamentary interference were done away with. Besides, it is a very strong order to say that we should take away the right of ultimate appeal from a man who might wish to exercise such a right. I do not think that any grievance worthy of the name has been suggested with regard to the existing mode of dealing with applications for the acquisition of land by Local Authorities. I am perfectly ready to admit, however, that several improvements could, perhaps, be introduced in the provisional Order system; and if we were discussing that I should be quite willing to admit that much delay might be saved in connection with these matters by some proposals, or suggestions, or recommendations I should make. But we are not discussing that. Nor is this by any means the most important part of the Bill. There are some hon. Members supporting this Bill who are going to ride off upon this particular part, and ignore, if not condemn, the very much more serious proposals made in the other part. With regard to the other portion of the Bill, so far as I understand, the proposal contained in this Measure has never been approved of by any competent authority upon political economy, nor by any responsible statesman.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Mill.

*MR. RITCHIE: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon—Mill never proposed any such extreme mode of dealing with land as that proposed by the hon. Member in this Bill. What John Stuart Mill proposed was some re-arrangement of taxation and rating.

MR. HALDANE: By taxation for the purpose of acquisition.

*MR. RITCHIE: I thoroughly understand. I well know that several proposals have been made with regard to attacking the unearned increment by means of taxation, and I well understand what John Stuart Mill specially proposed; but never has there been such a monstrous proposal made with regard to this matter as has been placed in this Bill. Certainly, I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), who I am sorry to see has left the House, would never have made any such proposal. I should be glad to ask him, if he was here, whether he adheres to the opinion he expressed on this subject in 1874? Unfortunately the right hon. Gentleman sometimes has a habit of not being present when awkward points are likely to be raised. Perhaps it is only by accident. At any rate, the opinion which he expressed in 1874 was so sound that I do not like to deprive the House of the opportunity of hearing it. He said in Oxford in 1874:—

"I shall not discuss with you the unearned increment of land. That is an idea so illogical so unreasonable, so perfectly unjust, so abso-lately philosophical, that it does not require a refutation. Neither shall I inquire into the nature and origin of property in land. I am content to assume that a man's right to his land depends on the same principle as your right to the coat on your back—namely, that you have paid for it."

I should be very glad to know whether the right hon. Gentleman adheres to that very sound doctrine, which he enunciated in 1874; or whether, with regard to that, as with regard to some other matters, he has changed the coat to which he refers in the speech which he then made? Now, the hon. Member for Poplar, when I was out of the House, I understand, alluded to some remarks I made the other day on the subject of betterment, and asked whether or not, from what I had then said, I had not admitted the principle of this Bill?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: What I said was, I understood that the right hon. Gentleman practically, the other day in Debate, accepted the principle of betterment; and I stated that, in my opinion, the principle in this Bill went no further than the principle of betterment on the same lines, and that this proposal only carried out the same principle for a public purpose.

*MR. RITCHIE: I do not think it has anything to do with the principle of betterment. The principle which I said the other day was not an unjust one was this: that where it can be shown that a particular house or particular houses have been specially raised in value by a public improvement I saw no reason why the owners should not pay specially for that improvement. And that is the principle that is recognised by the existing law. But I made it very plain that, with regard to the proposal then before the House, I myself was unable to see how that principle could be so generally and widely applied with justice. But what is there in the betterment principle analogous to the proposal contained in this Bill? The real betterment principle is this: that if you can show that a particular property has been benefited, then let that property be taxed on that increment; but you are not going to benefit any property. What you are going to do is to worsen, and not to better, property. It has been said that this proposal is confined to land and houses, and is not one which is properly applicable to other matters. For my part, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and I cannot myself see how to dissociate land from any other kind of property. The hon. Baronet the Member for Northumberland (Sir E. Grey) said he was prepared to see this principle extended to other property; and he said, because it was not extended to other property why should we not take advantage of the Bill as it stands? He did not see any difference between this and any other property.

SIR E. GREY: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. What I said was, adopting, for the time being, the contention of the other side of the House, there was no difference.

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Baronet adopted it for the purpose of argument, and said take this as the first step, and then afterwards apply it to other property. The hon. Baronet gave an illustration. He said take a piece of property, divide it into two parts; if you deal with only half the property, that is no reason why you should not deal with the other half.

SIR E. GREY: I said because you could not prove your title to the other part of the rateable property—it was not possible.

*MR. RITCHIE: I do not wish to push the matter any further; but the principle of this Bill is, that where property has been increased, not by any action of the owner of the property, but by the development of the town, and the development of enterprise, the increased value of that property should be the property of the community. I have heard no satisfactory answer given to my hon. Friends who have contended that this principle affects other property, such as Consols, railway shares, and shares in all industrial undertakings; and I say there is no reason why it should not be applied to banks in towns, or shopkeepers in towns. It is quite true that a share of the increased value of a shop or a bank may be attributed to the energy or enterprise of those who have conducted the business; but it is perfectly obvious that a very large share of the increased value, at any rate, may be attributable to improvements made in the town, and to the growth of the population of the town. Why, in that case, should there not be the same means of assessing what increased value is owing to this movement of the population, what increased value is owing to the industry and development of the town, and allow the town to take its share of it? Let us see for a moment what are some of the unjust details of this proposal? The property may be valued for purchase; let us see at what cost that is to be done to the landowner. We have first of all a Local Government Board inquiry. Then we have a valuation by an arbitrator, and both of these items of expense have to be incurred by the landowner, and the land does not benefit at all.

MR. HALDANE: The right hon. Gentleman will see that the Bill specially provides that the expense shall be borne by the County Council.

*MR. RITCHIE: I am sure the hon. and learned Gentleman will know as well as any Member of this House, that the costs which are likely to be dealt with in the way he suggests are probably the smallest portion of the costs, which would be involved in the transaction which he proposes. And then again, if ultimately the land is to be purchased there is another appeal to arbitration with regard to the value, so that after depriving the landowner of the power of taking the increased value of the land at the time the purchase is made, you undoubtedly, by these operations, subject him to a very large and serious expenditure. And what is more, so far as I understand the Bill, there is nothing to prevent it being done once every 20 years. There is no reason why, at the end of 20 years, the County Council should not say, "Oh, this land has not risen in value sufficiently for our purpose! We will go on repeating the experiment for the next 20 years." So that they would be able absolutely to put the owner to a very considerable expense every 20 years, and for that time completely paralyse the operations of the landlord, and the action of the landlord with regard to his own property, and there is no part of the community, I venture to say, which would be likely to suffer more from that paralysis than those whom the hon. Member desires to benefit by the operation of his Bill. Let us see for a moment what the result to the owner would be during the 20 years, with regard to which he is under an obligation to sell. Something has been said by hon. Members in supporting this Bill to the effect that the only injustice—they acknowledge there would be an injustice done—but they say that if there is an injustice, the only injustice that will be done to the landowner is that perhaps it will not be worth the while of the speculator to come in and buy the land. Why should the landowner be debarred from selling his land to the speculator? Why should he be debarred from the opportunity of selling his land in the best market? Let me tell the hon. Member that perhaps the very best thing for the town and neighbourhood may be that the land should be sold to the speculator, who would provide outside the town those houses which, perhaps, it is impossible to provide within the area of the town. Therefore, I cannot acknowledge that the fact of the speculator being shut out as a possible buyer is not also a gross injustice to the owner of the land, and very possibly it may be a great injustice to the town. Suppose during the first 20 years the owner thinks a favourable opportunity in the land market has arisen for him to dispose of his land? Prices are high, probably higher than they may remain, and he desires to sell his land. But he cannot do it, with that charge upon it no one will buy it. And then at the end of 20 years the County Council may turn round upon the owner and say, "We are very much obliged to you for the offer of your land, but we don't think that the time is favourable, and we won't buy the land." Then the owner is put in this position. For twenty years he has been debarred from dealing with his land—it may be 40 or 60 years, but I am taking the shortest term—and he has been debarred from selling at a time favourable to himself. Then it is thrown upon his hands at the end of twenty years by the County Council at a time when, probably, it has been greatly depreciated in value. Then, again, this Bill says that no added value is to be given to the landowner unless that added value is owing to some expenditure of his own. Suppose a Railway Company goes through his land. That surely has nothing to do with any expenditure incurred by the town; yet, the owner of the land is not to profit by a development which has been caused, not by the action of a Public Authority but by the action of a private company. The County Council has no disability of that kind, and I understand that it may take the whole or any part of the land. Then what may they do? They may go and take the land where the railway has come, and where the value has enormously increased—an increased value for which the owner will receive not one penny—and they may throw on the hands of the owner the other portion which they have scheduled, but which may have depreciated in value. Could anybody conceive anything more grossly unjust than that? I doubt whether the hon. and learned Member himself would be prepared to say otherwise than that such a proceeding would be a gross and monstrous injustice—a spoliation and a robbery.

MR. HALDANE: The Bill gives the Local Government Board power to stop such an attempt.

*MR. RITCHIE: The Local Government Board! I may be wrong, and if so, the hon. and learned Gentleman will correct me, but as I understand the Bill, the Local Government Board does not act in regard to this question except in the matter of scheduling for valuation.

MR. HALDANE: And purchase.

*MR. RITCHIE: Oh, very well. We will assume that the Local Government Board is to step in to prevent this manifest injustice. But what have the Local Government Board to consider? That it is "for the interests of the inhabitants of the locality." If it cannot be shown that it is not to the interests of the inhabitants of the locality the Local Government Board has no option. Clearly it is very much to the interests of the inhabitants of a locality, if a railway has come on to the land and enormously increased its value, that the land should be obtained by the Local Authority, and what would prevent the Local Government Board doing anything else but giving their assent to the proposal? It would not be for them to say whether the thing was just or unjust, but only whether or not it was in the interests of the inhabitants of the locality, and that being shown, I declare on my responsibility that no President of the Local Government Board could withhold his assent to such a transaction, which is a possibility quite within the four corners of the Bill. Such a proposal only requires to be stated to show its gross injustice. It is true the concession is made that if any expenditure is incurred in improvement by the owner during the twenty years, such expenditure will be valued. I am surprised that the hon. and learned Member did not put a clause in the Bill that no improvement should be made without the consent of the County Council. It would have been perfectly logical to say that, as they had got to pay for the improvement, no improvement should be made on the land for twenty years without the consent of the County Council. Then it has been said that there is no corresponding obligation on the County Council where the land may decrease in value, and that while the unfortunate owner is compelled to sell the land which increases in value he cannot compel the Council to buy if it decreases, although he is debarred of a market by the operation of the Bill. I believe the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Haldane) would be bound to insert in the Bill a clause compelling purchase in such a case. I think I have shown that the Bill proposes a grossly unjust and inequitable way of dealing with a principle which has never yet been recognised by Parliamentary law, and, so far as I am concerned, although I agree with hon. Gentlemen who have said that the operation of this Bill might possibly be to the present advantage of some particular locality, I do not believe that anything which is founded upon a gross and manifest injustice such as the proposals of this Bill are, can ever be for the permanent benefit of the community.

*(5.22.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): It is very difficult in the few moments which remain to deal adequately with such an important question, and I shall not attempt to follow the right hon. Gentleman in the extraordinary speech which he has just delivered. I could not help reflecting during that speech that the supporters of this principle of intercepting the unearned increment for the benefit of the community were getting on. The right hon. Gentleman was pleased to twit the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) with his inconsistency on this subject. Whether the right hon. Member for Derby was right in the opinions which he expressed years ago, or in those he entertains to day, does not matter much to us who have been for years pegging away for the realisation of this vital principle. The President of the Local Government Board says he cannot distinguish between property in a coat which is the product of human industry and property in land which is the gift of Nature. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman has not got further in learning his lessons. To us and to a daily-increasing number there is a vast distinction to be drawn. I sat at the feet of John Stuart Mill and heard this doctrine of the unearned increment formulated by that great philosopher. "An ounce of fact is worth a ton of theory"; and the results which have followed the construction of the Thames Embankment supply one of the strongest arguments which can be adduced in support of the principle affirmed in this Bill. Had that principle been accepted twenty-five or thirty years ago the ratepayers of London to-day would not be saddled with a legacy of debt incurred by the late Metropolitan Board of Works, for the cost of the Embankment would have been liquidated by the increase of from thirty to sixty per cent. which has taken place in the value of the adjacent land and property—an increase mainly due to the expenditure of £800,000 which the ratepayers of London incurred in the construction of the embankment, but which increase has gone into the pockets of the ground landlords of the locality. I should like to have given other practical proofs which could be found in the Metropolis in favour of the principle which this Bill affirms, but I have no desire to stand between the House and a Division, and I can only congratulate myself and those who supported John Stuart Mill twenty-five years ago that a principle which was then scouted as a monstrous idea has to-day been seriously discussed by the House of Commons.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(5.50.) MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I ask the House to give this Bill a Second Reading. It is a short Bill, and does not need, I think, a long explanation. Its object is simply to allow recreation grounds to be provided in rural parishes, and for this purpose parishes may combine.

Objection taken.

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow.

ORDNANCE SURVEY.

(5.52.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): In moving that the Order of 11th February for appointing a Committee on the Ordnance Survey be discharged, I may, perhaps, say a few words explaining why I do so. I was fortunate enough to obtain the Order for the Committee very early in the Session, and the President of the Board of Agriculture, who was not at the time present, afterwards communicated with me, and said he thought that a Departmental Committee would be more likely to make a speedy and successful inquiry, and he was good enough to consult me as to the terms of Reference. I had great pleasure in acceding to his wish, and I hope the inquiry will lead to a satisfactory result.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Order [11th February], That a Select Committee on the Ordnance Survey be appointed, be read, and discharged."—(Mr. Roby.)

(5.53.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I think my hon. Friend must allow that the proposal he has accepted is a considerable variation from the Order of the House at the beginning of the Session. That Order was to appoint a Committee to inquire into the present management of the Ordnance Survey, and the best mode of accelerating the production of maps and to report thereon, but the reference to the Departmental Committee is of a much more limited character, only dealing with certain specific arrangements for the publication of maps. It may be invidious to decline to allow the hon. Member to withdraw the Order, but I think if he would postpone his present Motion until to-morrow, he might get an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture (Mr. Chaplin) that the evidence given before the Departmental Committee and also its Report shall be made public, at any rate that we should not suffer in that degree by the substitution of a Departmental Committee.

Debate adjourned till to-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House do now adjourn.”—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

(5.55.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I take this opportunity of putting a question to the First Lord of the Treasury which can be answered in a few moments. Before Easter a Resolution was passed by the House, the Government agreeing, setting forth that legislation was needed to provide for public access to mountains and moorlands, especially in Scotland; and upon the acceptance of this Resolution by the Government a Bill was immediately brought in to give effect to it, in exactly the same terms as Bills which had been before the House in two preceding Sessions. My hon. Friend the Member for West Aberdeen (Dr. Farquharson) and myself have repeatedly moved the Second Reading of this Bill after the time for taking Opposed Business, and have always been blocked by an objection from the other side of the House, and sometimes from a Member of the Government. This is a most unsatisfactory position, that the Government should accept a Resolution, and then refuse us any facilities, or even to exercise any influence on their supporters to enable us to bring forward a Bill founded on the Resolution. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the attitude of the Government towards the Bill; whether they are willing to afford any opportunity for the discussion of the proposals to carry out the spirit of the Resolution; and whether they will state their objections to our proposals, and indicate any form which may be accepted by us, so that the Bill may go through?

(5.56.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): As I have several times stopped the Bill, perhaps I may be allowed to say that I have done so because the Bill is not in accordance with the Resolution.

MR. BRYCE: My question was not addressed to the hon. Gentleman.

(5.57.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I know nothing about the course taken by my hon. Friend, a course which he has every right to take, and which is frequently adopted by hon. Members opposite towards Bills my Friend desires to promote. As to the attitude of the Government towards this particular Bill mentioned, while we undoubtedly did accept the proposition that something should be done to deal with this subject, we have never given assent to this Bill by speech or vote, nor do we think that in its present shape it is a Bill which the House ought to accept. The hon. Gentleman asks me to give the reasons why the Government object to the Bill; but the few minutes now at my disposal will not admit of that, even if this were the opportunity for doing so. I do not think that any Bill on the subject could pass the House without discussion, and time for that discussion we have not to give. If the hon. Gentleman will confer with my right hon. and learned Friend near me (the Lord Advocate), possibly we might come to an understanding as to what kind of Bill would be acceptable.

Mr. Bryce

(5.57.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): Does not the right hon. Gentleman think that the Government are under an obligation to bring forward a proposal of their own if they refuse this Bill? Does the right hon. Gentleman definitely decline to do so?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will consider that.

(5.58.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question with reference to the business on Friday evening next. Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any information as to whether the Motion which stands on the Order Book in the name of the hon. Member for South Armagh (Mr. Blane) is withdrawn; and, if so, what other business is to be proceeded with?

(5.59.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have heard a rumour to that effect; but I have no official knowledge. Of course, it is in the power of hon. Gentlemen to put down Notices of Motion for Fridays, when they will be discussed in their order of precedence.

(5.59.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): In reference to the course of business, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he persists in his proposal to make the discussion of the Irish Education Bill contingent upon the passing of the Irish Local Government Bill; and whether he intends to so arrange matters that the smaller Bills shall take precedence, and the important Education Bill be contingent on the passing of these?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; the hon. Gentleman is mistaken if he supposes anything of the kind.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I wish to express my strong dissent from the line taken by the Government towards the Access to Mountains Bill after accepting the Resolution. I trust that facilities may be given for the discussion of that Bill, or that the Government will carry out their expressed intention by bringing forward proposals of their own.

It being Six of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put till To-morrow.

[H.L.]

Read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order); amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

POLYNESIAN LABOUR IN QUEENSLAND.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, your Lordships may have observed that it has been reported that the Government of Queensland is about to take steps for the renewal of the importation of Polynesian labourers, usually I think called Kanakas, into that colony. The subject is one of considerable gravity, and I have no doubt it has occupied the attention of the Colonial Office, and that the noble Lord the Secretary of State will be glad of an opportunity of giving some explanation as to the course which is to be taken. This immigration went on for a considerable number of years, and I regret to say that it was attended with very serious abuses. There are two kinds of abuse which may arise from an immigration of that kind. One is as to the circumstances under which the labourers are recruited, and the other is as to the treatment of them after they arrive in the colony. To take the second point first, I am far from supposing that the employers in Queensland are in any way inferior in humanity to employers generally; but it has been found that where coloured labour of an inferior race is employed, unless very careful measures are taken, there is apt to be oppression and hardship, if not even cruelty. Your Lordships are well aware that there is an extensive coolie emigration from India to our colonies, which has always been watched with the utmost possible care and rigour by the Government of India, who will not allow coolies to be imported into our colonies without the most stringent measures being taken for their good treatment. I am happy to believe that those measures have been successful, and that in our colonies the coolies are well treated, and that there is no reason to complain in that respect. But the Government of India always hold in their hands a most powerful engine, namely, that at any moment, if they are not satisfied as to the treatment of the coolies—either during the passage, or after their arrival in the colony—they at once threaten—and they would not hesitate to execute the threat—that they will stop the whole emigration; and, as regards foreign countries, when they have obtained permission to import coolies into their colonies, the same powers exist. I mention that to show how necessary such precautions are. I do not, however, doubt that the Government of Queensland will take effective measures for the protection of the labourers after they arrive in the colony. That is a matter entirely within their own power; the labourers are there within the colony itself, and a due vigilance on the part of the Government would no doubt prevent any abuse on the part of those who employ the labourers. But the case is very different with regard to the recruitment of the labourers in the Polynesian Islands. A Commission of Inquiry that took place some years ago showed that there had been most grave abuses and most shocking cruelty connected with the recruitment; and it is evident that, whatever precautions you may take, it is exceedingly difficult to prevent such abuses; dealing as recruiters do with those who are in fact savages, and, owing to the conditions under which they are to be employed, abuses are almost sure to arise. But worse than that, it was very often found in past times,—I hope it was not so in the more recent years before the immigration was stopped,—that there was a distinct kidnapping of labourers, and that, in point of fact, it did not at one time differ very much from the slave trade. My Lords, the matter is not one for which the Government of Queensland is alone responsible, because it has no jurisdiction on the high seas or in the islands from which these labourers are to be recruited. The responsibility therefore must rest to a certain extent upon the Imperial Government to see that the regulations as far as possible are such as will prevent abuses. I trust the regulations will prevent abuses; that they will reduce them very much I have no doubt; but I regret to say that, after the experience I had formerly on this subject, I am afraid no measures will prevent some abuses arising. My Lords, this is not a matter which concerns us alone, because no doubt our proceedings will be very carefully watched by foreign nations. We have always shown the greatest jealousy of any immigration that could partake in the slightest degree of slave recruiting, and it is not surprising, or perhaps unreasonable, that foreign nations should view with great jealousy, and even some surprise, the fact that we should sanction a traffic attended by the evils that this traffic unfortunately brings with it. I do not wish at all to exaggerate the matter, and I fully recognise that in the position in which Queensland is, having very large territories where the climate is tropical and cannot be properly cultivated by white labour, the prosperity of the colony seriously depends upon its obtaining labour from the islands. I remember that application was made some time ago to the Government of India to sanction coolie immigration; I do not know what the result was, but I suppose there was some obstacle in the way which prevented its being allowed. If it were possible to make arrangements by which an immigration of Indian coolies could take place, I should view these proceedings with infinitely less suspicion; I believe that an emigration of coolies from India might be so regulated from the nature of the case—the jurisdiction being in the hands of the Government of India, and they having in their hands the power to stop the emigration if any abuses arose—that there would be no hardship or oppression, but an advantage to the coolies who might go to Queensland, and also to Queensland itself. However, if we cannot see our way to some such immigration, and, if it is thought right, after full consideration, that this immigration of Kanakas should be renewed, I hope and trust and believe that Her Majesty's Government will take every precaution in their power to prevent, as far as possible, the abuses which I am afraid are almost certain to attend such recruitment in these islands. My Lords, I beg leave to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies with reference to the reported intention of the Government of Queensland to renew the recruitment of Polynesian labourers for service in that colony, what safeguards will be taken to prevent the abuses which attended such recruitment in former years?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): My Lords, in reply to the noble Earl, I have to state that I have not yet received any copy of the Act, which I believe has been passed by the Queensland Legislature with reference to the renewal of the employment of Kanakas. I am therefore unable to inform your Lordships what precautions have been taken to guard against the abuses which, some years ago, attended that system; nor am I able to judge whether those precautions are likely to be sufficient. I may, however, say that I feel satisfied that the Colonial Government must have given very careful attention to this special branch of the subject; and in support of this view I may refer to different statements which have appeared in the papers, and which have been made by Sir Samuel Griffith, the Premier of Queensland. It will be remembered that Sir Samuel Griffith for many years opposed this labour system; but last year he saw reason to change his opinion, and to support the renewal of the system, on the ground, as I gather, referred to by the noble Earl, that it is found impossible to carry on the sugar industry in Queensland with white labour only, and that it is necessary, therefore, to introduce native labour. I may also mention, as another ground for my belief that the Queensland Government must have paid close attention to this subject, that the Admiral on that station, Lord Charles Scott, was asked by the Government to report upon the subject and to favour them with any suggestions which he could make, which would tend to prevent any abuse arising from the recruiting, and he not only forwarded a Report of his own opinion and suggestions, but also sent a Report and opinion of Captain Davis who has had considerable experience in the Polynesian Islands. There can be no doubt that the Queensland Government will consider those Reports, and, looking to the interest that has been taken in the question, the Colonial Government must have been fully alive, not only to the difficulties of the case, but to the necessity of taking ample precautions to prevent the recurrence of such abuses as the noble Earl referred to. Perhaps I may be allowed, before I sit down, to remove what I think is a misapprehension upon this subject. The noble Earl has explained that the question must be considered first as regards the recruiting of natives, and secondly as regards their treatment when they are on the plantations. I am happy to say as regards the second side of the subject, that, so far as we are informed, there has been no question that these natives when employed on the plantations have been well treated. We have had no representations to the contrary, and, although I desired that a search should be made, we do not find any official complaints of the treatment of natives when once they were on the plantations. I would also like to mention, as confirming this view, that, while the number of labourers who have been imported in the last few years has distinctly increased, the mortality has largely decreased; that there was in the Savings Bank on the 31st December, 1890, a sum of £17,659 to the credit of the islanders who were then in Queensland, and that nearly £2,000 was spent in 1890 on hospitals alone for these labourers. I mention these facts as confirming the view, which I understand the noble Earl to share, that there is no fault to find with the treatment of the natives in the colony. Then, my Lords, the abuses to which the noble Earl has referred, and which have received most justly the strong condemnation, I think I may say, of the civilised world, were entirely confined to the system of recruiting labourers in the islands. Those abuses came to light in 1884 when the Government agent, and the recruiting agent, the captain, and some of the crew of the vessel Hopeful were tried in Queensland for offences committed in the recruiting by that vessel. Two of the men—the second mate and boatswain—were tried for murder and sentenced to death, though their sentence was afterwards commuted to penal servitude for life; and five others were also sentenced to penal servitude, two I think for life, and three for shorter terms. Then came the Commission to which the noble Earl referred, which reported early in 1885; but I desire to call attention to the fact that the Commissioners were not instructed to inquire into the subject generally, but were required to report upon the voyages made by six vessels including the Hopeful. The abuses which were reported upon by that Commission, some of which had also been brought forward at the trial of the crew of the Hopeful, were of a shameful character; but considering that these abuses were confined to certain voyages, and bearing in mind that the natives were taken from special groups of islands close to New Guinea, and which have now been annexed to British New Guinea, I think it is perhaps hardly fair to condemn the whole system of recruiting on account of those very serious abuses. And I think it is fair to argue thus, because since 1885 the recruiting has been going on, and, as I have said, an increased number of natives has been introduced each year into Queensland, and yet there has been no representation and no complaint of any abuse, except it may be of some partial infringement of the regulations. Certainly no complaint of any serious infringement of the regulations has, so far as I am aware, been brought to our notice. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the convictions and sentences passed in 1884 and the very careful inquiry subsequently made by the Commission will serve as a deterrent and warning to men who would be inclined to commit such abuses again. I do not think, my Lords, that any good will be gained by my now pointing out what precautions and what conditions Her Majesty's Government would look for in the Queensland Act, because I am not yet aware what precautions have been inserted. I believe it to be really necessary for Queensland that native labour should be introduced. I think there is a great deal of force in what the noble Earl has said, that if coolies could be introduced we should have the assistance of the Indian Government to help us in preventing the recurrence of any abuses. But in any case it is clearly the duty of the Queensland Government to see that every precaution is taken to avoid the recurrence of the abuses in the recruiting; to secure the continuance of good treatment of these natives in the colony; and to secure their safe return. I can assure your Lordships that Her Majesty's Government will support the Queensland Government in any precautions, however stringent, to effect those objects, and will also, as the noble Earl desires, pay special attention to this question when the Queensland Act is before them.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: If I may be allowed one remark, the answer of the noble Lord is in many respects satisfactory; but I observe that he speaks only of supporting the Queensland Government. According to my view I do not think that the Queensland Government alone is concerned, but the Imperial Government. It is quite clear that this immigration can only go on with the permission of the Imperial Government. I am not saying that it ought to be refused; but I do say that the Imperial Government ought to see that the precautions which are taken are sufficient, and such as it thinks ought to warrant it in permitting this immigration to take place.

*LORD KNUTSFORD: I did not make myself quite clear. What I mean by supporting the Queensland Government is that there may be a certain party in the colony who would oppose stringent regulations, and I mean that we should therefore support any regulations that are in the Act. I do not at all desire to shirk the responsibility of the Imperial Government in considering this question.

House adjourned at five minutes before Five o'clock.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS) BILL.

Ordered, That Mr. Baumann, Mr. Sydney Buxton, Sir John Colomb, Mr. Cremer, and Mr. Kimber be Members of the Select Committee on London County Council (General Powers) Bill, with four Members to be added by the Committee of Selection.—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to—Pilotage Provisional Order, Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 1) Bill, without amendment.

QUESTIONS.

STAMP DUTY AND FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

SIR R. PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a cheque drawn upon the treasurer of a Friendly Society—whether a banker or not—and endorsed "not negotiable," is liable to be charged with Stamp Duty, or whether it would be properly exempted therefrom under the provisions of Section 15 of the Friendly Society's Act, 1875?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I may refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 21st March, when I gave the grounds upon which it is held that such a cheque is liable to be charged with Stamp Duty.

SIR R. PAGET: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether in that answer he referred to a cheque not so marked—does it equally apply to the case in my question?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am informed that is so.

MAGHERAFELT COURTHOUSE.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the Irish News of the 28th April, containing a report of a statement made by County Court Judge Neligan, Q.C., at Magherafelt Sessions on Wednesday last, to the effect that the state of the Courthouse there was "a shame and a scandal"; whether he is aware that His Honour felt obliged to adjourn the Court, to the great inconvenience of the public; that the same Judge has repeatedly called attention to the intolerable state of the Courthouse; and that the matter was brought before the Grand Jury of Derry at the last Assizes, but was opposed by the County Surveyor; and whether, considering the danger to the health of the Judge and the Bar and the inconvenience to the public, some steps will be taken to render this Courthouse fit for the sitting of a Court?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The subject-matter of this question is one over which the Executive Government have no control, this matter resting wholly with the Grand Jury. I have endeavoured to obtain some information on the matters of fact, but so far no Report has reached me.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that again on Friday the Judge referred to the objectionable smells and state of the Court as dangerous to health, and will he address a remonstrance to the Derry Grand Jury on the subject?

*MR. JACKSON: As I have said, we have no responsibility, power, or control in the matter, but I have endeavoured to gather some information as to matters of fact.

MR. SEXTON: Unless something is done we must take the opinion of the House upon the subject.

LARNE WORKHOUSE.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the Report of Colonel Spaight, Government Inspector, containing most serious complaints as to the state of the workhouse at Larne, County Antrim; whether he is aware that, at the meeting of the Larne Board of Guardians on Wednesday last, Dr. Killen, the Medical Officer, said he agreed with most of what Colonel Spaight had complained of; whether he will state what these complaints are; and if, in the interest of the poor inmates, anything has since been done to remedy the causes of complaint?

MR. JACKSON: The Report of the Local Government Inspector mentioned was generally of a satisfactory nature in regard to the Larne Workhouse. He suggested, however, an improvement in the sanitary arrangements, and also the making of some structural alterations, in both of which the Medical Officer concurred. The Board of Guardians have taken steps to carry out the sanitary proposals, and the Local Government Board are communicating with them in regard to the proposed structural alterations.

REGISTRATION OF TITLES OFFICE (IRELAND).

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that the Central Office for the Registration of Title, under The Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891, passed in August last, did not open for business until the 1st April, although the Act came into operation on the 1st January last; if he will explain the cause of this delay; whether he will state the number of vesting orders now awaiting registration, and if only one mapper has been provided who cannot well complete more than two or three maps per diem, notwithstanding the vast number of orders awaiting registration; and will the Treasury make arrangements to provide an extra staff until the accumulation has been disposed of?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I have been informed by the Registrar that the Office for the Registration of Title was opened on the 1st January, 1892, as required by the Act, but that he was not in a position to complete the registry of estates until about the 1st April, as he had not the means of making the maps required by the Act until then. The question of additional assistance for mapping purposes is now under the consideration of the Treasury. There are now 1,255 vesting orders awaiting registration. Only two of those cases are in the Registry Office. The remainder have not left the Land Commission. I sincerely hope that the necessary assistance will shortly be afforded to the Office, in order that this large number of applications may speedily be brought under the provisions of the Act.

ALDERSHOT CHIEF PAYMASTER.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary, War Department, if he will explain why, when Colonel Rippon recently vacated the post of chief paymaster at Aldershot, Lieutenant Colonel Whittington was appointed to it over the heads of twelve officers senior to himself in addition to nine others who had already been passed over for promotion, in view of the fact that, in January, 1888, the Accountant General transmitted to the Treasury a Report upon the accounts of the 5th Lancers, from which it appeared that the fraudulent deficiencies which had been discovered in them were partly attributable to the fact that Colonel (then Captain) Whittington, as paymaster of the regiment, exercised no control over the books or accounts, and that Sir Reginald Welby, in a letter of the 11th February, 1888, to the Financial Secretary of the War Office, stated that the frauds resulted from a combination of ignorance and indolence on the part of successive paymasters, including Colonel (then Major) Whittington, and added that the Lords of the Treasury thought Major Whittington deserving of grave censure, and regretted that the Secretary of State should not feel able to make him pecuniarily liable for any part of the loss?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Colonel Whittington was appointed to the Pay Department in 1878, and, owing to pressure arising from active operations at the time, was at once placed in charge of the accounts of a regiment, which were in confusion, with scanty experience and insufficient help. The censure passed on him by the Treasury ten years later had reference to his trusting too much, in 1878, to a fraudulent clerk. During the 14 years which have elapsed since then Colonel Whittington has shown himself to be a first-rate paymaster; he was specially recommended for promotion for his services in Egypt; was specially appointed to superintend the introduction of the new pay system at Aldershot, the largest pay charge in the Army; and his promotion was due to his capacity for special work, for which he was strongly recommended by the military authorities under whom he had served.

SMALL-POX AT KING'S NORTON.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that in the year 1891 there were two fatal cases of malignant small-pox in the King's Norton Union—namely, those of Henry Burnett and George Weake; that in the case of Henry Burnett no official record has been made, either on the certificate of death or by the Medical Officer, that he had been vaccinated and that this was proved by four large marks; and that in the case of George Weake the Medical Officer, in his annual Report, stated that it was a case of the most malignant kind, and that, as far as he could glean, there had been no proper vaccination, as no marks were visible; whether his attention has been drawn to the statement of George Weake's widow and two elder daughters that he had two large and remarkably deep marks of vaccination on his left arm, and also to the father's statement that he remembers his being vaccinated; and whether he will cause inquiries to be made into both of these cases, with a view of having truthful official records of them entered?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have received no information that there were two fatal cases of small-pox in the King's Norton Union during the year 1891. The only representations that I have received on the subject are to the effect that there was one such case, which would appear to be that of George Weake. As regards this case,

I have been informed during the present week that certain relatives of the deceased alleged that he bore marks of vaccination, and that the father of the man remembers his being vaccinated. On the other hand, the Medical Officer of Health in his annual Report, distinctly states that no vaccination marks were visible. It does not, however, appear to me that there is any sufficient ground for an inquiry with regard to these conflicting statements.

MR. COBB: It is very important to have correct information of such cases. Will the right hon. Gentleman have further inquiries made, and also into the case of Henry Burnett?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have no information as to the other case; but I presume what I have said of the one case, would apply to the other. I think it would be extremely difficult from any inquiry made now to ascertain the facts of the case in connection with people who are now dead. I do not see how it is possible to obtain correct information. But, even if it were possible, I do not think it is denied that persons who were vaccinated in their youth, and who have not been re-vaccinated in later life, are liable to attacks of small-pox.

"POST OFFICE LONDON DIRECTORY."

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain why the copies of the Post Office London Directory, which used to be supplied for the use of the public to local metropolitan offices, are not now so supplied, and would there be any objection to rescinding such recent Order, if any?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Post Office London Directory is not an official publication, and it is not the practice to supply copies to post offices for the use of the public, or even copies to all post offices. Directories are, of course, supplied for official purposes where they are required, and when a Directory is available at the public counter without much inconvenience applicants are allowed to refer to it.

DIVULGING CONTENTS OF TELEGRAMS.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General under what circumstances the girl Palfrey, recently convicted at the Birmingham Quarter Sessions of conspiracy, and fined £10, was not proceeded against for the offence of divulging the contents of a telegram, of which she was admittedly also guilty; and what is the penalty attaching to that offence?

SIR J. FERGUSON: Among the charges on which the girl Palfrey was indicted was one of divulging the contents of a telegram, but the essence of all the charges was that of conspiracy to defraud, and to this she pleaded guilty. After such plea, I am informed that it would have been an unusual course to proceed with other counts of the indictment based on precisely the same facts. All of these facts were fully disclosed to the Court. Moreover, the Judge himself suggested that it would be unnecessary to press the other counts. The divulging of the contents of a telegram, like conspiracy to defraud, is a misdemeanour, and the maximum penalty prescribed for it by Statute is twelve months' imprisonment with or without hard labour.

BALLYCLOUGH PROCLAIMED MEETING.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by what authority, on whose sworn information, and for what reason, the public meeting announced to be held at Ballyclough on 25th April was proclaimed and suppressed?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the meeting referred to was not publicly announced, but the Police Authorities had reason to know that it was being arranged, and that its object was to denounce and intimidate certain persons who had taken evicted farms. They accordingly directed an information to be sworn, upon which the meeting was proclaimed.

IRISH LAND SUB-COMMISSION IN COUNTY LIMERICK.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can now state when the Sub-Commissioners will hold sittings at Newcastle West, Limerick County, to hear fair rent applications?

MR. MADDEN: I have communicated with the Land Commission on the subject, and they inform me that it is not now in their power to fix a date for the meeting of the Sub-Commission, having regard to the claims of other districts.

EDINBURGH TELEGRAPH STAFF.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will be able to reply, at an early date, to a Petition in October last from the second class telegraph staff in Edinburgh, praying that the first class, which has been reduced by twelve, may again be placed at the proportion of one in three, at which it has elsewhere stood since 1881?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The prayer of the Petition cannot be acceded to. The office in question was carefully revised last year. Substantial improvements were made, which benefited the whole staff; and the numbers of each class were adjusted not by proportion, but according to the duty to be performed.

THE "ROYAL SOVEREIGN."

MR. PENN (Lewisham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the engine-room artificers of the Royal Sovereign are to be reduced in number from 18 to 12; whether the difference in numbers is to be made up by the promotion of chief stokers to the position of engine-room artificers; and whether experience shows that chief stokers so promoted are as efficient as engine-room artificers in keeping in working, and, in the event of a breakdown, in repairing, the various engines and machinery in ships of war?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The complement of engine-room artificers in the Royal Sovereign will be reduced from 18 to 12 as stated, and the difference made up by the substitution of six chief stokers for six engine-room artificers, as it is considered that these men, from their long experience, are better qualified for certain kinds of work such as water-tenders, than junior engine-room artificers. Chief stokers would not be so efficient for making good defects in the event of a breakdown of machinery as engine-room artificers; but it is not intended that they should be borne for such a purpose, the number of engine-room artificers now allowed being considered sufficient to meet all mechanical requirements.

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the recent engine trial of the ironclad Royal Sovereign gave the estimated contract speed, under natural and forced draught, continuously or only collectively; whether the trial was in smooth water, and with or against the tide; if so, is it intended further to test and record the vessel's speed in rough weather, and against a head wind, for the purpose of ascertaining how long she can be navigated under forced draught without injury to the boilers or crew confined in the engine-room; and whether it is true that a slight leakage was observed during the four hours' trial in the tubes of two of the boilers?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: There was no contract speed to be attained in the case of the Royal Sovereign. The contract was for the development of 9,000 h.p. for eight hours, and 13,000 h.p. for four hours. The actual development averaged 9,640 h.p. for eight hours, and 13,000 h.p. for four hours. The corresponding speeds realised were about 16½ and 18 knots, as against estimated speeds of 16 and 17½ knots. The trial was in smooth water, with and against tide. Trials at sea are made as matters of course after ships are commissioned, but no trials under forced draught, such as those suggested, are contemplated. They are not required. The engine-room is never under air pressure. A slight leakage did occur, during the fourth hour only of the maximum test, and it was then found to be due to preventable causes.

LEWES NAVAL PRISON.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty when he anticipates having the Naval Prison at Lewes in a condition to receive the certificate of the Home Office; and whether he is aware that the absence of this certificate renders the imprisonment of the men sent to the Naval Prison illegal?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: No such certificate from the Home Office is necessary, as the Admiralty have full powers under Statute to make their own regulations for the administration of Naval Prisons, including the appointment of Inspectors. In consequence, however, of the Visitors having questioned the size of the cells at Lewes Naval Prison, the Admiralty requested Sir Edmund Du Cane to inspect the Prison; and, acting on his suggestions, steps are now being taken to bring the cells more into conformity with modern requirements.

CHINESE IMMIGRANTS TO SINGAPORE.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the large importation of Chinese into Singapore, whence they are shipped to Java, Borneo, Sumatra, Queensland, and other places in the Eastern Archipelago, under contract as labourers, and that they have to work for the "agent" until the charges for their transport have been paid off; whether he is aware that last year 160,000 Chinese were thus imported into Singapore, of which number not 10,000 had the remotest chance of stopping on British territory, or where British law exists; and whether, considering the abuses to which the contract system is liable, the Government can see their way to put down this traffic and prevent Singapore from becoming a vast receiving and exporting centre for what differs little from the slave trade?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Secretary of State is aware that a large number of Chinese immigrants come to Singapore, and that some, but only a small proportion of them, go on from Singapore to Java, Sumatra, and other places, under contracts of service by which they are bound to repay out of their earnings the cost of their passages. The Returns for last year have not been received, but it appears from the Returns for 1890 that the whole number of Chinese who arrived at Singapore was 127,936, of whom about 117,000 paid their own passages, and on landing were free to go where they pleased. I may add that in the same year 80,000 Chinese returned from the Straits Settlements to China via Hong Kong. A Commission has recently inquired into the subject in the colony, and the Secretary of State is expecting to receive the Governor's recommendations on the best means of preventing abuses which may arise from the system of contract emigration from China to and through Singapore.

NAVAL RATIONS.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what is, approximately, the difference between the total value of the rations allowed annually to officers, seamen, and marines of the Fleet, and the amount actually served out; why is not the whole of this difference returned to the men; and can he state, approximately, the extra cost to the country that would be incurred for storage, freight, &c., if the whole ration was taken up?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The difference between the ration to which the seaman is entitled and that which he takes up is, approximately—value of total ration per man per diem, 9½d.; value of what he takes up, 6d.; paid as earnings per man per diem, 2½d. The difference of 1d., which amounts to about £45,000, is principally due to the difference between prices paid as savings and the actual cost of the article, which varies from year to year. The taking up of savings is purely optional on the part of the men, though it is very popular in the Service. It is not possible to estimate approximately the extra cost to the country that would be incurred for storage, freight, &c., if the whole ration was taken up. Probably the freight might be slightly increased, but, on the other hand, the country would gain by being able to calculate more closely the consumption which is now variable, owing to savings, and by reduction of clerical staff on board ship, the calculations consequent on the savings system occupying much time and giving much trouble.

THE BREAD UNION (LIMITED).

MR. WALLACE : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the proceedings in the liquidation of the Bread Union (Limited) are subject to his cognisance, under Section 25 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, or otherwise; and, if so, whether he can say if the result of a recent criminal prosecution of the promoters of the Company by the liquidator was a promise to pay £1,000 in cash and £4,000 in bills extending over eighteen months; whether the cost of this procedure amounted to £1,500 or what other sum; whether he can say how much of the fruits of the prosecution have been actually recovered for the benefit of creditors; whether the liquidator is contemplating or taking steps to prosecute civilly the directors or any of them; and whether it is the duty of the Inspector General in company liquidation, or of whom else, to restrain prosecutions by liquidators through their solicitors that are likely to result mainly in large solicitors' and other costs, but in little, if any, gain for creditors?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am informed that the Bread Union (Limited) is being wound up voluntarily under the supervision of the Court. The proceedings are not within the cognisance of the Board of Trade under the 25th section of the Companies (Winding-up) Act. I am, therefore, unable to furnish the information asked for by the hon. Member. The Act of 1890 does not empower the Inspector General to exercise any control over the administrative action of liquidators in such cases.

MEDWAY BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it has come to his knowledge that nine Poor Law Guardians returned to the Medway Board were elected by forged election papers, and that 180 of such forgeries have been detected; that 68 of these were brought to the notice of the Returning Officer before the declaration of the poll, and by him admitted to be forgeries; whether he is aware that many of the votes so forged were in the names of ratepayers who were known to be dead or to have left the district; that these papers, to the number of 68, were returned as undelivered to the Returning Officer and by him locked in a safe, from which they were abstracted and forged, and presented; and whether, under all the circumstances, he proposes to institute an inquiry to test the legality of the election of the nine Guardians, and bring the forgers to justice?

*MR. RITCHIE: The only communication which the Local Government Board have received on this subject is one from a solicitor who, on behalf of certain candidates who were defeated at the recent election of Guardians, applied to the Board to direct an inquiry, and alleged that the election was conducted in a loose and illegal fashion, resulting in a number of voting papers being purloined and at least 85 being forged. The Board have pointed out, in reply, that they are only empowered to decide questions as to the validity of elections of Guardians, where the right of any person to act as a Guardian is formally submitted to them for their determination under the provisions of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1842. The Board have stated what information they require for the purpose of such an appeal. If an appeal is received by the Board, and it should appear that there is ground for contention that votes have been lost to particular candidates, or allowed to other candidates, in consequence of irregularities in connection with the voting papers, and that the result of the election has been thereby affected, the Board, before arriving at a decision on the appeal, would, if there were any dispute as to the facts, direct a local inquiry by one of their Inspectors. As regards the suggestion in the question that an inquiry by the Board is necessary for the purpose of bringing the forgers of voting papers to justice, I must point out that the forging of a voting paper is a criminal offence, and that no action on the part of the Board is necessary to enable any person to institute criminal proceedings against any individual who is alleged to have been guilty of the offence.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Is it not in the power of the Local Government Board to make an inquiry?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have stated under what conditions the Board consider it their duty to investigate such a case. If the Board were to examine on oath charges against persons for forgery of papers it would be contrary to the usual practice, and persons might afterwards be prosecuted for forgery alleged to have been committed, and their case would be prejudiced by the examination by the Local Government Board.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: The Clerk of the Union might be examined as to how the papers left his custody: they could not have been taken without his knowledge.

*MR. RITCHIE: If representation is made to the Board that prima facie evidence exists as to the irregularity, then it will be for the Board to direct an inquiry, and then, no doubt, it will be desirable and necessary to examine the Clerk.

MOUNTJOY CONVICT PRISON.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is usual for Prison Governors in Ireland to visit all prisoners under their control at regular intervals to hear their complaints, if any, with the view of having such complaints, if any, remedied as far as possible consistent with the health, safe custody, and discipline of the prisoners; whether it is usual to make changes in the employment of prisoners from time to time at their own request, and as a reward for good conduct; whether there are any, and, if so, how many prisoners permanently employed, weather permitting, at outside work in Mountjoy Convict Prison; whether any of those prisoners have been so employed from two to five years; for what special reason has the Governor of Mountjoy refused to allow Thomas O'Leary, whose conduct has been good, a change of employment from the shoemaking shop to outdoor work; and will he see that O'Leary's request is granted?

MR. JACKSON: The reply I have received from the General Prisons Board in regard to paragraphs 1 and 2 of the question is in the affirmative. Of the prisoners at the present time employed in Mountjoy Prison at outdoor work, 14 have been so employed continuously for two years or upwards, but no promise of permanent employment at any particular form of labour is given to any convict. As regards the case of the particular convict mentioned, I notice that the hon. Member has changed the wording of the question. When I answered formerly the question was as to permanent change of employment. That request was refused, but it would not be correct to say that he had been refused change of employment.

HAMPSTEAD HEATH RAILWAY STATION.

MR. BRODIE HOARE (Hampstead); I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is taking any steps to prevent the recurrence of such an accident as recently happened at Hampstead Heath Station at that station and others at which there is a large holiday traffic?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have not yet received the Inspector's Report on the Hampstead Heath accident, but I have been in communication with the Railway Company, and am informed that, although the plan has not been actually decided upon, such structural alterations will be made and increased means of access to the platforms provided before Whitsuntide, as will, it is hoped, together with other means taken by the Company, remove all risk of further misfortune. As regards other stations, I must refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave on the 28th ult. to the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham (Mr. John Ellis).

APPOINTMENT OF NURSE AT DONEGAL WORKHOUSE.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Board of Guardians of Donegal Union recently gave notice, by advertisement in the papers, of their intention to appoint a properly qualified person to the post of infirmary nurse in the workhouse at a salary of £20 per annum with rations and apartments; whether it is the fact that, notwithstanding this advertisement, the said Board appointed a person with no qualifications of training, nor testimonials of any kind, who did not even appear before them, rejecting the only other candidate who had a certificate of training from the Royal College of Surgeons, Belfast, and testimonials of character and efficiency as a nurse from clergy and laymen of all denominations; whether the attention of the Local Government Board has been called to the matter; and whether any step will be taken to remedy this action of the Board?

*MR. JACKSON: The Local Government Board have already declined to approve of the appointment referred to, on the ground that the person elected had not the requisite experience. The Guardians have arranged for a new election to take place on the 14th inst.

KILLYBEGS PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the Killybegs Petty Sessions district, which is one of the most extensive in the County Donegal, stretching westward 23 miles and eastward 10 miles, there are at present only two magistrates, whereas a few years ago there were six magistrates; whether he is aware that much inconvenience is caused by the Bench being thus undermanned to the magistrates themselves and the inhabitants generally, more especially when either of the magistrates is absent from the Bench from illness or any other cause; whether he is aware that, although five-sixths of the population of this Petty Sessions district is Catholic, both the magistrates are Protestants, and that frequently no

Petty Sessions can be held owing to their absence from the Bench; whether he is aware that some months ago an influentially signed memorial, approved of by both the magistrates who at present form the Petty Sessions Bench, the gentry of the locality and the Catholic and Protestant clergymen being among the signatories, was presented to the Duke of Abercorn, recommending the appointment of a gentleman residing at Killybegs to the magistracy, a request, however, which was refused by the Duke; and whether the Government will take any step to remedy this public inconvenience?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that there are three local magistrates belonging to the Killybegs district, two of whom give a good attendance at Petty Sessions and that they are also attended constantly by the Resident Magistrate. No complaints have been made to the Lord Chancellor as to the want of an additional magistrate in the district, while, as a matter of fact, there appears to have been only one occasion during the last eighteen months on which no Petty Sessions was held for want of the attendance of any magistrate. I have no information as to the memorial referred to in the question, or as to the grounds on which it was refused; but I am informed that the Lord Lieutenant of the county is always ready to consider the names of any properly qualified gentlemen that may be brought before him.

MR. MAC NEILL: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the third paragraph of the question. Is that true?

MR. JACKSON: I do not know that it is the fact.

DONEGAL POLLING STATIONS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that there is no polling station for the districts of Glencolumbkille and Carrick, in the County Donegal, nearer than Killybegs, which is nine miles from Carrick, and 20 miles from Glencolumbkille; whether he is aware that there are upwards of 500 voters living further away from Killybegs than Carrick; and whether, having regard to the great hardship and inconvenience entailed on voters by being compelled to undertake so long a journey to record their votes without any public conveyance whatever, arrangements will be made for having polling stations in Carrick?

MR. JACKSON: The polling stations for the County Donegal were fixed in 1885 in pursuance of the Parliamentary Registration (Ireland) Act of that year. There is no power to consider the alteration of the existing districts, except on a resolution being passed by the Chairman of Quarter Sessions and Justices of the Peace having jurisdiction in the county, that such a course is necessary.

MR. MAC NEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman communicate with the Chairman of Quarter Sessions? Is he aware that since County Councils have been established in England polling booths have been placed within three miles of every voter?

MR. JACKSON: I am sure if the hon. Member will communicate with the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, and point out to him the inconvenience likely to arise from the present arrangement the representation will receive attention.

MR. MAC NEILL: The Chairman is Dr. Webb, the well-known Tory pamphleteer.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION APPOINTMENTS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the fact that no fewer than twelve temporary uncertificated clerks in the offices of the Irish Land Commission have been made permanent clerks without any examination; why were not the vacancies in the offices of the Irish Land Commission filled from the Lower Division of the Civil Service, and why were not those clerkships thrown open to public competition according to the practice adopted in filling up vacancies in clerkships in the High Court of Justice in Ireland; is there any precedent for this departure from the Civil Service Regulations, and what are the grounds for this breach of the usual practice in the filling up of such appointments; and will he have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the correspondence that has taken place on this subject between the Civil Service Commissioners and the Irish Land Commission?

MR. JACKSON: Certain clerks in the Department of the Land Commission where, on the recent re-organisation of the Department, permanently appointed, they not holding certificates from the Civil Service Commissioners. I have dealt with the inquiries made in reference to this subject in my reply of 4th April. It would be contrary to practice to lay on the Table copies of correspondence between Departments on the subject of Departmental organisations.

MR. MAC NEILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that these twelve temporary clerks are near relatives, either of the Land Commissioners, or of the Judges, or of other Irish officials?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir, I have no knowledge of the relationship existing between the clerks and the Land Commissioners. I think it would be a very extraordinary proceeding to discharge men who had been doing the work, and who had become efficient in the discharge of it, and to bring in men from outside who had no experience of the duties.

MR. MAC NEILL: I shall bring up this matter again on the Estimates.

DISEASED MEAT IN IRELAND.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to a letter in the Northern Whig of 30th April, from F. Adair, Secretary to the Belfast Master Butchers' Protection Association, stating that the meat of cattle slaughtered for pleuro-pneumonia was regularly sold for consumption in Belfast; whether he will inquire into the truth of this statement; and whether, if found correct, he will take the necessary steps to put a stop to this practice?

*MR. JACKSON: My attention has been called to the letter, which appears to have been written under a misapprehension, or to have referred to some other circumstances. I am informed that neither in the case of Belfast nor any other part of Ireland have animals been slaughtered and sold for food unless they were fit for consumption and so certified by the veterinary surgeons.

THE LAND COMMISSIONERS IN CAVAN.

MR. KNOX (Cavan W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Sub-Commissioners who sat to hear land cases in Cavan last summer adjourned, leaving some 20 cases which had been listed unheard, saying that they would return in three weeks, but have not yet sat there since; whether he is aware that some cases in the district, which were entered four years ago, have not yet been heard; and whether the proper steps will be taken to have these cases disposed of?

*MR. JACKSON: From the Report I have received from the Irish Land Commissioners it appears that the cases referred to have been already listed for hearing before a Sub-Commission which will commence its sitting at Cavan on the 16th inst. The Chairman of the Sub-Commission which sat in Cavan last year reports that he made no such statement as that attributed to him in the Question.

LOUGH ERNE DRAINAGE.

MR. KNOX: I gave notice to ask the Secretary to the Treasury in how many cases the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland have, up to the present date, raised the rents of tenants whose lands are alleged to have been improved by the Lough Erne Drainage; what is the total amount of increase; what is the acreage of the land alleged to have been improved, and on which the rents have been increased; and how many of such tenants held under judicial tenancies? I now wish to postpone this question until Monday next. At the same time I would say that it has already been several times on the Paper, and that the Board of Works in Ireland have had time to furnish a reply to it.

ARMY MEDICAL OFFICERS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary, War Department, whether any steps will be taken to remove the disability under which officers in the Army Medical Department suffer as regards precedence at mess; and whether such disability was always in existence, and when instituted?

*MR. BRODRICK: The officers of the Army Medical Department suffer from no disability.

DR. TANNER: Has the long correspondence which has taken place on the subject in some medical journals been brought to the attention of the hon. Gentleman, and is he prepared to say that this grievance does not exist?

*MR. BRODRICK: I have not seen the correspondence referred to by the hon. Member.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL FISHING IN THE BANDON RIVER.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Jeremiah Murphy, who was fined £5 and costs at the last Innishannon Petty Sessions, for alleged illegal fishing in Bandon River, near Harleys Bridge, was convicted and fined by a majority of one by the Magistrates at Innishannon Petty Sessions, Mr. Cronin, R.M., dissenting, and that it was proved that Murphy was looking after cattle at the time he was supposed to be fishing; and whether, under the circumstances of the case, the fine will be remitted?

*MR. JACKSON: I am informed that Murphy was fined as stated in the question; but it does not appear to be the case that the Resident Magistrate dissented from the judgment of the Court. If the defendant is of opinion that there are circumstances in his case which would warrant a reduction or remission of the fine, it is open to him to memorialise the Lord Lieutenant.

GOLD MINING ROYALTIES.

MR. McDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what number of tons of gold ore have been raised and treated in the Dolgelly district from the time the junior Member for Merthyr commenced operations up to the present time; what number of ounces of gold have been produced, and what is the total value of such gold, and the average value of gold produced per ton of ore; having regard to the fact that the cost of mining, tramming, and treating such ore, and extracting the gold therefrom, irrespective of wear and tear, depreciation of machinery, management, administration, and interest on capital, is stated by Dr. Le Neve Foster, in his Report to the Home Secretary for 1891, to be 8s. 5½d. per ton in the case of the Morgan Mine, and also having regard to the fact that large quantities of low grade ore exist in Wales and Ireland, and that the Government are not prepared to work the Royal mines on State account, will they grant to all persons desirous of working such Royal mines the same concessions, pending the Report of the Royal Commission, as those lately granted to the Morgan Gold Mine; whether he is prepared to reduce the royalties on gold obtained from private lands in Wales and Ireland to one per cent. on the product, and in the case of Crown lands to two per cent. on the product pending such Report; and whether, having regard to the fact that persons obtaining gold and silver in private lands in combination with copper, tin, iron, and lead are protected by the Acts of William and Mary, the Government are prepared to grant the same protection to owners of mines in private lands where gold is obtained in combination with zinc blende and other base metals?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The number of tons of gold ore which have been raised and treated in the Dolgelly district from the time the junior Member for Merthyr commenced operations up to the 16th October is 26,819 tons, the number of ounces of gold produced is 17,280, the total value of such gold is £58,643, and the average value per ton of ore is £2. 3s. 9d. Concessions similar to those lately granted to the Morgan Gold Mine are being granted in other cases where the circumstances are similar. Having regard to the fact that the right of pre-emption in regard to copper, tin, lead, and iron ore has never, so far as is known, been exercised and that no zinc blende mine has been claimed as a Royal mine, it appears to be unnecessary to consider the suggestion that the Acts of William and Mary should be extended to blende ore.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to apply the principle of reduction in all cases, or does he intend to preclude me from them?

*MR. GOSCHEN: That is a point which does not arise out of this question.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is a fact, as stated in the Mining Journal of the 16th inst., that the junior Member for Merthyr has requested that royalties on all gold and silver obtained from private lands in Wales and Ireland should be reduced to one per cent., as in the case of the Morgan Gold Mine, pending the Report of the Royal Commission on Mining Royalties; whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer has refused to reduce the royalties on any other lands than those occupied by the Morgan Gold Mine; whether, in consequence of the Chancellor's communication to the junior Member for Merthyr, that, the junior Member for Merthyr has requested the Chancellor of the Exchequer to proceed at once to recover the costs by the sale of his property, rather than the matter shall be indefinitely delayed; and, whether he will proceed to the sale, with a view afterwards to the reduction of the royalties throughout Wales and Ireland; and, if not, whether he will reduce such royalties pending the decision of the Royal Commission on Mining Royalties?

"So long as costs which are due from you remain unpaid, he is unable to enter upon the consideration with you of the question of the royalties to be paid to the Crown,"

*MR. GOSCHEN: My answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question is in the affirmative. As regards the second paragraph, there are other lands besides those occupied by the Morgan Gold Mine upon which I have consented to reduce the royalties. With regard to the third paragraph, I have declined to deal with the hon. Member for Merthyr so long as he persists in his refusal to pay the State what is legally due from him. The hon. Member has requested me to proceed to recover the costs by levying an execution on his goods; but I understood that the feeling of the House was against gratifying the hon. Member in his desire for this sordid form of martyrdom. The position taken up by the hon. Member only prevents the Woods and Forests from dealing with him personally and with his personal affairs. It does not arrest the dealings of the Woods and Forests with other parties, and in these there is no delay. There is no reason, therefore, from that point of view, for selling up the hon. Member.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that gold has been found in a property, known as the Champion Mine (Moel Isprey), near Dolgelly, in combination with zinc, and whether the persons who have discovered it are entitled to the same protection as they would if the gold had been in combination with copper or lead; and, if not, whether the Government are prepared to grant the same privileges to those working for gold and zinc in combination as has already been granted by the Acts of William and Mary to those who are obtaining gold in combination with copper or lead; and whether, having regard to the promising indications of gold which exist in several localities in Wales and Ireland, the Government will consider the advisability of having an informal survey made by practical geologists and experts in mining?

*MR. GOSCHEN: So far as can be ascertained there has been no working for blende at Moel Isprey for some months past. Some blende was obtained in 1890, but although it was believed to contain a little silver, it was treated and disposed of as blende ore and no claim was made by the Crown in respect of it. The Acts of William and Mary were not passed for the protection of those working for gold in combination with copper or lead, but for the protection of the owners of copper and lead mines when gold or silver was found to exist in the copper or lead ore obtained from their properties. Neither the owners of Moel Isprey nor the owners of any other property producing blende ore have expressed any anxiety that the Acts of William and Mary should be extended to blende ore, and there is no reason to suppose that any practical result would follow such an extension. Many practical geologists and mining experts, commencing with Sir Roderick Murchison, have at various times expressed their views on the indications of gold in Wales and Ireland, and there seems no justification for incurring the expense of a further informal survey.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether within the last 20 years the improvement of machinery has not been such that ore which at the time Sir R. Murchison expressed his opinion did not pay, would now be payable, especially with regard to the fact that the ore in the Morgan Mine was mined and treated for less than 8s. 6d. per ton?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I see no reason for a Government survey. Certain explorations are proceeding and certain results will follow; but there is no reason for the Government to take the matter in hand.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Am I to understand that I am the only victim, and that royalties are not to be reduced in my case simply because I will not pay costs in the way he desires?

*MR. GOSCHEN: My position is this—a business-like position to be taken up by any one in a position of trust—not to deal with the hon. Member, or—not to speak of the hon. Member personally—not to deal with parties who, after a Court of Law has awarded a debt against them, refuse to pay. It is impossible to deal with parties who say they will only pay their debts if they are sold up.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Is it a fact that the law has not been revised for 300 years, and that the Judges are not agreed as to the construction of the Acts of William and Mary?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Any hon. Member who has read the remarks of the Judges will see that I am perfectly justified in the action I have taken.

Mr. Goschen

POLYNESIAN LABOUR IN QUEENSLAND.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the Government of Queensland is about to re-open the traffic in Polynesian labour, which was prohibited two years ago in consequence of the horrible atrocities that disgraced it; whether he is aware that a Royal Commission investigated the whole matter in 1885, and reported that it was a traffic accompanied with every circumstance of deception and cruelty; that they reported that, in the case of the labour vessel Hopeful— whether a Petition was signed in Queensland by 28,000 persons to get the murderers and kidnappers in the Hopeful pardoned on the ground that these atrocities had been common, and it was hard to make these men the first victims; whether these men are now out of prison, and whether he is aware that it was proposed to give them a public banquet in the colony; whether he is aware that the Royal Commission stated that the average mortality of these Pacific islanders on the sugar plantations of Queensland was 17·2 per cent. in one year, and that the wages paid are from 4d. per day, whereas white labourers earn from 5s. to 8s. per day; whether he is aware that several islands of the New Hebrides have been almost depopulated by this inhuman trade; and whether the Government will take steps to prevent what is virtually the revival of the slave trade under our flag?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government understand that the Queensland Legislature have passed a Bill for allowing the re-introduction of South Sea island labour to the colony; but no copy of the measure has yet been received. It is understood, however, that the Queensland Government are fully sensible of the necessity for stringent regulations for the protection of the labourers. The Commission to which the hon. Member refers did not investigate the whole subject of the traffic, but it embraced an inquiry into three voyages, including that of the Hopeful, in which labour was recruited from the Louisiade Group and other islands adjacent to New Guinea. The Queensland Government, after the Report of the Commission, took measures for returning to their homes the whole of the surviving labourers recruited on these voyages. The hon. Member will find Papers on these subjects in the Blue Books [C. 4,584 and C. 5,883]. The hon. Member will see that there were special features in connection with these voyages, upon which a general condemnation of Polynesian labour could not fairly be based.

We believe that such a petition as that mentioned in the third paragraph of the question was made, but not on the grounds stated by the hon. Member. It was alleged that the evidence on which the prisoners were convicted was unsatisfactory and insufficient to establish their guilt. The men were released, but I am not aware that there was any intention to give them a public banquet. As regards paragraph four, I do not find any statement to this effect in the Report of the Commission; but there appears to have been an exceptional mortality among the labourers recruited by the particular ships I have referred to. The money wage may be as stated in the question, but it must be borne in mind that the expense of the Polynesian labourer includes food, clothing, and lodging, and the cost of the return voyage as well as of the voyage to the colony. It is believed that the population of the islands of the Pacific generally is diminishing; but there are other causes at work, and in the absence of authentic records it is not possible to say to what extent particular islands may have suffered a loss of population from recruiting. Her Majesty's Government will support the Queensland authorities in any measures they may take to surround the engagement and employment of these men with proper safeguards; and if due precautions are taken, it should be possible to regulate the traffic without the evils which the hon. Member anticipates.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: In consequence of this very unsatisfactory reply, and in consequence of the Government sanction of what is practically a renewal of the slave trade, I give notice that I will call attention to this matter again.

MR. HOWARD (Middlesex, Tottenham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state what the reasons are which have induced Sir Samuel Griffiths to remove the prohibition against the introduction of Polynesian labour into the colony of Queensland; and whether, having regard to the kidnapping and crime inseparable from this traffic, and brought to light by a Royal Commission, he will take steps to induce the Premier to reconsider his determination?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The reasons assigned by Sir Samuel Griffiths are that there are not at present in Queensland a sufficient number of Europeans able and willing to do the necessary work, and that, in consequence, the sugar industry is suffering, and the productiveness of the lands of the colony will be diminished. I have answered the remainder of the question in my reply to the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith).

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN IRELAND.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps have been taken to provide labourers' cottages in the Inchigeela and Ballingearry districts of the Macroom Union; whether he is aware that at least 20 labourers cottages are wanted in these districts; and how many cottages have been built in these places?

*MR. JACKSON: I am informed that 291 labourers' cottages have already been built in the Macroom Union. The Guardians appear to contemplate the provision of eighteen cottages for the two Electoral Divisions named. Of these, two have been erected, while, as regards the remaining sixteen, the Local Government Board understand the necessary arbitration proceedings, prior to entering into possession of the lands, have been taken by the Guardians.

DR. TANNER: Have not several requests been made by the people of the district, who are very poor, that facilities should be given to the Guardians to acquire land upon which to build cottages?

*MR. JACKSON: I am not aware that there has been any difficulty on the part of the Guardians in this matter.

PRESENTATIONS TO SONS OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

CAPTAIN PRICE: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Exeter, as a Charity Commissioner, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the correspondence between the Charity Commissioners and the Governors of Christ's Hospital, with reference to presentations to sons of naval officers?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter has asked me to state on his behalf that he has no correspondence upon the subject to lay on the Table.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the following extract from the Report of the Director of the National Gallery for the year 1891:—

"Meanwhile the collection has been and is being increased by the acquisition, through bequest as well as by purchase, of numerous pictures, for which absolutely no space exists on the walls nor could be provided even at the fatal cost of breaking up the present classification; the adapting of hanging screens as an alternative has had the unfortunate effect of crowding the galleries and impeding the circulation of visitors: it will be impossible to employ this expedient further without causing serious inconvenience"; and whether he can now inform the House what answer Government proposes to give to the memorial of the Trustees, complaining of the increasing inadequacy of space for hanging pictures in the Gallery, and the danger from fire to which the collection is exposed from its close contiguity with St. George's Barracks?

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): Replying also to a similar question on this subject by Mr. Kenrick, said: The memorial of the Trustees of the National Gallery has received, and will continue to receive, the careful attention of Her Majesty's Government; and while we cannot agree that the want of space is at this moment as absolutely urgent as the Trustees insist that it is, we fully admit that the time will soon come when some addition must be made to the existing buildings. That subject will have to be considered—and I may say is now being considered—in connection with the future arrangements as to St. George's Barracks. Under these circumstances, I cannot add much to the answer I gave the hon. Member last year, except to say that the additional precautions against fire which I then promised have since been carried out.

DR. FARQUHARSON: Does the right hon. Gentleman really believe that anything short of the total demolition of these barracks will remove the risk of fire from the National Gallery? I should also like to know whether the Gallery is only separated by a not particularly thick wall from that portion of the barracks which contains the canteen, the sergeants' mess, and the married couples' quarters?

*MR. PLUNKET: I did not know that the married couples' quarters are particularly inflammable; but, as I have already informed the hon. Member, we have taken every possible precaution to protect the adjacent part of the National Gallery. I may also say that the future of the barracks is under consideration at the War Office.

POLITICAL ECONOMY IN IRISH SCHOOL BOOKS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has noticed a resolution of the Belfast United Trades' Council, adopted at a special meeting on the 2nd ultimo, declaring certain passages in the Lessons on Political Economy in the Fifth Book of the Irish Commissioners of National Education to be contrary to the fact and prejudicial to working men who are Trade Unionists; whether he has observed by the selection of extracts from the Fifth Book circulated by a Special Committee of the Belfast Trades' Council that the lessons in question contain a number of absurd or inaccurate propositions and statements, as, for instance, that if a law were made to fix the rent of land, the only effect would be that the landlord would no longer let his land, and whether this passage was brought years ago to the notice of the House of Commons; whether, at the instance of the London Trades' Council, passages of an analogous character were many years since struck out of the school books in use in England; and whether the Irish school books will now be revised, with a view to expunging propositions and statements which are manifestly absurd or grossly incorrect?

MR. JACKSON: The Commissioners of National Education report that the Fifth Book is at present under revision, and that the Lessons on Political Economy will be revised.

MR. SEXTON: If this revision is not properly carried out, I shall ask for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the matter.

THE PAY OF SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether, in view of the fact that the establishment of a preparatory grade in the scheme of the intermediate examinations for the present year will considerably add to the already onerous duties of the superintendents at these examinations, it is the intention of the Intermediate Board to increase the remuneration paid to superintendents to £20, the amount given them for the first four years of the Board's existence?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that it is not proposed to make any alteration in the scale of remuneration.

MR. SEXTON: Is it a fact that superintendents take only £15, out of which they are expected to pay their hotel bills and travelling expenses? I should also like to know whether, if the Board have plenty of money, they will not return to the earlier amount?

MR. JACKSON: I should not prescribe to the Board how they should pay the superintendents. They must know better than anyone else what should be paid to those officials.

PUBLIC MEETINGS IN SCHOOLROOMS.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, in view of the difficulty that still exists in some places of obtaining the use of schoolrooms for public meetings, he will cause a copy of the unanimous Resolution of the House in favour of the right of public meeting in elementary schools to be circulated amongst school managers?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The object of the Resolution was not, as I understood it, to confer a general right of public meeting in any school-house, unfettered by any securities against misuse and irrespective of there being any other suitable buildings available, and I cannot, therefore, assent to the issue of the suggested Circular; but, judging from the number of letters I have received from persons who are alarmed at the possible effects of the Resolution, I do not think it stands in need of any further advertisement.

MR. H. GARDNER: Notwithstanding the Resolution of the House and the fact that the Government are about to bring in a Bill on the subject, does the right hon. Gentleman know there have been a number of cases of refusal for the use of schoolrooms in various parts of the Kingdom?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: If that is the fact, it only shows that there is a necessity for the introduction of a Bill on the subject.

ALLOWANCE IN LIEU OF OFFICERS' MESS.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary, War Department, whether Militia regiments quartered in barracks where there is no officers' messroom or mess accommodation, are entitled to the allowance in lieu of officers' mess accommodation prescribed in the Army Allowance Regulations, 1891; and, if not, whether he will be good enough to state the reason?

MR. BRODRICK: The Army Allowance Regulations do not apply to the Militia when disembodied. Officers of Militia receive an allowance of 4s. a day, under the Militia Regulations, to cover all mess expenses, including the hire of mess accommodation when it may happen that none is provided.

SALARIES OF INDIAN OFFICIALS.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what is the amount of the yearly salary and allowances of the Financial Member of the Council of the Governor-General, of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and of the Governors of Madras and Bombay respectively; for what period of years do these officers hold their appointments, and under what Statute or Regulation; what are the amounts of the retiring allowances or pensions to which these officers are respectively entitled on vacating the said appointments; can more than one such allowance or pension be held by an officer who has held more than one of these or similar appointments in succession; and what is the shortest period of service in each of these appointments which qualifies an officer for such allowance or pension?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The Member of Council in charge of the Financial Department draws a salary of Rs.76,000, without allowances. The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal receives Rs.100,000, with allowances of Rs.9,750. The Governors of Madras and Bombay receive Rs.120,000, with sumptuary and household establishment allowances of Rs.95,000 and Rs.93,000 respectively. All these officers are appointed for five years, but in very exceptional cases the term has been extended for one or two years. The Lieutenant-Governor is appointed by the Governor-General, subject to Her Majesty's approval under 21 & 22 Vic., c. 106, s. 29. The Governors of Madras and Bombay and Members of the Governor-General's Council are appointed by Her Majesty by Warrant under 21 & 22 Vic., c. 106, s. 29; 24 & 25 Vic., c. 67, s. 3; 32 & 33 Vic., c. 97, s. 8. There is no retiring allowance or pension attached to any of these offices. But if they are held by a member of the Indian Civil Service or an officer of the Army, he receives the ordinary annuity or pension under the Rules.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. ROYDEN (Liverpool, West Toxteth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether a Railway Company can, without infringing the conditions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act as to preferential rates, differentiate in the rates of carriage between different articles in the same class?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: This is a question of law, upon which a general answer could not properly be given. It does not necessarily follow that because articles are in the same class they are "same or similar merchandise" within the meaning of Section 27 of the Act of 1888.

THE CASE OF DAVID FREEMAN.

MR. MILD MAY (Devon, Totnes): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the fact that David Freeman, of Kingston, South Devon, invalided from the Raleigh at the beginning of last year after seven years' service, in consequence of a complete breakdown of his health, was granted a pension of 6d. a day for twelve months, during which time he was constantly ill; whether, on his presenting himself, last February, at the Royal Naval Hospital, Stonehouse, for a renewal of his pension, he was told that such fellows as he ought to work, and was further informed that his small pension would be reduced; whether he is aware that Freeman died a fortnight ago, within two months of this deprivation of pension; and whether he will make inquiry into the circumstances of the case so as to prevent the possibility of the recurrence of such treatment?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Member seems to have been misinformed in regard to the circumstances. I have made particular inquiry into the case, and the facts are as follows: David Freeman, A.B., after having served in the Royal Navy for only five and a half years, showed last year symptoms of rapid consumption, and was accordingly invalided from the Service. His disease being in no way attributable to extraordinary exposure or exertion on service, he was granted a temporary pension from naval funds of 6½d. a day for 15 months, the maximum allowed by the Regulations. On the expiration of this period, his health not having improved, Freeman was granted an allowance of 6d. a day from Greenwich Hospital Funds, and he was in receipt of this special pension at the time of his death. It is very improbable that the medical officer made any such remark as that alleged, as it was on this officer's certificate, stating that Freeman was in indifferent health and almost unable to contribute to his own support, that assistance was given to him from the charitable funds of Greenwich Hospital.

SHEERNESS DOCKYARD.

MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether ships of war, fitted out at Sheerness Dockyard, are taken to Chatham for commission when ready for sea; whether this is in conformity with the practice of former years; whether complaints have reached him that this practice puts the town and trade of Sheerness at a great disadvantage; and whether he can arrange for a fair share of commissions to be given to Sheerness?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: Under the complete scheme of mobilisation which has been recently introduced, the object of the changes made has been to collect and keep together in an efficient state the ships, men, and stores of the Reserve. In consequence, the ships fitted out at Sheerness, when passed out of the Dockyard hands, are placed in the Fleet Reserve at Chatham, where the depôts of men, stores, &c., are also placed, and where there are extensive basins and other appliances useful for the purpose of rapid commissioning. This arrangement has worked well and economically, and no departure from it would be now feasible, as it would permanently disturb the whole principle of rapid mobilisation. On the other hand, a new Gunnery School has been established at Sheerness, which will have the effect of increasing the number of men permanently maintained in the port, and, further, a large number of second class stokers are now stationed at the Naval Barracks there for training.

ASSAULTS IN RAILWAY CARRIAGES.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the cases of assault and alleged assault upon women in railway carriages, he will consider the advisability of taking such steps as may be necessary to secure that there shall be on all trains efficient communication with the guard or driver, and that such communication shall be made available from the interior of the carriages as is already the case on some English and many foreign railways?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: As I have already stated, in reply to a question of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, efficient means of communication are now required by Statute to be provided in all passenger trains which travel more than twenty miles without stopping; and, as at present advised, I am not prepared to propose an extension of the law, though the matter will be carefully watched.

MR. SUMMERS: In the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman are the present arrangements efficient?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir; I think so.

PATENTS IN ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is able to give the House any information with regard to the number of patents secured by Englishmen in the United States during the last five years, and also with regard to the number of patents in the same period that have been originally secured by Englishmen in the United States and afterwards taken out in the United Kingdom?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I understand that the number of patents issued by the United States Patent Office to citizens of the United Kingdom during the five years 1887 to 1891, was 3,394, but I have no means of furnishing the information asked for in the second part of the hon. Member's question.

Lord G. Hamilton

ALLOTMENTS FOR LABOURERS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many labourers cottages have been built in the Millstreet Union; and whether, in the event of any schemes now being under consideration in this and other Unions in Ireland, the increased allotment of one acre can be given to the labourers?

*MR. JACKSON: The number of cottages built in the Millstreet Union is 108. It will not be practicable for Boards of Guardians to grant the increased allotment of land until the enabling Bill becomes law.

DR. TANNER: Could the new Act be adopted by the Guardians in regard to the schemes now in preparation?

*MR. JACKSON: If any steps were taken, or if the Privy Council had sanctioned the scheme, the new Act could be applied.

THE RE-AFFORESTATION OF IRELAND.

MR. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a proposal to purchase additional land at Knockboy, County Galway, for the purpose of planting trees, which has been brought under his attention, has resulted in the acquisition by the Congested Districts Board of any further land for re-forestation; if so, what further area is at the disposal of the Board, and at what pace are the planting operations being carried out?

*MR. JACKSON: The Committee of the Congested Districts Board has been appointed to examine into and report upon the forestry operations at Knockboy. The question of purchasing additional land will not be taken into consideration until the Report of the Committee has been received.

PIERS IN SUTHERLAND.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to introduce a Bill under the General Pier and Harbour Act to confirm the Provisional Orders relative to the proposed harbours at Talmine, Skerry, and Portskerra, in the County of Sutherland?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I hope to introduce next week a Bill to confirm the Provisional Orders relative to the three piers in Sutherland. Delay has been caused by the omission of the promoters to comply with statutory requirements.

GIBRALTAR SANITARY BOARD.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will state whether any, and, if so, what, concessions have been made to the deputation from the Gibraltar Ratepayers' Association?

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is the intention of the Secretary of State to amend the Sanitary Order Amendment Order, Gibraltar, 1891, in the following manner:—

"That the civilian representatives on the Sanitary Board of Gibraltar shall be selected by the Governor from a panel presented by the Grand Jury, and that Clause 17 of the said Order, which gives extraordinary powers to the Governor in the case of special works, be repealed"?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I will answer both these questions at the same time. The Secretary of State has been anxious to meet as far as possible the wishes of the Gibraltar Ratepayers' Association; and if he can be assured that they will withdraw further opposition to the Order in Council, he will be prepared to make the concessions referred to by the hon. Member for Huddersfield. With regard to the first of those concessions, it is of course to be understood that the amendment will not vacate the seats of the present members of the Board of Sanitary Commissioners.

MR. CAUSTON: Is that the only concession the Secretary for the Colonies can make?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Yes.

CUSTOMS OFFICERS' MEMORIALS.

MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Board of Customs, by their Order of 16th April, 1892, directed that certain examining officers—who, on the 9th March, 1892, asked the Board of Customs to transmit to the Lords of the Treasury certain Memorials addressed to their Lordships—

"be informed that they cannot comply with their request, that the Memorials may be forwarded by the Board to the Treasury, and they cannot allow any appeal to the Treasury";

whether the officers, by forwarding their Memorials direct to their Lordships, accompanied by a copy of the Board's refusal, are correctly interpreting the views of the Treasury, as shown in Treasury Minute, dated 26th February, 1866; and, whether the Memorials will be returned to the officers by the Board of Customs for transmission to the Treasury by the memorialists?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The facts stated in the first paragraph are correct. The Board of Customs refused to forward the Memorials in question to the Treasury, since they regarded them as appealing against a decision which had been arrived at after the most exhaustive investigation by a Departmental Committee of Inquiry. It is open to the officials in question to forward their Memorials direct to the Treasury; but, as the Minute of 1866 states, it will rest with my Lords to consider whether the communication was one which should be addressed to them. The Board of Customs will have no objection to copies of the Memorial being given to the memorialists.

EDINBURGH AND LEITH ARTILLERY DEPOTS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary, War Department, whether it is the case that the barrack accommodation in Edinburgh and Leith is very unsatisfactory, and that, in consequence, the Royal Artillery Depôt at Leith is to be moved to Montrose; and whether it is the intention of the Government to spend any of the money under the Barrack Act in increasing the Barracks at Edinburgh and Leith; and, if not, why they are not doing so?

*MR. BRODRICK: The Royal Artillery Depôt at Leith is to be moved to Montrose in order to be in closer touch with the Militia, and not on account of the condition of the Barracks at Leith. The Barracks at Edinburgh are of an old type, but by intended re-appropriation after the removal of the Ordnance stores to another station, better accommodation will be obtained. Money obtained under the Barrack Act will not be expended on the Leith or Edinburgh Barracks, as it is more urgently required at other stations.

DR. CLARK: Is it intended to rebuild some part of the Barracks?

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Are the Barracks at present insufficient in their accommodation?

*MR. BRODRICK: There will be more accommodation when the Ordnance stores are removed.

NAVAL RETURNS.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has re-considered the difficulty experienced by Members of this House, and Her Majesty's subjects generally, in obtaining information as to the history and commissions of high class ships of Her Majesty's Navy; whether he can now give any hope that a Return will be furnished, giving a complete list of ships fit for active service, the dates at which they were ordered, reported ready, commissioned, paid out, and re-commissioned, together with the stations and services on which they have been employed; and whether, if such a Return is moved for, he will give it a favourable consideration?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I have had a Return prepared which the hon. Gentleman can have upon moving for it, though I do not think it adds much to information already available.

THE ALLOTMENTS RENT.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Government can grant a Return from the registers under Section 15 of The Allotment Act, 1887, showing the rent per acre of the allotments which have been let since the Allotments Act came into operation, or whether he can say what is the average rent paid per acre on the whole of these allotments?

*MR. RITCHIE (who replied) said: Neither the Local Government Board nor the Board of Agriculture has any information as to the rent per acre charged in respect of the several allotments which have been acquired under the Allotments Act, 1887. I am not, therefore, able to state what is the average rent paid for those allotments. I do not see that there would be any advantage in obtaining the Return suggested. If the hon. Member desires information as to any particular allotment, I shall be happy to endeavour to obtain it for him.

CHARGES AGAINST SCHOOLMASTERS.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he can give the result of the special inquiries he undertook to make as to the discharge of their duties by Mr. A. Park, Head Master of the Albion Schools, Ashton-under-Lyne, Mr. E. Barlow, Head Master of the Parochial Schools, Ashton-under-Lyne, and Mr. Alderman Rudyard, principal teacher of the National Schools, Stalybridge; whether he can give any information as to the condition and efficiency of these schools, and as to the manner in which these gentlemen discharge their duties; and whether the conditions of the New Code have been, in all respects, satisfied?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I have received a special Report from the Inspector, in which he speaks in the highest terms of the efficiency of the schools in question, and on the ability and attention to duty displayed by the gentlemen whose conduct was impugned by the hon. Member for Northampton. The conditions of the New Code have in every respect been satisfied.

LORD WANTAGE'S COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North-West): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he will be able to fix a day for the discussion of Lord Wantage's Committee's Report on the terms and conditions of Service in the Army?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Had my hon. Friend put this question yesterday, I should have said definitely that this discussion would take place without fail before Whitsuntide, and even now I should be prepared to find a day for the discussion ; but I regret to say that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) is indisposed, and cannot I fear, for some weeks, be in his place in the House. I still hope, however, that he will be able to be here some day before Whitsuntide, and in that case I should fix the discussion in accordance with the original understanding. If, unfortunately, he cannot be here before Whitsuntide, I will choose the earliest possible day afterwards.

PRISON CLOTHES.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the female members of the Salvation Army who were imprisoned under the provisions of the Eastbourne Improvement Act, 1885, were required to wear prison clothes during their imprisonment?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.) : In accordance with the 23rd Rule, 1st Schedule of the Prison Act of 1865, these prisoners were required to wear prison clothes.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) : Arising out of the question, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is now prepared either to introduce, or to assent to, legislation placing first-class misdemeanants in this category.

MR. MATTHEWS : No. Nothing has occurred to alter the answer I have previously made to the hon. Member.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN AND THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN : I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of calling attention to a question of urgent and public importance—namely, the restriction of trade and industry in respect to the unjustifiable refusal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal on equal terms, in regard to Crown Royalties, with persons engaged in the mining industry in this country.

*MR. SPEAKER : The hon. Member is not in order. He has this evening got a notice down traversing the Second Reading of a Bill on the Orders of the Day to the effect "That, in the opinion of this House, no legislation will be satisfactory that does not deal fully with the administration of the Mines Royal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN : With the permission of the House I will withdraw the Motion.

*MR. SPEAKER : Order, order ! The hon. Gentleman cannot do it.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN : Well, then, Mr. Speaker—

*MR. SPEAKER : The hon. Gentleman is not in order.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN : As a personal matter, I submit that the language used by the right hon. Gentleman towards me was not such as was right in coming from a right hon. Gentleman occupying the position of one of the administrators of the affairs of this country ; and upon that ground, with your permission, I will move the Adjournment of the House for a personal explanation.

*MR. SPEAKER : The hon. Gentleman is not in order. He complains of an expression used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and there is no doubt that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will render an explanation of the expression which has given the hon. Gentleman offence.

*MR. GOSCHEN : I understand that while I left the House for a moment the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil complained of some of the language used by me. I should be sorry to wound the feelings of any hon. Gentleman. I spoke of martyrdom, and I presume he does not object to the use of the word.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN : You have always been insolent to me ever since I have been a Member of this House.

*MR. SPEAKER : Order, order !

*MR. GOSCHEN : I spoke of martyrdom. (Cries of "Sordid.") Does the hon. Member object to that word ? I presume, then, that the word he objects to is "sordid." While I did not apply that term to the hon. Member personally, I thought that the whole proceedings connected with an execution, the selling of an hon. Gentleman's goods, had a kind of sordid aspect. As, however, I do not wish even to seem to apply the expression to the hon. Member I readily withdraw it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): Perhaps I may be permitted to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give us any information with respect to next week, and when we may expect to go into Committee on the Small Holdings Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My hope is, unless business to-day and to-morrow takes a most unsatisfactory turn, that we may on Monday continue and finish with the Committee stage of the Small Holdings Bill. The only possible exception I imagine to the continued discussion on that stage will be that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite may desire the Budget discussion. I may say that I have received a private communication from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, who is anxious that the Debate should not be taken before Thursday next, and I shall not, therefore, in any case, take it before that day.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to make an inquiry partly as to order and partly in the interest of the convenience of the House. The House will observe that the name of the Attorney General appears in connection with the discharge of an Order on the Criminal Evidence Bill. The House has already gone into Committee on that Bill, and I wish to ask whether it is in accordance with usage, under those circumstances, that there should be a Motion to abolish the Committee stage of the Bill? Then as to the question of convenience. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House will remember that last Tuesday he said the first business to-day would be the Committee on the Criminal Evidence Bill, or so we understood him. Upon that understanding Members have prepared their Amendments, and, coming down with the intention of proceeding with the Committee stage, find themselves confronted with a Motion to abolish the Committee stage of the Bill, by placing it before a Law Committee upstairs. I should like to know whether that is considered fair and convenient?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand the hon. Member makes two complaints against me. One is as to the answer I gave on Tuesday.

MR. SEXTON: Not against you.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I, however, am responsible for the alteration, and, therefore, am the one who must reply. The answer I then made is clear in my recollection, although it had to be given at a great speed owing to the hour. I stated that the first Order would be the Criminal Evidence Bill, but I did not say the Committee stage. I understand, in addition to that, the hon. Member thinks I have not given sufficient notice, and he says that the Motion only appeared on the Paper this morning. That is undoubtedly true. I have thought, and still think, that a formal application of this kind of Notice is not required. The last desire I have is to force out any discussion, and, after the appeal made to me by the hon. Member, I shall be prepared to take the Motion as first Order to-morrow instead of to-day.

MR. KNOX: I wish to know whether it will be competent for any Member, upon this Motion being put, to give Notice to-day that on the Motion being put to-morrow he will move an Instruction?

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice for an Instruction to a Standing Committee will not attach to any Order of the Day, but will be an independent Motion.

MR. SEXTON: Then if the Bill were referred to a Standing Committee, it would be competent afterwards to move an Instruction to the Committee?

*MR. SPEAKER: It would be perfectly in order.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On a point of order, and to prevent any misconception, do I understand your ruling to be that the Notice of Motion which is made by a Private Member would stand with Private Motions, and would come on with them, and would not come next in order to the Government Notice? I thought the hon. Gentleman gathered that he would have a right, if the Motion were carried, to move this Instruction. I understand your ruling to be that would not be so—that he would only have the privilege of a Private Member, and would have to ballot for his place.

*MR. SPEAKER: I said a Motion for an Instruction would be an independent Motion, without precedence.

MR. SEXTON: Then it will be merely a matter of chance, and the right of a Member to move an Instruction to a Committee of this House will be destroyed?

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice will have to be given of the Instruction. The Motion will be subject to the ballot. I understand the hon. Member asked me as to a point of order.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to know whether it is in order to move to discharge an Order in Committee upon a Bill the House has already gone into?

*MR. SPEAKER: It is unusual, but no progress was actually made.

MR. KNOX: As it appears from the Notice Paper to-day, progress had actually been made with this Bill. The Chairman had reported Progress on the 4th April.

*MR. SPEAKER: That is the technical expression. The Chairman of Committees must report something. He reports "Progress" although no progress may have been actually made—no progress, in the present case, was actually made.

Motion postponed till To-morrow.

*MR. GOSCHEN: There is a Notice of Motion standing in my name for to-night, as to the Financial Relations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and I think I may persuade my right hon. Friend to stop the Business of the House at about eleven o'clock this evening. It would then be competent for any other hon. Member to bring on the Orders of the Day, and, if so, we might be able to get to the Motion. If it is impossible to bring it on before twelve o'clock, my right hon. Friend may suspend Government business at six o'clock to-morrow in order to take the Motion. My right hon. Friend says, however, there must be a distinct understanding that unless there is fair progress with business we shall not be able to stop.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EDUCATION AND LOCAL TAXATION RELIEF (SCOTLAND) BILL—(No. 208.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 3rd May.]

Considered in Committee.

Clause 2.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name, in page 2, line 35, to leave out the words "Parochial Boards," and insert the words "County Councils and Town Councils." The object of this Amendment is to secure that the whole of the money shall not be disposed of in this Bill, but shall have the advantage of the applications provided for County and Town Councils. So far as concerns the people who live in the rural districts, there is substantially no difference whether this money be given to the Parochial Boards or to the County Councils if the money is applied to the relief of the rates, with one important exception—that in connection with the County Councils there are certain rates which are payable exclusively by the owners. To these I presume the County Councils will not be permitted to apply any portion of this money. By this proposal £75,000 of Imperial money is to be devoted to the poor rate. Now, of the £75,000, at least £37,500 comes out of the pocket of what I may describe as the working class, which represents 73 or 75 per cent. of the population of Scotland. How much of the money you are distributing will that 75 per cent. obtain? Out of the £50,000, £25,000 goes at one fell swoop into the pockets of the owners of land, and the remaining £25,000 is distributed among occupiers and according to valuation. If we take 75 per cent. of the occupiers of dwelling houses in Scotland, we find that the total rent which they pay is under £2,900,000. The total valuation of Scotland is 24 millions a year, and we find the rateable value occupied by 75 per cent. of the population of Scotland is less than three millions. That is to say it is less than one-eighth. Consequently three-fourths of the people of Scotland will not receive more than a sum that will slightly exceed £3,000 out of the total of £75,000, which it is proposed to distribute among the Parochial Boards. A fair valuation would show that three-fourths of the people of Scotland must have paid one-half of the £75,000, or £37,500, so that the great bulk of the voters in Scotland will be deprived of £34,000. Well that is a gross injustice. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate to contradict these figures if he can. I do not mean that he shall merely get up and say they are wrong: anyone can do that; but I challenge him to prove they are wrong. Now, Sir, that is the main point of my objection, but the other point of my objection relates to the persons who are going to receive this money—namely, the landlords. Now what will be the effect of making a present of £25,000 a year to the landlords of Scotland? Why, that when the property comes to change hands they will get a higher price for the property. That is a self-evident proposition. You cannot take a tax off land without putting into the pockets of the immediate possessor the whole capitalised value of that reduction. On the other hand, if you impose a tax on landed property the whole capitalised value of that tax necessarily falls upon the persons who happen to be the owners at the time. Well, I contend that to raise money by Imperial taxes which are not required for Imperial expenditure is an abuse of the powers of Government. To raise money in that fashion for the purpose of relieving the poor would be an injustice, but to raise money in that fashion for the purpose of oppressing the poor and relieving the rich, is about the most wicked thing that any body of men can do. On the grounds I have stated I maintain that we should reject this clause, or at all events we should substitute County Councils and Town Councils for Parochial Boards, because then, under the concession which has been made by the Government, there will be an alternative to the application of this money for the relief of the rates, and even if the Councils should, under the powers they have obtained, prefer to devote the money to the relief of the rates, their conduct would not lie at the doors of the Government or at my own. Therefore I beg to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 35, to leave out the words "Parochial Boards," and insert the words "County Councils and Town Councils."—(Mr. Hunter.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Unless this Amendment is carried, we shall be increasing at once the value of the land in Scotland by a million sterling. £37,500 will go into the hands of the landlords, and that, at 25 years' purchase, is a million of money. Now, will the Government give us some good reason for their proposal to increase the value of the landlords' property? Some of us are desirous of seeing a change in our land tenure, hoping by that means to make the most of the land; and we think, too, that the great increase in the land values due to the increase of population and the increase of wealth should go to the people who create it, and not to the few who enjoy the monopoly now. There are two ways of bringing that state of things about. One is by confiscation, and the other is by purchase. I am in favour of the principle of purchase; but if you are going, in the way I have pointed out, to add to the value of what we are going to purchase, then some of us will require to reconsider our decision. Surely the Lord Advocate, or some other right hon. Gentleman, will give us a reason for the course the Government propose to adopt, and why they do not agree to what I consider to be a fair compromise. As far as the next section is concerned, in which the distribution of £100,000 is dealt with, they have taken away the bulk of our opposition, and I think they should amend the proposal now before us, and agree to make the distribution on the basis of population instead of valuation. And why should they not agree to this fair and reasonable proposal of my hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter), that the whole of this money should go to County Councils and Town Councils to be used by them either for the reduction of rates or for such other purposes as the Secretary for Scotland may consider desirable? The Government have made no actual compromise. The only thing they have done is to give a freer hand to the County Council in spending the money. I trust that the Government will allow this money to go to the County Councils and Town Councils who will be able to utilise it far better than the Parochial Boards, and that they will not allow the money to go at once into the pockets of the landlords.

*MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I rise to support the proposal of the Government, and I do so in the hope that the grant will have the effect of giving to Parochial Boards a little more money to follow out their natural inclination of adding somewhat to the comforts of the poor in various respects. Though I am sure these Boards are desirous of doing all they can for the poor, yet, as the House will readily understand, they are compelled at times to hesitate before placing any additional burden on the rates. Feeling sure that this money will be spent in a good direction, I give my cordial support to the grant.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): With reference to the remarks of the hon. Member (Mr. Barclay) who has just sat down, there is no doubt that the Parochial Boards will be able to take action in the way indicated by the hon. Member, although we do not propose in the Bill to limit or direct their action. As to the speech of the hon. Member who moved the Amendment, I think it is not quite relevant to the subject, and it would be inappropriate to the present discussion to enter into such a large question as he has raised. It is still less my duty to follow the hon. Member in the figures he has given, because this is the third time during the present Session that we have had an expression of opinion upon practically the same point as that which the hon. Member has raised. Therefore, I feel relieved from repeating to the House the arguments already submitted in answer. I will only say that if we were to split up our proposals in the way that has been attempted, we should require to investigate into the application of all the sums of money that are to be allocated, in order to ascertain how far the other proposals in the Bill operate to benefit the poor, and how far to benefit the rich. Many claims have been urged for sharing in this fund, and it was considered right that what may be called the lion's share should be given to County and Burgh Councils in order that they might use it as they deemed fit. I must say that the Amendment is not one I can accept. The hon. Member seems to forget that while the County Councils and Town Councils get as much money as they can out of the fund they have all along been willing to recognise the right of the Parochial Boards to some of it, and therefore I ask the Committee to assent to this proposed distribution of £50,000.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): This is a question as between popular representative bodies and non-representative bodies, and we have much more confidence in the former than in the latter. But the matter has now become additionally complicated owing to the Government having agreed to give the County Councils and Town Councils, the power of applying the money going to them to purposes of general public utility. The Parochial Boards, on the other hand, will have to apply it to the relief of the rates, which we object to on financial principles generally. We also feel that the County Council, when they get the money, will be driven by popular opinion to apply it, not for the relief of the rates, but for other purposes of public utility. And we have, therefore, a stronger ground now than at first to desire the County Councils rather than the Parochial Boards to have this sum. It is said that if the Parochial Boards get this money more will perhaps be done for the poor than is done now. We desire that the poor should be liberally dealt with, but that is the duty of the Parochial Boards. We ought not to be told that it is necessary to get a grant from the Imperial Exchequer in order that they may do that which it is their duty to do.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E): If the Government will concede that this money shall be given to the Parochial Boards only on the condition that they apply it to some purposes for which it is not applicable at the present time, we should have no objection to the grant, except the objection that these Boards are not properly elected bodies. I hope it may be possible for the Government to make a concession in the direction of giving this money for the better education, for instance, of pauper children.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): The hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) has endeavoured to put a gloss on the words of the Bill. The Bill confines the Parochial Boards to using the proposed grant for the relief of the poor rates, but the hon. Member for Forfarshire says it does not mean that, but that the Parochial Boards may give additional comforts to the poor in the various parishes. If that view is accepted by the right hon. Gentleman opposite then the words "to relieve the local rates" are meaningless, and it seems to me, Mr. Courtney, that this is an undesirable encouragement to hold out to these Parochial Boards. Again and again have Bills been introduced into this House for reforming these bodies and putting them on a representative basis, and again and again they have been rejected by hon. Members on the other side of the House. If those Boards were representative we should not have so much objection to this proposal. To bodies like these we entirely object to give money, especially when we discover that this money is to be given not only for the relief of the rates, but for the purpose of encouraging further extravagance. I hope the House will reject the proposal, and will support the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend.

(5.31.) MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I regret that the Government do not accept this proposal to take this money from the Parochial Boards and give it either to the County Councils or to some other body. I agree with the right hon. Member for Berwickshire, that the present constitution of Parochial Boards is thoroughly unsatisfactory. He has spoken for the country districts, and we may speak equally for the towns. In the country you either have a very small body, or else the numbers are so great as to be totally unwieldy. In the towns there is a wholly unsatisfactory system of election in which no one takes any interest. In the largest parishes in Glasgow and Govan the number of votes given have been almost preposterously small. Therefore I consider the constitution of these Boards is unsatisfactory; and, further, I think that the objects for which these Boards spend the money are not objects on behalf of which we can ask for any sympathy. The burden of the poor rates is a steady burden, and has been for a long time a diminishing burden. The only part of it which shows any increase is the charge for pauper lunatics, and I quite approve of the grant of £25,000 to relieve that burden, and gave my vote for it. These charges have recently risen very rapidly; but if you take the whole charge for the relief and maintenance of the poor, and leave out the charge for pauper lunatics, you will find it has very considerably diminished of late years. In 1887 the total amount paid for the relief of paupers, excluding lunatics, was £633,000; now it is £597,000. The population has increased largely and the actual charge has diminished, and even if you include the lunatics there is a decrease, because of the increased population and the increased valuation. In 1858 the poor rate was 1s. in the £, and the charge per head was 4s. 1d. Now the charge per head is just about the same, and the charge in the £ has gone down slowly and gradually to 8½d. The whole charge has increased very little while the valuation has doubled. It was £12,000,000 and it is now £24,000,000. If you take off this charge for pauper lunatics the rate of decrease of the poor rate would be something very considerable. Then it is urged that this money which is given to Parochial Boards will be spent on schemes which are outside the relief of the rates. I think that would be giving a dangerous power. Two special objects are mentioned. One is giving trained nurses to the poor and improving the hospitals; but this is a very small object. The amount contributed last year for trained nurses was only about £1,000, and I question whether it is necessary to spend any more. Then it is proposed to increase the grant to widows who are left with children. That is a form of outdoor relief which, coming from a source outside the rates, would be very dangerous. You can trust the Parochial Boards to manage money economically when they have to raise it themselves; but I should be afraid to trust them with money which drops from heaven in the form of a Government grant. I do not feel that this is a proper channel for using this money, and I believe it is not necessary to expend it in relief of the rates.

(5.35.) MR. ARTHUR ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I agree with much that has been said about the constitution of these Parochial Boards, and I do not think that anyone can be satisfied with it. But the question is not how we should constitute the Parochial Boards, but how we should relieve the parochial ratepayers. It is the greatest fallacy to argue, as has been argued here to-day, that no one but the landlord benefits by the lightening of the parochial rates. The rates are shared by the owner and occupier, and they are largely paid by farmers. I have constantly found in the rural parishes considerable pressure from the rates, and I think, while so much is being done in one direction, the Government are perfectly right in seeing that some portion of this money goes in relief of these heavily-burdened people. A good deal may be said about Parochial Boards; but I would urge upon the Government that the parochial ratepayers are worth some consideration, and I hope they will adhere to the proposal contained in the Bill.

(5.38.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): The hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) pointed out that this money might be spent in some way outside the local rates.

MR. BARCLAY: I did not make that suggestion.

MR. R. T. REID: I understood him to say so; but what I want to point out is that under this clause the Parochial Boards are required to spend this money in the relief of local rates. I think it is very questionable whether a Parochial Board could spend this grant for any object for which they were not willing to raise rates. I think, from the reading of this clause, they will be compelled to spend the money purely for the relief of the ratepayers, and they will be unable to incur any fresh expenditure. I think that is a point which might be decided by putting down an Amendment later on which will make it clear beyond all doubt what the Parochial Boards can do.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 220; Noes 137.—(Div. List, No. 105.)

(5.55.) MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I wish to call attention to the manner in which this sum is distributed.

MR. HUNTER: I should like to ask you, Mr. Courtney, if I have not a prior Amendment to that of Mr. Lyell?

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): It seems to me that both Amendments come about the same point.

MR. HUNTER: I rise to a point of order, Sir. They are totally different and entirely distinct.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! They occur at the same point in the clause.

MR. LYELL: I do not propose to go into the general question of the relief of the rates; but what I do wish to point out is that, according to the proposal of the Government, that relief will be granted to all parishes, and will be granted on the valuation. The Government proposals will press very hardly on those parishes where the valuation is low and the local burdens are high. They will press very hardly on the North of Scotland, and that is my special reason for bringing the matter to the notice of the Committee. As an extreme instance of the injustice of the Government proposal, I would point out that in a very densely-populated and rich parish the charges in respect of poor relief and school maintenance may be very low, whilst the amount of the valuation may be very high. Yet the maximum amount granted by this Bill would go to this parish, whilst the minimum would go to a parish which has a small valuation and has heavy burdens for poor relief and school maintenance. It may be further urged that in some parishes there may be from local endowments such a sum as would entirely meet the demands for poor relief and school maintenance, and these parishes might receive a large sum under the grant, though the ratepayers have no burden upon them. The proposal is that there should be a relief of local rates, and I hold that the relief should be in proportion to the burden borne by the various parishes, and not according to population or valuation. The Government system of proportion according to valuation affords a rough and ready means of distributing this money; but I hold that the Local Taxation Returns afford to the Government and the Scotch Department an ample opportunity for distributing this money in proportion to the burden in each parish throughout Scotland. I have put down in my Amendment words referring to the "poor, school, and road rates," and I am quite aware that these rates do not exhaust the entire burdens falling upon the parishes; but they form a large proportion of the burden, and I think the other items might be left out of account. The hon. Member for Aberdeen has an Amendment on the Paper which deals to some extent with the same question, and to which similar arguments would apply; and that I should be willing to accept if the Government will adopt the principle of distributing the money on the basis of population, though I do not think that is a scientific method. It may be very well now just after the Census; but the subsequent variations of the population will render it almost impossible to get an accurate Return on which to make the distribution. My proposal does give a means of getting an accurate Return on which to make the distribution.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 32, to leave out the words, "valuations of their respective parishes as such valuations," and insert the words, "the amounts levied in respect of poor, school, and road rates in their respective parishes as such amounts."—(Mr. Lyell.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

(6.3.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman who has moved this Amendment will see that though, undoubtedly, arguments may be advanced in support of any principle of distribution, the principle of valuation is the principle which was adopted in the Act of 1890, and was found the most convenient principle when we were dealing with distribution as between Town and County Councils, and the adoption of another principle in this Bill would be extremely inconvenient. I do not rise to argue the case, however, but for the purpose of reminding the Committee that on Monday last, now three days ago, a compact was entered into between the Government on the one hand and I think every section on the other side of the House on the other, with all the seeming solemnity on which such transactions can be based, and it was arranged that on condition that the Government made certain concessions the Bill should be got through this stage on Tuesday afternoon. On Tuesday ten minutes to seven came and the stage was not finished. I do not wish to utter anything in the nature of complaint; but I must say I think the Government have some reason for thinking they have not been very well used by hon. Gentlemen opposite. It will be impossible to conduct the Business of the House on this kind of basis—a basis most useful in the conduct of Public Business—if when these compacts have been entered into and solemnly ratified they are departed from, as far as I can see, without any cause shown. I would venture most respectfully to press on the Committee the inconvenience of the course they are now adopting, and to request them, as the compact cannot now be fulfilled, to depart from it as little as possible.

Mr. Lyell

(6.5.) DR. CLARK: I thought the right hon. Gentleman would have said something which would have avoided further discussion. The question before the Committee really is whether we shall leave out the word "valuation." We can agree to strike that out, and then fight over whether "assessment" or "population" shall be inserted. I should like to point out the effect on the poorer districts, especially in the Northern counties of Scotland. If the principle of valuation is adopted, the six counties under the Crofters' Act will get £5,200; if you adopt the population principle they will get £7,000. The burghs in these counties will get £1,800 under population and £1,300 under valuation, so the counties will practically lose £1,800 and the burghs £500 under the Bill. The Bill will give the money to those districts not requiring it, where there are villa residences and high valuations, while the poorer districts which require most will get least. Argyllshire is the only county which will get more on valuation than on population, and that is accounted for by the fact that there are in it a dozen residential parishes composed almost exclusively of villas. If the people living in these highly-valued districts contributed to the Exchequer at the same rate as the people in the poorer districts, it might not be so bad; but the poor man, by his unfortunate habits of drinking whisky and smoking tobacco, contributes more in proportion to his income than the middle class. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman has some little cause to complain; but we all had reason to hope that the stage would have been finished before this, and could not foresee such a question arising, and if he will say at once why the Government will not accept the Amendment the discussion might be shortened. He might tell us why the Government are not going to assist the poorer districts. I think a very strong case has been made out against valuation and in favour of population, because it is by population that the money comes in.

*(6.10.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: On behalf of the counties I have the honour to represent, I must endeavour to press on the Government either to accept the principle of population, or to make some fairly intelligible statement which we can take to our constituents why they retain the inequitable principle of valuation, if they desire the discussion to be shortened. These two counties will get pretty much the same amount whichever principle is adopted—in fact, I think they would suffer a little loss on the population principle. The loss would be only £60, however, and that would be fully made up for if the money were given to those who most require it. I will give the right hon. Gentleman an instance of such clearness and gravity that it will convince him of the justice of my statement. In the Return of the Equivalent Grant distribution he will find that the hard-working burgh of Lossiemouth will itself lose the whole of that £60. Under the principle of valuation that burgh will only get £26, whereas on the basis of population it would get £86. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman, who knows the needy nature of large fishing populations, will agree with me that there could not be a more crucial instance adduced to show the inequity of keeping from the poor and giving to the rich. If the money be distributed on the basis of valuation it will go to those parts of the counties which hardly need it at all.

*(6.13.) MR. MARJORIBANKS: I only rise to make a suggestion which may meet the difficulty on both sides on this point. I would suggest that the Government might bring the matter to a speedy close if they consented to make the grant depend on a joint basis of population and valuation—to take the population and valuation, add them together, and divide. I speak against the interests of my own county in making the suggestion, as it would gain on the basis of valuation. Taking the counties, the total amount receivable out of a grant of £100,000 on the basis of valuation is £47,165, of population £38,141, and on the joint basis £42,653; on the basis of valuation for the burghs £45,030, of population £49,473, and on the joint basis £47,251; for the police burghs on valuation £7,843, on population of £12,384, and on the joint basis £10,113. If the Government adopt the joint basis they would meet the views of many of my hon. Friends, and it would cause material justice to be done to both counties and burghs.

(6.15.) MR. McDONALD CAMERON: I agree with the Mover of the Amendment, and not with the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. As far as my burghs are concerned, we should get on the basis of valuation £62, as compared with £72 on population. Dornoch would get £55 on valuation as against £137 on population. If the compromise were accepted we should not be better off. I shall vote, however, against valuation, and I hope the Government will accept the Amendment and not the compromise.

(6.17.) MR. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.): If the question were whether or not the Amendment of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland should be adopted, I should certainly vote against it. It seems to me to be putting a direct premium on extravagance. But the question is whether "valuation of their respective parishes" shall stand, and I am disposed to vote for striking them out, because I desire to see the basis of population adopted.

*(6.19.) MR. LENG (Dundee): I agree with the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. I should not have risen, but I desire to put in a plea for the large number of smaller burghs and police burghs. There are 69 Royal and Parliamentary burghs which, on valuation, will receive less than on population, and only ten that will receive more. But when you come to the smaller burghs and police burghs, the difference is still greater; 92 out of 106 will receive less, 31 will receive only half of what they would receive under the basis of population, nine will receive only one-third, and three only one-fourth, while 14 would receive a little more. I say that, in proportion as burghs are populous and poor, you would by this system deprive them of the money they should get; whereas the wealthy burghs, where the rating is higher, would receive the benefit. The villa burghs would receive more, while the fishing, mining, or industrial populations would receive less and less. The more you look into the Return moved for by the hon. Member for North Aberdeen the more inequitable the basis of valuation appears to be; and for that reason I have an Amendment later on that you should take the mean proportion between valuation and population. That would be equitable. It would diminish the amount given to those who are receiving an excess, and add somewhat to the amount given to those who are deprived of what is fairly due to them. I appeal to the Government to accept the equitable principle of taking the mean between population and valuation. This is, perhaps, the most important question in connection with the Bill, and if the Government accept my suggestion they will give no show of warrant to the charge made against them that the Bill is strictly a landlord's Bill in its inception and construction, but will demonstrate that they wish to do fairly between the wealthy and poorer counties and burghs.

(6.22.) MR. BUCHANAN: I cannot confess to be impartial in this matter, and, therefore, I am a supporter of the proposal of the Government in the Bill, and I hope that they will retain that proposal and continue to distribute this money as former money has been distributed. My right hon. Friend says his suggestion is a compromise; but I dislike that still more, for I find that Edinburgh—which would undoubtedly suffer if the basis of population were adopted—will, if the combination of population and valuation be adopted, practically pay the whole of the difference in the burghs. If the right hon. Gentleman accepts the compromise, there is at least one person who will vote against him.

(6.25.) MR. JOSEPH BOLTON (Stirling): I wish to say a word in support of the Government on this question. My hon. Friends appear to be divided into two parties—those who would receive more on the basis of valuation and are against the proposal for population, and those who would receive more under population and are against the basis of valuation. This seems to me to be a Bill for the relief of local taxation; and, if so, whom is it intended to relieve? Those who contribute to taxation, I suppose. Consequently, as taxation is contributed on the basis of valuation, it is a reasonable and right course that relief should be distributed on the same basis. I have said my hon. Friends are guided by their interests; I am not, for I find, on looking through the list, my constituents will receive just the same amount, whether it be on the basis of population or valuation. Under these circumstances, I am, perhaps, a more impartial judge as to the best mode of distributing this money than are my hon. Friends round me.

*(6.28.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): A great variety of principles has been suggested to guide us in this matter. The hon. Members for the Inverness Burghs and for Edinburgh frankly avow that their vote is given solely in the interests of their constituents; but I shall not follow that example. The distribution ought to be made on some sound principle. There are three suggested. One is to give it to the poorest and neediest; but I think to accept that might encourage local extravagance, for if the poor rate were doubled the amount would be larger, and if economy kept the rate down the amount would be smaller. Another principle is that it should be distributed according to the population, the view being that the money coming from Imperial sources and chiefly from the largest population ought to go back to the largest population. The third proposal is to go by valuation, on the ground that the whole policy of these Imperial contributions is to relieve ratepayers in proportion to their liability, which depends on valuation. But that policy is not accepted so fully in Scotland as in England. Therefore in Scotland, I think, we might take the compromise proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) as a very fair one. Seeing that the money comes from Imperial sources we might bring in population, and as it is to relieve local burdens we might bring in valuation.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not propose to accept another compromise, for the fortune of my suggestions, however much they may have been accepted, has not been very remarkable, and I am unwilling to put hon. Gentlemen a second time in the position of breaking faith deliberately—

MR. BUCHANAN: I rise to order. I beg to ask you, Sir, if the right hon. Gentleman is justified in using the words against hon. Gentlemen on this side that they broke faith deliberately?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Deliberately entered into.

THE CHAIRMAN: Whether the right hon. Gentleman is justified I do not know. It is perfectly consistent with Parliamentary usage.

MR. BUCHANAN: Do I take it from you, Sir, that the right hon. Gentleman was in order in stating that hon. Gentlemen on this side deliberately broke faith?

THE CHAIRMAN: There are abundant precedents for such language.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was going to say, "Hon. Gentlemen broke faith deliberately entered into," and I do not believe there is a single Gentleman who hears me who doubts the accuracy of that statement. I rise for the purpose of referring to a suggestion which has been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwick. That right hon. Gentleman has made a suggestion, but it has not been received with unanimity on his own side of the House; and therefore I might content myself with opposing the Amendment. By dividing this money according to valuation, you run the risk of helping those who need it least, and helping least those who need it most. It is possible to conceive an extreme case; that there might be a place in which the population was so wealthy that there would be no poor at all, and consequently no poor rates to be relieved. At the same time, the valuation might be so high that it might receive an enormous amount of money. No such case exists in Scotland of course; but I must observe that I think there is something to be said for the compromise suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwick on its merits, and I would recommend the House to accept it. Again, I would respectfully say that I do trust hon. Gentlemen will be content with recording their opinions upon this matter by their votes, because I think that every argument that can possibly be urged on the subject has been urged from almost every constituency in Scotland, and let us proceed to deal with the few remaining clauses of the Bill.

(6.33.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has spoiled the really good case which he had, up to a certain degree, by the heated and excessive language which he has used. ("Oh, oh!") I am not addressing myself to the hon. Member for Renfrew—I am addressing myself to the right hon. Gentleman. I say that even if the words of the right hon. Gentleman which he has addressed to us on this side of the House were really in order, I do not think that they were at all justified, in this instance, by anything that has occurred. The right hon. Gentleman talks of us breaking faith, and he talks of a solemn compact. It was with me, if anyone, he made the contract; and what I said was this—that we had every expectation of being able to finish that Bill last night. There was no more than a strong expectation and hope expressed on our part, and I took occasion at that time to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the compromise come to with regard to one part of this measure, that dealing with education, did not at all do away with the necessity for ample discussion, just as much as if no compromise on that subject had been arrived at, upon the question of the Universities, and the Parochial Boards; and this question which is before us now has nothing whatever to do with the matter that was in the right hon. Gentleman's view when the compromise was entered into. But I am entirely with the right hon. Gentleman, if only he had put it a little less high and used a little less strong language. I think he would have reason to complain if he saw the Scotch Members debating these matters at undue length after all that has passed. So far as I know, it is the intention and desire of my hon. Friends to get through this business as quickly as possible. This matter upon which we are now engaged is a new matter, a perfectly fresh subject, and a matter which intimately affects the constituency of every Member who has agreed to the compromise. If the right hon. Gentleman had taken action sooner, and if hon. Members on this side had not made their little speeches, there would not have been time for the Council of War which took place on the other side of the House within the last quarter of an hour, and in which the right hon. Gentleman sought very properly the opinion of his own friends upon this matter. If the Debate had been unduly curtailed the opportunity for that Council would not have occurred, and the right hon. Gentleman would not have arrived at the same wise decision at which he has now arrived. However, I am glad he has come to that decision, and I can assure him with regard to the rest of the Bill that though there are one or two like this, perfectly new topics, which must be dealt with, my

hon. Friends and myself will do our best to curtail discussion on them, so that we may not waste time in any way over it. But, at the same time, I must repeat what I said before, that when a perfectly new provision in this Bill comes up it is rather too much to expect that we should be contented with going to a division without having any opportunity of expressing our opinions on the subject.

(6.36.) MR. LYELL: In consequence of the compromise which has been arrived at, I beg to withdraw the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.37.) MR. HUNTER: I think the fairest principle would be to divide this money as nearly as possible amongst the people who paid the money. I say as between counties and burghs that unquestionably burghs pay more of the Imperial taxation than the counties. Some of my hon. Friends who represent counties have altogether ignored the urban element in their counties. I maintain that the just principle is the principle of population; and that principle also coincides with the principle of assessments and rates. If you take the principle of valuation, then you relieve the rates in the rural districts by twice the proportion in which you relieve the rates in burghs, and therefore it is an unjust principle. But as the Government has met us half way in this case I shall not move my Amendment.

(6.40.) On Motion of Sir C. J. PEARSON, the following Amendments were agreed to:—In page 2, line 32, after “valuations,” insert “and population”; in line 33, after “valuations,” insert “and population.”

(6.42.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to move, in page 2, line 38, to leave out from “or,” to “Act,” in line 42, inclusive. The object of this Amendment is to stereotype the £100,000 for the County and Municipal Authorities. Then they will have the increment that takes place owing to the increased school attendance. Supposing the schools get the benefit of the increment, it will no more than meet the extra cost they will be put to by the increased school attendance. If they get this extra grant they will have a less deficiency to assess for, and the school ratepayer will have so much the less to pay, and the amount will be distributed one-half on the owners and one-half on the occupiers. Therefore I hope the Government will have no objection to accept the Amendment, which does not alter the principle of the Bill, and will simplify its provisions.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 38, to leave out from the word "or," to the word "Act," in line 42, inclusive.—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

* (6.43.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: This Amendment proposes to alter the scheme of this Bill in a simple and comparatively trivial respect, but I venture to say that the hon. Member has not accurately estimated the effect of the clause as it stands. I cannot accept the proposal of the hon. Gentleman.

Question put, and agreed to.

(6.44.) On Motion of Sir C. J. PEARSON the following Amendments were agreed to:—In page 3, line 4, after "valuations," insert "and population"; in line 5, after "valuations" insert "and population"; in lines 7 and 8, leave out "to the relief of local rates levied by," and insert:—

"(a.) to the relief of local rates levied by; or (b.) in aid of the expenses incurred, or to be incurred, under any statutory power from time to time vested in."

In line 9, after "determine," insert—

"Or (c.) under any scheme of public utility framed by them respectively, subject to the approval of the Secretary for Scotland."

(6.48.) MR. HUNTER: I shall move my Amendment in the form of an addition to the Lord Advocate's proposal, and that is that the Government shall have it in their power to give the County Councils and Town Councils power to apply this money for other purposes of public utility subject to the approval of the Secretary for Scotland. In regard to that, I venture to think that there are a certain number of objects of such obvious public utility that these bodies should be at liberty to advance the money for these objects without going to the Secretary for Scotland at all. The objects which I have enumerated for the relief of any one or more of which this money may be applied are the following:—

"(1.) The relief of unemployed workmen in time of distress. (2.) The establishment and maintenance of labour bureaus, or in contributing to such establishment and maintenance. (3.) The better housing of the working classes. (4.) Contributing to pensions for working men and women over sixty years of age, or to the fatherless children of workmen. (5.) Procuring allotments or small holdings, and advancing money by way of loan to assist in stocking such allotments or holdings. (6.) Extension of crofters' holdings. (7.) The development of the sea fisheries, and advancing money by way of loan to fishermen for boats and tackle, and for the purchase and management of mussel beds. (8.) Establishing and maintaining, or contributing to the establishment and maintenance, of art galleries, and the purchase of pictures and other works of art. (9.) Establishing, maintaining, or contributing to the establishment and maintenance of public libraries. (10.) The promotion of technical education. (11.) Providing public halls, parks, gardens, places of recreation, and free gymnasias. (12.) Paying fees of scholars in evening or continuation schools. (13.) Paying the reasonable travelling expenses of members of county councils. (14.) Making or improving harbour accommodation."

I venture to think that the application of the money to the relief of unemployed workmen is an object which is well worthy of the sympathetic consideration of the House. I think this money might also be applied in establishing and maintaining Labour Bureaus, or Town Councils might be enabled to contribute money to such Labour Bureaus if established and maintained by other persons. I know that in the future the labour question will increasingly force itself upon the attention of Members of this House, and I think no objection can be taken to this proposal. As to the housing of the working classes, the Town Councils have already statutory powers to contribute the money for that purpose. I venture to say there can be no harm in giving the Town Councils and County Councils power to use a share of this money for the purpose of old age pensions. I do not make it compulsory, but I leave it to their discretion. Another object of the greatest possible importance is the procuring of allotments or small holdings, and advancing money by way of loan to assist in stocking such allotments or holdings. Another meritorious object also is the extension in certain parts of Scotland of the crofters' holdings. This money might be very usefully applied to the other objects enumerated. Why should not power be given to apply some portion of this money for objects which I think we are all agreed are of the highest utility in the view of the coast counties of Scotland? It would be a great advantage to some towns like Aberdeen, where there have been picture galleries established by the liberality of private individuals, if it was in the power of the Town Councils to apply such portion of the money as they thought fit to complete those art galleries, and to supply them with works of art. As to public libraries, the public library in Aberdeen is labouring under the greatest difficulty. The fund created by the rate of a penny in the pound is exhausted, and public subscriptions are solicited to enable them to have a house in which to put their books. Surely it is most desirable that power should be given to apply a portion of the money for such a purpose as this. With respect to all the objects I have enumerated, I think they are objects of such manifest and obvious public utility that the Town and County Councils might well be allowed power, if they thought fit, to apply the money for these objects without the necessity of coming to the Secretary for Scotland for his approval. This Amendment, if carried, would have the effect of saving the Secretary for Scotland from the trouble of receiving an immense number of applications in connection with the distribution of this money. I venture to hope, under these circumstances, that these words will be added to the Bill.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 7, to leave out "to the relief of local rates levied by," and insert "to any one or more of the following purposes:—

- (1.) The relief of unemployed workmen in time of distress. (2.) The establishment and maintenance of labour bureaux, or in contributing to such establishment and maintenance. (3.) The better housing of the working classes.

Mr. Hunter

(4.) Contributing to pensions for working men and women over sixty years of age, or to the fatherless children of workmen. (5.) Procuring allotments or small holdings, and advancing money by way of loan to assist in stocking such allotments or holdings. (6.) Extension of crofters' holdings. (7.) The development of the sea fisheries, and advancing money by way of loan to fishermen for boats and tackle, and for the purchase and management of mussel beds. (8.) Establishing and maintaining, or contributing to the establishment and maintenance, of art galleries, and the purchase of pictures and other works of art. (9.) Establishing, maintaining, or contributing to the establishment and maintenance, or contributing to the establishment and maintenance of public libraries. (10.) The promotion of technical education. (11.) Providing public halls, parks, gardens, places of recreation, and free gymnasia. (12.) Paying fees of scholars in evening or continuation schools. (13.) Paying the reasonable travelling expenses of members of county councils. (14.) Making or improving harbour accommodation, or any other object of public utility approved by the Secretary for Scotland."—(Mr. Hunter.)

* (7.0.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: I do not know whether, after the Amendment which I have proposed, the hon. Member will consider it necessary to press for this catalogue, or programme, or whatever he chooses to call it. In so far as these objects are purposes of public utility, they are within the Amendment which I have inserted, and surely it is rather much to ask the Committee to pronounce upon them and to affirm that they are all purposes upon which a Town or County Council should be entrusted to spend the money. It seems to me that the two safeguards which the Government propose are reasonable and proper, and, indeed, necessary. One is that in any application of this money to purposes beyond those for which Councils have now powers, they should come to a responsible Minister to get his assent; and the other, which is equally important, is that they should carry with them to him a scheme for his approval, for it seems to me that the reduction of the proposals to a scheme supplies a test not merely of sincerity, which may be assumed, but of feasibility. On these grounds I oppose the Amendment.

(7.2.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: May I appeal to my hon. Friend not to press his Amendment? He deserves great credit for having drawn out an exhaustive list of all works of public utility, and, if I may offer him any advice, it would be that he would do good service if he had it handsomely printed, and forwarded a copy of it to every Town and County Council in Scotland, in order that they may always have before their eyes a catalogue of those works of public utility out of which they may find schemes to be approved by the Secretary for Scotland. If at any time they find themselves with a little money in their hands for which they have no use, they could then ransack this list. As the Bill was originally drawn, I approved the idea—in our difficulty of disposing of this money—of in some way indicating to the Town and County Councils a certain number of good objects to which they might apply the money; but now that the Government have conceded, at our instance, the enabling of these Public Bodies to give the money in aid of the expenses incurred under any statutory power they may have, or under any scheme approved by the Secretary for Scotland, I think my hon. Friend will see that it is hardly necessary to go into details.

(7.5.) MR. HUNTER: The right hon. Gentleman has stated that which is perfectly true. Circumstances have considerably changed since my Amendment was put down, but still I thought it desirable to occupy for a few minutes the attention of the Committee in order that Town and County Councils might see that there is a large sphere of objects of public utility upon which this money may well be expended; and I believed that if the short legal terms of the Lord Advocate's Amendment were the only thing they knew, they might not really appreciate their wide powers. I agree that the words of the Lord Advocate are as wide as the objects which I have enumerated, and, therefore, I will gladly accede to the suggestion, and ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.6.) MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I am glad to say that by the courtesy of the Lord Advocate I have been made aware that the Government are willing to accept this Amendment, and I will, therefore, only say that its object is to give to Town and County Councils the power of accumulating the funds which we now place at their disposal for the various purposes we have been discussing. Without that power of accumulation, the power of dealing with this money would be almost useless, and I accept the adoption of the Amendment by the Government as an extremely valuable and useful concession, to which I hope the Committee will agree.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 12, at end, add, "Any moneys received by a County Council or a Town Council or Police Commissioners under this section, and directed by Resolution to be appropriated or to be set aside for any purpose authorised by this sub-section other than the relief of the rates shall, although not expended or specifically contributed or allotted in whole or in part before the end of the financial year, remain applicable for such purposes."—(Mr. Crawford.)

Amendment agreed to.

(7.8.) DR. CLARK: This is an Amendment that I have put down in order that—

"No portion of the sum of thirty thousand pounds in sub-section two shall be applied to any university in which provision shall not have been made for the full recognition of extra-mural teaching as qualifying for graduation and entitling the extra-mural teachers to representation on the examining bodies."

When we had the Bill appointing the Universities Commission we were desirous of having a clause compelling them to recognise extra-mural teaching, but the Government persuaded us to accept as a compromise a permissive clause. Since then we have had the Ordinances, and we find that the permissive power has not been carried out. Under the old Act and the old Commission extra-mural teaching was recognised in the Medical Faculties, but by the Ordinances which will probably become law next week extra-mural teaching is only recognised in the Medical Faculties to the same extent—namely, one-half of the classes. There is no extra-mural teaching recognised in the Faculty of Arts or in any other Faculty, and what we ought now to do is to limit the Universities until extra-mural teaching is recognised in all subjects, and the teachers have a fair share of the representation on the Examination Board. Why should we not have extra-mural teaching in Arts? In all Scotch University towns there are good secondary schools with able masters; and if extramural teaching in Arts were permitted, these men would qualify for the Chairs. In large towns like Edinburgh and Glasgow it is almost impossible for Professors to do their work; and if you look at the Return got on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter), you will see that in consequence of the large number of students—the salaries from fees run from £2,000 to £3,000 a year—they have got to examine 100 students at a time. In order to have classes that the Professor and his assistant can give proper attention to, it is necessary to recognise more fully than has been done in the medical profession this system of extra-mural teaching. I will give one or two practical instances in reference to this matter. Take probably the ablest man on the Commission—a nobleman that we are all very proud of—Sir William Thomson, now Lord Kelvin. He is one of the ablest scientific men in Scotland during the whole of the century, but no one who has had experience of his class would say that he is the best possible teacher. He has got talents and powers—extraordinary talents and powers of their kind—but they did not lay in the direction of teaching. And if you take other men of great powers and talents, you will find that they are not the best possible teachers. What we want to have is a fair amount of extra-academical competition with the men who get the Chairs. You have the great Glasgow Infirmary, a splendid clinical school, and St. Mungo's College, and these gentlemen are just as able to teach, and they have better facilities for clinical instruction than you have at the University, and why should they not have some chance of getting students and having their classes well filled? I do not see why there should be this limitation. The second point which I have laid down in my Amendment is that there should be representation on the examining body of these extra-mural teachers, and I should like to hear the opinion of the Government, and the course they intend taking in reference to this, not the least among the many debateable questions that have been settled by the University Ordinances.

Dr. Clark

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 12, at end, add—"Provided always, that no portion of the sum of thirty thousand pounds in sub-section two shall be applied to any University in which provision shall not have been made for the full recognition of extra-mural teaching as qualifying for graduation, and entitling the extra-mural teachers to representation on the examining bodies." - (Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(7.15.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Bute): I think the Committee will scarcely be surprised to hear that the Government cannot see their way to accept this Amendment, and I think it is only necessary that I should explain to the Committee what is the course that the hon. Member is practically pursuing to get their adhesion to the position of the Government upon this matter. The Committee are aware that several years ago the University Act was passed; and that, in order to carry out the reforms suggested by that Act, an Executive Commission of extraordinary strength was appointed. This Commission has been continuing its labours for several years, and those labours are now embodied in Ordinances which are on the Table of the House, and upon which we shall hope to have a full discussion some of these days at a period not far remote. It is surely too much to expect that the House should, upon a Debate of the kind which is possible in the present connection, put in by an alteration of this Bill a qualification which it refused to put in the Bill dealing with the whole subject. It is perfectly impossible for me to follow the interesting personal reminiscences of the hon. Member, and I must really respectfully decline to go into the very large subject of extra and intra-mural teaching. I would remind the Committee that in so far as the hon. Member puts these words on the Paper, he is forestalling the judgment of the House. When the discussion takes place upon those Ordinances, and when we come to that portion of the Estimates proposing a certain amount of money for the University, the hon. Member will have an opportunity of setting forth his views. In carrying out the compromise which has been made, I believe hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite will agree that the discussion of a subject which has been brought in like this upon the consideration of this Bill ought certainly to be excluded.

(7.18.) MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I cannot understand the concluding remarks of the Solicitor General upon this matter. I was not aware that any contract was entered into by the Opposition that would have the effect of precluding any remarks in this connection. If there was any contract between any parties that were responsible, I, for one, have never been aware up to this moment that it embraced the exclusion of the topic which is now before the Committee. The Solicitor General's remarks upon this subject were of so nebulous and nondescript a character that I am precluded by the ordinary canons of criticisms from making any further comment upon them. All I can say in this connection is that the point he has endeavoured to turn off in this slight and flimsy way is one that ought not to have been dealt with in that style. It is one of very great importance indeed. When the Universities Act was passed—when the Solicitor General was elsewhere, and therefore not likely to have cognisance of the importance attached to it—one of the most particular points discussed was this very one of extra-mural teaching, and by a considerable succession of efforts those on this side of the House succeeded in having put into that Act a special and leading indication of the desire of the Legislature as to the position of extra-mural teaching in Scotch Universities. I do not think the Solicitor General will contradict me when I say that in that Act there was a distinct indication on the part of the Legislature that extra-mural teaching was to be made a very prominent point on the part of the Commissioners in arranging the new constitutions of the Universities. All that we ask is that Parliament should be true to its original indications. I think that in the last Universities' Act Parliament almost gave a direction—I will go further, and say Parliament altogether gave a direction—that extra-mural teaching should be a prominent point to be observed by those who were to carry out the directions of Parliament in connection with the modes of instruction in the Scotch Universities. If we had not had indications that this was not to be carried out, I should have said that there would have been a justification for the attitude that the Solicitor General has taken up. But he must have been perfectly well aware that the way in which the instructions of Parliament have been carried out has not been in the spirit of those instructions, and that extra-mural teaching has been discouraged; that so far from anything in the nature of extra-mural teaching being carried out, it has only been done in name and in appearance, and everything has been done for the purpose of discouraging it in spirit and in substance. I do not think we are doing too much in declaring what we declared before, that we desire that extra-mural teaching should be encouraged in a reasonable manner; and in taking material security in this Bill that our instruction shall be carried out, I have no doubt that if the Amendment is adopted, we shall have some material guarantee that our instructions in the Universities Bill of 1889 shall be effectually carried out instead of being evaded and escaped, as we know in point of fact is the case at the present moment. The Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General are perfectly well aware of the circumstances under which the order of 1889 is being evaded and escaped. I say this House would be simply performing a duty to itself in adopting its own Amendment.

(7.25.) DR. FARQUHARSON: I do not think the hon. Member for Caithness deserves to be contemptuously waved aside for bringing up this question on this occasion, because we know what is the nature of the opportunity we shall have of discussing the question on Monday night. If the First Lord of the Treasury will give an assurance that he will suspend the Business at an earlier period on Monday night than usual, so that we may have a discussion of this very important question before twelve o'clock, then I think we should be quite disposed to let this matter drop now. The question is one of vital importance to the prosperity of the Universities. We have given a sum of £30,000 under this Bill to be expended in University education, and I see no particular reason why we should not discuss it in connection with extra-mural teaching. It has been of such enormous benefit on the medical side that I cannot for the life of me see why it should not be applied in equal measure to the art side of education. I do not think my hon. Friend is quite justified in saying the Professors do not perform their work properly. I believe they do; and I do not grudge them the salaries they get. I would again ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will give us better facilities for the discussion on Monday night?

(7.28.) MR. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.): I think any one coming into the House during the last two minutes would suppose the subject under discussion was a Bill for the amendment of the Scotch Universities Act. I do very respectfully submit to my hon. Friend that this is hardly the occasion for raising such a Debate. I do not think a subject so very important as extra-mural and intra-mural teaching ought to be raised in this form. I presume, Mr. Courtney, the Amendment is technically in order, or you would not have allowed it. But it does appear to me to be entirely contrary to the spirit which ought to actuate hon. Members, and it is certainly not quite in conformity with the understanding arrived at the other night.

(7.29.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I rise to appeal to the hon. Member for Caithness not to press his Amendment at the present time. I agree that this is not a proper occasion for the discussion of this question. It ought to be discussed really on the Ordinance framed by the Commissioners. I think the First Lord of the Treasury could now end the discussion by making this very reasonable concession as to the Ordinances.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The University Ordinances must be discussed before the 12th inst., therefore the time is greatly limited. I entirely sympathise with what has fallen from the hon. Member for Caithness; but, at the same time, the House will see that the Government cannot provide the extra time required for the purpose. I would remind the Committee that I was asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian what the intentions of the Government are in regard to the conduct of business during next week, and that I stated that we proposed to take the Small Holdings Bill on Monday. If good progress is then made with that Bill, and we arrive at a suitable halting stage, no doubt the discussion might come on at 11 or soon afterwards. I cannot go farther than that.

DR. CLARK: I think another suggestion might be made. There is only one small Motion on the Paper for tomorrow night, about Kew Gardens, which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple); perhaps the hon. Member for Aberdeen could bring on his Motion then.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: For what day is it down?

DR. CLARK: It is put down for Monday. Can it be withdrawn and put down for Friday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Possibly it would be in Order to put down the Motion in some other name for tomorrow night.

DR. FARQUHARSON: My Motion deals only with a very small and specific medical point; it has nothing to do with general policy.

DR. CLARK: The Motion of the hon. Member for Evesham could be very well taken on the Estimates. If the hon. Member took a Division tomorrow the Scotch Members could talk, but not divide. I see the hon. Member for Evesham in the Gallery. Perhaps he will settle the business now by saying a few words.

SIR R. TEMPLE (from the Gallery): No, no!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the difficulty could be met by setting up Supply again, if it can be done.

DR. CLARK: We can move that the Speaker leave the Chair, if we can do nothing else.

MR. HUNTER: It would be quite in order, I believe, for the hon. Member for Evesham to speak from the Gallery.

SIR R. TEMPLE: No.

Dr. Farquharson

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We could divide now, and discuss the matter to-morrow, or we could discuss it to-morrow, and divide on Monday.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to move, in page 3, line 14, to leave out "Relief," and insert "Account." This is the last Amendment to the Bill which is on the Paper, and I hope the Government will accept it. It would alter the title to the Education and Local Account (Scotland) Bill. It will be recollected that the character of the Bill has been changed, and I submit that the alteration I propose would be a fitting one to make in it.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 14, to leave out the word "Relief," and insert the word "Account."—(Mr. Bryce.)

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

SIR C. J. PEARSON moved, in page 2, after Clause 2, to insert the following clause:—

(Allocation of Fees and Compensation to certain Teachers for loss of Fees.)

"Notwithstanding any provisions in any statute, scheme, provisional order, deed, or instrument, it shall be lawful for the governing body or managers, whether School Board or other, of any school to which a grant is made under the provisions of Section 2, Sub-section 1, of this Act at any time, and from time to time to alter or reduce the fees exigible therein, or to regulate the disposal or application of such fees: Provided, that any teacher of a higher class public school, appointed before the passing of this Act, having a vested right to fees exigible in such school, shall be entitled to receive from the School Board, compensation in respect of any loss sustained by him under the provisions of this section, and such compensation, failing agreement, may be determined finally by the sheriff, and shall be payable out of the school fund."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday next, and to be printed. [Bill 332.]

MR. McDONALD CAMERON: Can the Government give us the names of the Departmental Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The question of the names of the Departmental Committee is engaging the attention of the Government, and I hope to be able to announce them before the Report stage.

SUPERANNUATION ACTS AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 275.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I do not think we can make any progress with this Bill until the Government have given us some information with reference to the scope of its provisions. At the present time, as I understand it, certain classes of public servants, if removed from one service to another, can count the whole of the time in respect to superannuation. Now, I am not prepared to say that that is unreasonable or unfair. But the point upon which I want information is this: To what classes of public servants does the existing law apply? I would also like to ask to what class of servants are we to understand that the present Bill applies, and why are the Army and Navy to be exempted? I am only asking this for the sake of obtaining information on the subject. I have no desire to oppose the Bill. I wish to see certain grievances redressed. If we propose to extend to Civil Servants the same rights which others possess to superannuation, then I would submit that whether it be proper or improper in itself, it is extremely inconvenient to make such a charge on the Exchequer in such a Bill as this. I find the expression "public office" means "any office the money for which is paid out of a fund receiving a contribution from any of the public sources." That means that any county or borough fund, inasmuch as they receive a contribution out of the Imperial Funds, can, by the Treasury, be termed a public source; and thus it follows that a policeman who transfers from the north to the south may include his former service for his pension here in London. Under the Act of 1859 he can only reckon one-half of such time. Therefore it seems to us there is a considerable chance that the House may, without knowing it, go much further in the direction of superannuation than it expects. I will put another case, which is sure to provoke some speech from the hon. Members who represent Ireland. As I read the Bill the effect will be that any person who has served Her Majesty in any part of the world will be able to go to Ireland, procure engagement as a policeman, and to count the whole of his services, in any part of the world, and in any department, for superannuation. Thus, before agreeing to the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman must not wonder if, under these conditions, we desire to know what we are doing. The information I want is this—to which class of public servants is it to relate? If he will tell us that it has got no general application, that it is merely to remedy some little grievance, I do not think there will be any objections to it. If, on the other hand, under cover of these innocent provisions, it is really an enlargement of the whole scope of our superannuation arrangements, so as to enable a large section of public servants to count time served in various parts of the world towards pension, then I submit that such a proposition should be fully explained to the Committee. In order to give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of explanation I move to report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN: It will only add to the irregularity to make that Motion. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury will probably make his explanation; but it is impossible for him to make a speech on that Motion.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): I thought when this Bill was read a second time that I had made what I supposed to be a lucid explanation of its contents. I can assure hon. Members that it does not tend to greatly increase the charge upon the taxpayers. The Bill may have very little effect—probably none—in that direction. It is a Bill to remedy certain practical difficulties which have been found in regard to the Superannuation Acts; and among those who will benefit most are some of the poorer class of Civil Servants of the Crown. As to the question who are the particular persons under the Crown who may be transferred without losing right to pension, and who are those whose right to pension is lost by transfer from one place to another—I cannot undertake to exhaust those questions without consultation with my legal adviser, and without sufficient examination of the various Acts authorising the grant of pensions. If the hon. Member will be content with a general practical answer, I may say that the Departments in which these provisions are necessary are the Prisons Department and the Constabulary Department. I think when I have mentioned those Departments—there may be others—I have practically answered the question of the hon. Member. As to the necessity for this Bill I will mention one case, actually now before the Treasury. The man was a warder in Canterbury Prison from March, 1875, to April, 1878, his salary at that time being paid out of the county rates. He then became a warder in Wandsworth Prison from 1878 to February, 1886, his salary being paid out of the Parliamentary Grants. From February 1886 to March 1891 he was a turnkey in the Isle of Man, his salary, of course, being paid out of the Isle of Man revenue. This man, after serving the public for many years, is now reported unfit for duty on account of ill-health, but at present the Treasury is unable by law to give him any superannuation allowance whatever. I think even the hon. Member who has just addressed the House will agree that that kind of man ought, in his declining years, and when his health has failed, to have a pension out of the revenue of the different authorities under which he has served. This Bill will enable the Treasury to make rules for giving that kind of man a pension, and to allocate the amount to be paid out of various public funds. It will apply to every part of the United Kingdom. I hope the hon. Member is now satisfied that there is no latent conspiracy. Certainly no

Mr. Storey

Member of the Government will be benefited by it, and there is no intention to greatly add to the charges on the revenue. The Bill is really one to enable the Treasury to redress certain grievances which have sprung up.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): There was an idea below the Gangway that this Bill really aimed at benefiting certain high officials. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that this Bill will not benefit any Member of the Government. And I do not suppose it would, as a Member of the Government; but it certainly was thought that the Bill would benefit those who held office abroad—office under the Indian or Colonial Government—and that, while ostensibly aiming at the class of servants the right hon. Gentleman has named, it would really benefit the much wealthier class of public servants. Therefore, I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman would be willing to put a clause in this Bill to render it absolutely impossible for anybody who has drawn a large salary in the Public Service to be at all benefited?

*SIR J. GORST: I do not think it would be possible to introduce such a clause—it would be very invidious to make distinctions. The principle of the Bill will, no doubt, apply alike to officers of the upper and the lower grades; but I do not know where the hon. Member draws the line of high salary. It would affect the case of a man who has been transferred between the Home and the Indian Services, and who might put together his Indian service with service in this country, and be pensioned on retirement in respect of his whole service.

MR. PHILIPPS: An Indian Governor?

*SIR J. GORST: If the hon. Member asks me conundrums of that kind, I can only give him an answer proverbially worthless. If the hon. Member really wants information on the subject, and will put a question on the Paper, we shall endeavour to give him an answer.

MR. KNOX: I think we have legitimate reason for allowing the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) to stand. We understand that by putting down a question on the Notice Paper we may discover when the Bill has passed through the House what it is we have been engaged upon. I submit that is not a reasonable answer for a Minister in charge of a Bill to give to an hon. Member who asks a practical question as to the effect of the Bill.

*SIR J. GORST: I have answered the hon. Member, but it is impossible for me to state all the classes the Bill would embrace. It is a question for the Attorney General. My opinion would only be the answer of a lawyer without fee.

MR. KNOX: We expect the right hon. Gentleman not only to give the opinion of a lawyer upon the subject, but also to give us the effect of his official information as to what would be the result of this measure. There is another reason for reporting Progress. A Commission sat for some years and made an elaborate Report upon this among other subjects. On that Commission there were the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) and the hon. Member for the Stretford Division of Lancashire (Mr. Maclure). The right hon. Member for Wolverhampton has expressed his wish to be present during the consideration of this Bill, and it is unfortunate that the Bill should twice have come on when, in the ordinary course of business, it was unexpected. Inasmuch as none of the recommendations of the Commission have been literally carried out in this Bill, it is surely desirable that, when the measure comes on for discussion, there should be some Members of the Commission present who can give an opinion untrammelled by Governmental connection. I understand the Commission reported that no further grants should be given; no increase should be made in the superannuation allowances until provision had also been made for a five per cent. reduction from the salaries of officials. Until the one thing has been accomplished, I do not think we should do the other. It is, too, a strange thing that we are without any explanation as to whether the Bill affects Resident Magistrates in Ireland. We are told that this Bill chiefly concerns prison and constabulary officers. What we want to know is, does it affect the Irish Resident Magistrates?

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I should like to ask, Sir, if the hon. Member is in Order in discussing these various points?

THE CHAIRMAN: The whole discussion is irregular, but I understand that the hon. Member intends to move to report Progress.

MR. KNOX: Well, Sir, I will just say that I object to proceeding with the consideration of this Bill, until we have some further knowledge of what it consists. Above all things we desire to know if it is intended to benefit Resident Magistrates. No distinct answer has been given to us on this and other points, and I therefore move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Knox.)

*(8.12.) SIR J. GORST: I think the present is not a favourable time for discussing the question, which is that of removing a great hardship to a very deserving class of public servants. I may say that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has no desire for further alteration in this Bill beyond an Amendment which I have agreed to move at the proper time. The Committee, I hope, will now enter upon a business-like discussion of the clauses. I should be out of Order if I were now to enter into discussion on the principle of the Bill. That is not a business we should discuss this evening, and I hope the Amendment will be withdrawn. Of course, any point might be discussed on the Third Reading or on the Report.

(8.14.) MR. STOREY: The right hon. Gentleman should be the last to complain, because when we were sitting here ready to take part in the Second Reading he got up and moved the Closure, and after a discussion of only 25 minutes the Bill was passed without the desired information having been obtained. The right hon. Gentleman suggests that we should go on with the clauses, and he says we can discuss the principle of the Bill on the Third Reading. He knows very well what little hope there is of getting the principle of a Bill discussed on the Third Reading. Our only hope of getting to know what the scope of the Bill is, is in resisting Progress at the present time in a Parliamentary way.

*(8.17.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I rise to express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir J. Gorst) will answer the questions which have been put to him as to the scope of this Bill. If he will do so, I would recommend my hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment, and allow the Committee to discuss the clauses. We had no information on Monday night that the Bill affected only the lower class of Civil Servants in the Constabulary and Prison Departments. If that is the fact, will the right hon. Gentleman consent to words being inserted in the Bill limiting its provisions to the class of officials he has mentioned, and will he consent to report Progress so that he may give us information as to the meaning of the Bill and the amount of money involved? If he will do that, I am sure it will get over the difficulty. Although I have no desire to obstruct the Bill, I say frankly that I should not mind if it were stopped altogether, because it is a bad Bill, and opposed to the recommendations of the Royal Commission.

(8.20.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I do not want to delay the progress of this Bill. On the other hand, if the Bill is what the right hon. Gentleman says he thinks it is, I shall be delighted to withdraw all opposition to it. We want to obtain from the right hon. Gentleman a positive statement as to the class of Civil Servants who would be benefited. That is all we want, and if we get that, I hope to be able to vote for the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman says he cannot be expected to get up in his place and give, in an extempore way, a list of the persons who will benefit. We do not ask that he should, but he can give us the information to-morrow. Before letting this Bill go through unopposed, we want to know positively what class of public persons are going to benefit by it. If it is only to benefit humble persons who have served their country well, I should like to vote for it. The information which has been asked for might be given to-morrow, and I think if that were done it would facilitate the progress of this Bill. There is no desire on the part of some of us to oppose the Bill if we were certain that there is no more harm in it than the right hon. Gentleman would lead us to believe.

(8.25.) MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I think the request made to the right hon. Gentleman to report Progress is a most reasonable one, although I do not agree with all the reasons alleged for doing so. For instance, I do not think we should report Progress simply because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler) is not here. But, Mr. Courtney, there is one reason which is unanswerable, and that is that the right hon. Gentleman the Minister in charge of this Bill either cannot, or will not, explain its details. It seems to me that the question of my hon. Friend as to whether certain persons are, or are not, intended to be benefited by the Bill is a reasonable one, but the right hon. Gentleman refrains from answering it. I do not wish to speak disrespectfully of the right hon. Gentleman, but it seems to me that he has displayed considerable ignorance as to the provisions of the Bill. On the Second Reading he said categorically it would not affect the revenues of India. But I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that there is a sub-section authorising a charge on the Indian Revenues.

*SIR J. GORST: This Bill does not touch a single rupee of the revenues of India unless the Secretary of State so determines.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS: But it does if the Secretary of State decides that it shall. However, that is not the question. I think I have shown that the right hon. Gentleman has not exhibited to the Committee such an acquaintance with the details of the Bill as we ought to expect. I have listened to the discussion throughout, and I must say I have not heard any satisfactory statement from him as to whom this Bill is to apply to. I, therefore, think we should support the Motion to report Progress, so as to enable the right hon. Gentleman to furnish the information asked for.

(9.0.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I had the opportunity of hearing the remarks of the Secretary to the Treasury; and considering the strong action taken in connection with the Second Reading of the Bill, and the unsatisfactory answers the right hon. Gentleman has given on the subject during the Session, it is strange that he should have offered such an explanation of the Bill as he has given to-night. We want to get something explicit from the responsible Ministers of the Crown with regard to the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said that this Bill may or may not affect the taxpayer. Our duty is to protect the taxpayer, and we ought to have some idea of how much will be spent under the Bill. Then the right hon. Gentleman said it would benefit the constabulary and prison servants. I know how it will affect them. There are many men of the Royal Irish Constabulary who made themselves obnoxious in Ireland—at Mitchelstown—and who were removed and put as warders in prisons in order that they may get an increased payment. I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether this Bill will apply to such men as Cavanagh and Captain Segrave, and men of that ilk, or will it simply meet such cases as those mentioned by the Secretary to the Treasury, where a man has been removed from a post in one prison to a post in another? If it is intended to benefit the poor officials in gaols and the constabulary only, I withdraw all opposition; but if it will give certain Resident Magistrates in Ireland power to count service in India as well as in Ireland, or if—on the coming of Home Rule—they are removed to India, to count also the service in Ireland, it would be ridiculous. It will facilitate the passage of the Bill if the First Lord of the Treasury will say plainly and straightforwardly whether or not the Bill is intended only to benefit the class of persons mentioned by the Secretary to the Treasury? If it is to confer large salaries on men who have done very little to deserve them, I shall take every step I can to arrive at the real truth; and I think it will save the time of the House, and you trouble, Mr. Courtney, if the right hon. Gentleman will tell us at once if these gentlemen are to be superannuated.

*(9.13.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I will not again allude to the fact that the Secretary to the Treasury succeeded in curtailing the Second Reading stage of this Bill to a great extent by the Closure; but I desire to express the opinion that, though I think he would be the last person in any way to endeavour to deceive the Committee, he approached this Bill not only on the Second Reading stage, but to-day, in a perfunctory manner, and that, from many things which dropped from the right hon. Gentleman, he did not grasp the magnitude of the task he has taken in hand. He plainly told this Committee to-night that he did not know the financial effect of this Bill, with regard to the amounts, less or more, which would be demanded either from the taxpayers of this country, or the over-taxed people of India, in support of the operations of the Bill. Now, it appears to me that there is nothing more absolutely important than that this House should, especially in Committee on Bills which involve the passing of large sums of money, convince Her Majesty's Government that they are determined that the Government shall at all events take the trouble to make a fair estimate of some sort as to the financial outcome of a Bill before they bring it to the Committee stage.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Bill is now in the Committee stage, and the hon. Member is making observations on the Second Reading.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I am only endeavouring to reply to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. He stated from that Bench that he did not know; that he only believed and thought—

THE CHAIRMAN: That was an irregular discussion which was permitted as a matter of favour. It was quite out of Order, and to continue that discussion on a Motion to report Progress would be out of order.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I will not follow the right hon. Gentleman in his irregular discussion.

Dr. Tanner

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: But I will say this—the whole method in which he has approached this Bill shows that he has not studied it or even read it. He told us—I suppose you will not allow me to dilate upon this point, but you will allow me to mention it—he told us to-day that in his opinion it would not affect the Revenue of India at all. I shall be prepared to prove upon Amendments which I have down on the Paper that the Revenue of India will positively and must necessarily be affected thereby. I do not believe that Her Majesty's Government have taken the trouble to look into the magnitude of the amounts at stake in this matter; but I may say that about five and a half millions of money per year are affected, or may be affected, by the operations of this Bill; and I want to ask the Government if they themselves can allege that they have already either taken the House sufficiently into their confidence upon the Second Reading, or that they have taken the Committee sufficiently into their confidence on the present occasion to enable the Motion for reporting Progress to be withdrawn?

(9.15.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I think an apology is due from me to the Secretary to the Treasury that I was not here earlier. But I did not think that the Bill would have been brought on at this time. I was not aware that such rapid progress had been made with the Scotch Bill. With reference to this Bill, I am not going to discuss it as if it were in the Second Reading stage, but I very much regret that I had not an opportunity of discussing it on the Second Reading stage. I may state in one sentence the attitude which I feel towards this Bill. I was associated with the Royal Commission on the Civil Service for many years, and we went very fully into this question of superannuations, and we presented a Report relating to the subject quite as thick as the book in my hand. For several years I have been pressing the Government to take some action upon our recommendations. I do not attribute any blame to the Government. Perhaps the course they have taken may be owing to the exigencies of business, but they have brought in no Bill dealing with the whole scheme dealt with by the Royal Commission. My objection to this Bill is that it is merely a sectional Bill dealing with a very grave question. I have not heard what the Secretary to the Treasury said, but he certainly met me very frankly and fairly on more than one point which I shall mention when the time comes. I do not know what specific reasons he has for bringing on this Bill. They may be very good reasons; I do not say they are not, because I know nothing at all about them. But my objection to this Bill is that it is dealing in a very minute manner with a very great question. It is too late now for me to raise that question. The Second Reading stage was the proper time for raising that question. I was prepared to call attention to the enormous amount of money—two millions per annum—now paid for Civil Service pensions, in addition to what we are paying for the Army and Navy. However, that is no reason why we should not get into Committee on the Bill, and let the subject proceed; and I would ask my hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion.

(9.18.) MR. KNOX: I can only express my regret that I cannot accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman and take the course which he has recommended. If any of our Amendments had been accepted by the right hon. Gentleman who has charge of the Bill, if he had given us any quid pro quo, we might, perhaps, be in a more accommodating frame of mind. But not only has he not accepted any of our Amendments, but he has carefully abstained from explaining the nature of the provisions of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said he did not really know what was the object of bringing in this sectional Bill. I still suspect that the real object of this Bill is to give some extra advantage to certain gentlemen now serving as Resident Magistrates in Ireland. The Government have carefully abstained from giving a plain answer to a straight question—whether or not this Bill affects certain gentlemen now serving in Ireland as Resident Magistrates? I hope the Resident Magistrates and Divisional Commissioners will get no assistance from this House, and that we shall proceed no further with this Bill, about which we still know nothing. It may be that this is an innocent Bill; but if it is an innocent Bill it ought to be possible for the right hon. Gentleman to have either presented a Paper showing in black and white how many Civil servants would be affected by it, or to have given a definite answer upon the subject. The only explanation which we have of the proposals of this Bill is the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that so far as he knows there will be no charge thrown on the revenue by this Bill. Now if that is the case, what is the use of the Bill at all? In pressing this Motion I wish to make it clear that I do not act from any wish to obstruct legitimate business; and it would be very much better that we should proceed with the Bills that relate to the poor law schools in Ireland, or some other simple Bills which we can understand, and leave this Bill which nobody seems to understand for investigation on some subsequent occasion.

(9.21.) MR. STOREY: From what I had been told by the Secretary to the Treasury I was under the impression that this Bill was an innocent Bill, and that it did not involve any additional large amount of money to be charged against the English Exchequer. Since I went out of this room I have got information which makes me gravely doubt whether or not I was not too simple in accepting that view of the situation, and whether, on the contrary, this is not a Bill which may cause a very serious charge upon the Exchequer. I must say I freely endorse the opinions which have been expressed by the right hon. Gentleman on our Front Bench, who has been at the Treasury too, and I hope he will support me when I say that in his time no Bill was carried through which involved an additional charge on the Treasury without the Minister furnishing to the House something like an authoritative statement as to what the amount of that charge would be. I now ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Is there going to be an extra charge by this Bill, and, if so, what is the amount of that charge; and is it not his bounden duty to communicate that information to the House before we proceed further with this Bill? I will give an illustration. By the rule contemplated by this Bill an Indian Uncovenanted Civil servant, on leaving India and taking up an English appointment afterwards, say at fifty years of age at a salary of £1,500 per annum, and holding that appointment for five years, would he or would he not be entitled to count for pension, not simply on the Indian scale, but on the English scale, because the Bill says in the second sub-section that he shall be entitled to his pension as if his whole service had been in the public office from which he ultimately retires? On the Indian Service scale he would be entitled to a pension of £475 a year; but on the English scale he would be entitled to £1,000 a year. I want to know from the Government whether that is the case or not; because if it is, it seems to me that this is a distinct attempt, without giving the House full information, very largely to increase the already bloated amount we expend on pensions to Civil Servants. If that be correct—and I must say I have reason to know that it is correct—I would submit that this multiplied by the number of persons involved constitutes a great additional charge upon the Exchequer here and in India. India, however, is in this condition that she cannot be charged, and, therefore, I am mainly concerned with this country. I venture to impress upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer this fact, that we have a right to know what this additional charge will probably be. Our fear is that under cover of this new proposal there is going to be a great extension of the system of pensions; and as guardians of the public purse we have a right to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer has he gone into the matter? Is the amount large or small? If it is small, let him tell us the amount; and if it is small we shall be delivered from further discussion.

(9.29.) MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): There is no one who has listened to this discussion but would arrive at the conclusion that a case has been irresistibly made out for the Motion which was originally made in order that the House might be given further information regarding the real meaning of this Bill. The question was whether or not this Bill would apply to the highly-salaried servants of India and in our Colonies on returning to this country and continuing in the Public Service. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury made the extraordinary admission that he could not give us any information on that point, and said that if we wanted any particulars, we ought to address a question to him later on. I do not think that that is exactly the position which anyone in charge of a Bill of such great importance should take up. Either the right hon. Gentleman understands the Bill or he does not. If he does, he ought to answer the question. If the Bill does not apply to highly-salaried officials, no further opposition will be made to the Bill, but it will be allowed to pass at once. I, therefore, hope we shall now have a declaration on behalf of the Government as to what is the real meaning of the Bill.

*(9.32.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I hope that when the Financial Secretary comes back from his dinner he will be able to give us some information on the two questions which I put to him—namely, whether, in the first place, he would not consent to report Progress, so that he could give us information as to the meaning of the Bill and the amount of money involved; and, in the second place, whether, if, as he stated, the Bill only applies to constabulary and prison officials, he would consent to words being introduced limiting the operation of the Bill to those two classes? I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman will condescend to answer these questions. If the Bill applies only to servants with small salaries, I shall willingly see it pass, because, until we do away with pensions altogether, the working men and small-salaried officials should be pensioned as well as the more highly paid officials.

*SIR J. GORST: I am very reluctant to make another speech on this question, especially as it seems that all I say is twisted by hon. Members below the Gangway opposite. ("No!") I never said, as the hon. Member for Peterborough stated, that the Bill would only apply to prison officials and constabulary officers.

*MR. MORTON: You mentioned only their cases.

*(9.33.) SIR J. GORST: I am very sorry that I failed to make myself intelligible to the hon. Member. What I did say was that the officers who lost their rights of pension by transference from one office to another were principally constabulary and prison officers; that they, therefore, were the officers who will benefit chiefly—I guarded myself by saying "chiefly"—from the provisions of the Bill. With regard to the question which the hon. Member has asked as to the number of persons who will be benefited by this Bill, it would not be possible to state categorically the number, for that remains to futurity. In fact, next year officers may be transferred from the constabulary to the prison service, and from the prison service to some other service. I really do not think I deserve the censure so freely passed upon me by hon. Members opposite, that I have been concealing some great conspiracy under this very simple Bill.

MR. STOREY: No; you said you did not know.

*SIR J. GORST: What I did say was that the Bill had been brought in in consequence of the practical difficulties experienced in awarding pensions, and I gave the Committee a concrete instance of those difficulties. The number of persons will certainly be small. The charge upon the Public Revenue, if there be any charge, will certainly be insignificant.

MR. STOREY: Have you calculated it?

*SIR J. GORST: No; because a calculation is impossible.

MR. STOREY: Then, an estimate?

*SIR J. GORST: It is impossible to make either a calculation or an estimate. Hon. Members may take my declaration as an officer of the Government that the charge will be infinitesimal, that it will not be a great one, and that it will not figure in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget, or as an important item in the Expenditure of this or any other year. I am very sorry for the way in which this Bill has been received, because it affects the interests of many of the poorer servants of the Crown; and the idea of hon. Members below the Gangway opposite that the Bill is proposed in the interest of highly-paid and highly-salaried public servants is a pure imagination, and has no foundation in reality. If the Committee would consent to go on with the Bill and consider the clauses, we should, I believe, soon arrive at a satisfactory conclusion.

DR. TANNER: Will it affect the Irish Resident Magistrates?

*SIR J. GORST: Certainly.

DR. TANNER: Ah! That is it.

(9.37.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I have not intervened in this Debate before, and I should be very sorry to impute to the right hon. Gentleman any underhand motives. I think he has given us a clear statement, and I am perfectly willing myself to accept his declaration as an officer of the Government. But in matters of this kind I think we are entitled—I cannot say to doubt the word of a Minister, but, having regard to the natural jealousy with which Members of the House of Commons are bound to look upon suggested legislation respecting pensions and superannuations, to ask that everything connected with the proposal shall be placed in the clearest form before the House and the country. We should have not merely the declaration of a Minister of the Crown on that side of the House; but we should have embodied in the Bill all the material necessary for enabling us to form our own judgment as to whether the proposed legislation is useful or not. I want to put this point before the right hon. Gentleman, and I think he will see that it is a reasonable suggestion. He will observe that the Bill in its title, and also in other parts, refers to a series of Acts extending from the years 1834 to 1887. I have taken the trouble to count up in the archives of the Legislature the number of those Acts, and I find there are no less than 21 Superannuation Acts which have been passed during the years I have named. Those Acts apply to all classes of military and civil servants employed in the service of this country. The right hon. Gentleman has just said, in answer to a friend of mine on this side of the House, that there are two classes, principally, of servants of the country who will be affected by this Bill—prison officials and constabulary officers—but he did not, as I understood him, exclude in his remarks the possibility of this Bill, when it passes into law, applying also to other classes and categories of public servants. If I have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, I desire an explicit statement from him as to whether we are to understand that he does exclude from the operation of this Bill all other classes except those I have named.

SIR J. GORST: No.

MR. CONYBEARE: The right hon. Gentleman says "No." We have a right to look at it from this point of view—that it does affect the different classes of public servants who are dealt with by these 21 Acts passed between 1834 and 1887. Everybody knows perfectly well the difficulty of wading through a long series of Acts of Parliament, piecing them together, seeing how they work one with another, and what the effect of any proposed legislation is as regards all these previous Acts. I ask the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, as he has not given us any Memorandum to this Bill explicitly stating what the effect of this proposal will be, whether he would not consent to give us a Schedule enumerating all these different Acts, and stating in what particular this new proposal will affect the different classes dealt with by those Acts, so that we may have clearly before us the exact relations of this new proposal to all these previous Acts? I understand we are now discussing a Motion that you do report Progress; and I think the suggestion I have made, and the argument I have used, is weighty in this behalf, as showing the desirability of reporting Progress now, in order that the right hon. Gentleman, before we resume the Debate, may give us the further information which will enable us to deal fairly and justly with this Bill. I am quite sure that there is no desire on the part of Members on this side of the House to deal unfairly or unjustly with this proposal, more especially as the right hon. Gentleman tells us it is mainly intended to affect and improve the position of a class of public servants who, I am perfectly certain and know, are highly deserving of our most favourable consideration. But we have a right to know what other classes are likely to be benefited besides those mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman; and considering the mass of material contained in those 21 Acts of Parliament, we ought to know where we are and what will be the effect of this proposal as regards the provisions of all those other Acts. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman and to the Leader of the House whether it is not perfectly reasonable to accept now the Motion to report Progress, in order that we may resume our consideration of the Bill with the additional information which I am certain we are entitled to?

(9.44.) SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I would press upon the Government the real necessity of acceding to the wishes of my hon. Friends who are pressing them in this manner. The fact is we have already devoted two hours to the discussion of the Motion for reporting Progress, and we are not making any advance in the Business of the House, and I do not think we shall make any advance. I think the claim made upon the Government is very reasonable. I voted for the Closure and for the Second Reading of the Bill, and I have not the least desire to stand in its way; but it is quite clear there is a doubt on this side of the House—which may be founded rightly or wrongly—as to the scope of the measure, and we do deserve from the Government Benches a full account of that scope. If in another few days the responsible Minister will give us a Memorandum or make a statement which would show exactly what are the real facts so far as this Bill is concerned—how far it will go—then all opposition will cease.

* (9.46.) SIR J. GORST : May I say one word more? My only objection to report Progress now is that if Progress were reported further procedure with this Bill would be endangered. I am most anxious, for the sake of the classes whom I have indicated, that this Bill should become law. Hon. Members accept the principle of the Bill. It is contained in the first clause, and is simply that a man who has served the State in one particular Department shall not forfeit all right to a pension which may have accrued to him by his service in that Department by reason of his being transferred in the interest of the public from one Department to another. Do hon. Members below the Gangway who are jealous of the rights of the taxpayers of this country say that, if a public servant is transferred from one Department to another, he ought to forfeit his pension by reason of that transfer? That principle will chiefly be operative in the case of prison officials. I will not commit myself to saying that it may not be operative in the case of other public servants; but, if so, it is right that it should be.

MR. STOREY : Will it double their superannuation?

* SIR J. GORST : It will not double the superannuation of anybody.

MR. STOREY : Will it increase their superannuation?

* SIR J. GORST : It will increase it, for, at the present moment, they are not entitled to any superannuation at all. I understand that exception is taken to the Bill on account of the clause which says that their superannuation shall be determined by the last office from which they retire. All I can say is, that that is the principle of superannuation now, and is not a novel principle inserted in this Bill. When an officer who has been transferred from Department to Department and from post to post finally retires from the Public Service, his superannuation is calculated upon the last office which he has held. That is the present principle, and I do not think hon. Gentlemen have a right to ask me in this Bill to introduce a novel principle in the superannuation of public servants. If it is to be introduced, it should be done in a general Act, amending the plan of superannuation in this country. It ought not to be introduced as regards only the officers affected by this Bill. Why are they to be made the subjects of a novel principle which is not to be applied to the others? All that this Bill lays down is that persons transferred from certain excepted Departments to other Departments should not be in a worse position than other servants of the State. I do not see any reason why such an exception should exist.

(9.52.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) : It seems to me that the latter part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was absolutely contrary to the first part. The rule upon which pensions are granted is that if a man has given his whole time to the service of the State it would reckon for his pension, so that when a man is transferred from the Customs or the Excise to another Department there is no grievance. But in the latter part of his speech the right hon. Gentleman asked whether it was fair that men who had served in certain excepted portions of the Service should lose their time of service when transferred. I quite agree that there is a hardship in the case of prison servants who have not, strictly speaking, been in the Public Service. But that is not the only case which this Bill meets. It meets that case and a great many more. The right hon. Gentleman said that Resident Magistrates would come under the rule. For my own part, I deny that there is any class of public servants in regard to which the most improper rule as to professional qualifications has been more lavishly put in force than in the case of these gentlemen. I understood from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the present Government have abolished the plan of a qualifying number of years. If this Bill is intended to cover this class, I think that the hon. Member for Sunderland is quite right in his action. If it is confined to the constabulary and prison officials, I have nothing to say, except to ask that the Rules should be laid on the Table of the House, and that the House should have a veto. But if this Bill is to be a reconstruction of the Pension Rules, then I contend that the right hon. Gentleman has no right to deal with such a question piecemeal. I will ask the Government, considering the feeling of the Committee and their desire for further knowledge, to re-consider this Bill and re-introduce it in a shape which would allow hon. Members to give it every assistance, which would be done if it dealt with prison and constabulary officials and minor public servants who have been at a disadvantage without dealing with the whole Indian Service.

(9.56.) MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): We have not had one word of reply from the Government in regard to the Indian question. The practical effect of this Bill will be that a man who has left one branch of the Service and is entitled to a pension of £475 would, by his subsequent service, find himself entitled to a pension of £1,000, and that chiefly in respect of his earlier service; and this is an illustration with which the right hon. Gentleman has not dealt. The right hon. Gentleman cannot expect us to answer conundrums, especially legal conundrums. I am not putting this case as a conundrum—it is a concrete case. A man who has been in the Indian Service at a high salary entitling him to a low pension will, under this Bill, practically have his pension doubled.

*SIR J. GORST: The case which has been put could not happen under this Bill. It has been said that a retired Indian Civil servant would have an increase made in the pension payable to him out of the Revenues of India.

MR. CRAIG: I did not say that.

*SIR J. GORST: The Indian Civil servant would not be entitled to have his Indian pension increased out of the Revenues of either India or England. There is a proviso that the Secretary of State in Council shall determine the amount to be paid from the Revenues of India, and we have no power to increase a pension regulated by the India Acts.

(10.3.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I cannot quite reconcile the statements just made by the right hon. Gentleman with the terms of the

Mr. H. H. Fowler

Bill, which are that the superannuation is to be the same as if the whole service had been in the office last held. Consequently, if the Indian Service entitle a man to a pension of £375 and the Home Service scale to £1,000 for the whole period of service, the difference would have been made up out of the English Exchequer. We do not want to know more than the class for which this Bill is required. If the right hon. Gentleman can point out to us that this class, in comparison with the whole, is insignificant, I think the opposition will soon cease, and that we shall join with him in removing any chance of injustice.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS: I think the House will see that the right hon. Gentleman has, by his explanation of the purposes of this Bill, added another reason why we should report Progress. It is absolutely clear that under subsection 1 of Section 1 the pension to which a man is to be entitled after ten years' service is to be a calculation upon the pension which he would be entitled to if the whole of his service had been rendered in the office he held at the time of receiving the pension. The right hon. Gentleman says "No," but if the English language means what we understand it to mean, he really has not mastered the 1st Sub-section of the Bill. Moreover, if that is so, we are going directly in the teeth of the Commissioners. They reported that in cases of this kind the pension should be granted upon the average salary which had been received by the public servant during the last ten years of his service. I really think abundant reasons have been given why you should leave the Chair, and why the Government should be allowed further time in order to master the details of the Bill.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The Secretary to the Treasury demurs to the proposal to report Progress as a new principle. It seems to me we are, however, proceeding upon a very new principle when in the Committee stage of a Bill, which was passed through its Second Reading stage by means of the Closure after half-an-hour's Debate, we find that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill is obviously unacquainted with its provisions, its scope, and its effect. He told the Committee frankly that he was unable to say what would be the additional charge upon the taxpayer. I should have thought that the fact that the Bill will throw an additional tax on the ratepayer was reason for not starting the Bill in the Committee stage of the House. I desire to point out that in the title of this Bill we are informed that certain Departments are to be dealt with which are not included in the Superannuation Act. There are several of such Departments in this country and abroad, notably in India. The servants in these Departments are receiving high salaries, purposely so fixed in order to cover superannuation. If they are to be included it means that you embrace those who have already been receiving the equivalent of superannuation. The right hon. Gentleman has not dealt with that point. In distinction to the title of the Bill, the last words of 2nd section of the 1st clause says—

“The officer in question is to be treated as if the whole of his service had been in the public office from which he ultimately retires.”

SIR J. GORST: That is not so. The expression “public office” means an office the service of which qualifies for grant of superannuation allowance.

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman has told us that the Resident Magistrates in Ireland come in. At every turn we are confronted with new difficulties and new contradictions. All we ask is that the the Government should be allowed time to inform themselves as to the effect of the provisions of their own Bill.

MR. PHILIPPS: The Committee has to-night constituted itself into a sort of mutual information bureau, but instead of receiving, we have been giving more than has been accorded us. The information we have received from the Government is that the Resident Magistrates in Ireland come under the scope of this Bill, and apparently that is the only fact the right hon. Gentleman has not himself contradicted later. In return we have given him three pieces of information. We have told him that by his Bill the Army and Navy were excluded. He denied it, and we proved it to him by his own Bill. Then we told him that certain people who had served in India were included. He denied it, and we proved it. Lastly, we told him, and proved the statement by the Bill, that the pensions under this Bill were to be based upon the last office that the office-holder enjoyed. In return he has only given us the fact that the Irish Resident Magistrates are included. Thus the mutual instruction bureau has been conducted under unequal conditions. I should like the Chancellor of the Exchequer to tell us what additional charge this Bill would throw upon the taxpayer, and I should also like some gentleman connected with the Government of India to tell us what Indian officers will be benefited by this Bill. For my part, I do not believe that any Government, much less the present one, would spend an evening in an effort to benefit possibly half-a-dozen Custom or Excise officers. Has the Government any friends or relatives to benefit by this Bill? Let the right hon. Gentleman out with it and make a clean breast of the matter; let the Government delay the Bill and give the Committee a schedule of the persons whom the Bill would benefit. Present opposition will only be met by such a course. If that is not done, most people will believe the Bill is a job, and is not intended to benefit the Excise officers of whom the right hon. Gentleman has spoken of so pathetically and innocently.

*SIR J. GORST: Without one tittle of evidence the hon. Member for Mid Lanark has accused Her Majesty’s Government of dishonesty or some ulterior motive in bringing forward this Bill.

MR. PHILIPPS: Not dishonesty.

*SIR J. GORST: The hon. Member says, “Out with it.” I have already stated more than once an instance of the way in which the Bill will operate. A warder who started in Canterbury Prison under the Prison Authority of the County of Kent served in that capacity from March, 1875, to April, 1878, having his salary paid during that time out of the Kent County rates. He was then transferred as a warder to Wandsworth Prison, where he served from April, 1878, to February, 1886, his salary being then paid out of a Parliamentary grant. From Wandsworth Prison he was transferred to the Isle of Man, where he served from February, 1886, to March, 1891, his salary during that time being paid from the revenues of the Isle of Man. That man is not a member of the Government, nor a rich and wealthy scion of the aristocracy, but he has served the country well from 1875 to 1891. He is now in ill-health, and cannot continue his employment, and I say that that man is entitled to a pension or some retiring allowance. According to the existing law, through some mistake or misapprehension apparently, on the part of the Legislature, the man, by reason of the peculiar circumstances of his case, was not entitled to a sixpence on retiring from work, and the Treasury are unable to award him anything whatever. But I bring a Bill before the House of Commons which will enable the Treasury to award that man a pension; and how is it received by hon. Members who arrogate to themselves the title of Liberals? For nearly three hours it has been opposed by all sorts of objections. They have endeavoured to obstruct it, and so prevent this poor man from obtaining the pension he so justly deserves. Mr. Courtney, this is the man for whom I want a pension.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): There is no dispute on this side of the House in regard to the merits of the case which the right hon. Gentleman has brought before the Committee, but it is ridiculous to cite that case as the only one which the Bill is intended to benefit. What this side of the House wishes to know is: What are the other cases? I believe this is a subterfuge, under cover of which it is intended that others than the prison officials mentioned should derive benefit from the Bill. If the Government will restrict the Bill to that class of cases of which the right hon. Gentleman has given an example, it will be passed at once. But if the Bill is meant to apply to other cases, tell us what those other cases are, and, if you do not know, report

Sir J. Gorst

Progress and ascertain. Now, I will give hon. Members an instance of the extent of the ignorance—or, perhaps, an attempt to mislead—of the right hon. Gentleman. It was pointed out on this side of the House that the retiring allowance would be in accordance with the salary received by a person at the time of his retirement. The Secretary to the Treasury said, "Nothing of the kind." But the Bill says the retiring allowance is to be according to the salary received in the office from which a man retires. I think we are entitled to know whether the right hon. Gentleman's view of the words relating to this question is correct. The right hon. Gentleman obviously does not understand the Bill of which he has charge, and I think we should report Progress in order that the Secretary to the Treasury, or some other Member of the Government should inform himself of the scope of the Bill and tell us plainly what it is.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Perhaps the colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman, especially the First Lord, who has lately become sensible of the responsibilities of office, will be of opinion that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Gorst) is one that is not likely to tend to the despatch of business in this House, or to smooth the passage of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has lost the imperturbability, the logical powers, which distinguished him at the India Office, and won for him the admiration of everybody except his own superiors. The animated speech of the right hon. Gentleman exhibited the maximum of bad temper and then sank to the low water mark of argumentative power. An attempt has been made to justify this Bill by reference to one pathetic case. But, Sir, what relation is there between the case of this humble prison warder and a Bill which traverses the whole round of the British Empire? I say it is the duty of Government in submitting Bills of this description which involve fresh burdens on the Public Purse, to submit them in a plain form, so that we who have to vote away the money may know to what liability we consent. But this Bill is not frank and straightforward. It is a Bill which proposes to filch money from the Public Purse by stealth. I have no objection to a Bill in which the case of the Kent warder or the case of any other deserving public servant is dealt with, if its objects are frankly and plainly stated, but I do object to a Bill which only exposes to this House a small part of its meaning, and which may be used by-and-by to give exaggerated pensions to persons whose claims this House would not be willing to recognise. Why, Mr. Courtney, the mere fact which has been extracted, that this Bill applies to Resident Magistrates in Ireland, stamps it at once as a Bill of extremely contentious character. We are on the eve of an appeal to the people on the subject of Government in Ireland. We hope soon to decrease the number of these Resident Magistrates, and reduce their salaries, and I ask, Is it tolerable that we should pass a Bill which will entitle the Government to retire these persons upon excessive and inequitable pensions, just at a moment when we might be able to dispose of them on terms more equitable to the people? Under this Bill Colonel Caddell could be dealt with. That person was a Resident Magistrate who distinguished himself by trampling on public rights and by reckless violence in Ireland. For that service against the people he was promoted to an office giving him £800 a year. One effect of this Bill, if passed, would be that the pension of that gentleman, instead of being calculated on his salary as Resident Magistrate, would be calculated on the £800 a year. Why, Sir, I stigmatise such a transaction as that as a fraud. For my own part, I am disposed to regard with the most jealous scrutiny the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman. He is liberal enough with the Consolidated Fund or any other fund for Resident Magistrates and persons of that class.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is now discussing the principle of the Bill.

MR. SEXTON: Well, Sir, I gladly leave it. It is a principle that hardly bears discussion. I quite agree with you that the less we say about it the better. But I would suggest, before we proceed further with the Bill, that the right hon. Gentleman, with a view of informing himself, as well as informing the House, as to the scope of the Bill, should see that a Memorandum is affixed to the Bill stating to what class of public officials it would refer, what increase it would make in their pensions, and what burden would be involved on the Public Purse.

*(10.36.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): If this Bill referred only to cases of gentlemen who in the service of the country have gradually risen from one branch to another, whether in the Isle of Man, in England, or Ireland, we should be glad to facilitate its passing. But we find that the Bill does not only deal with cases of that kind, but under its provisions a man may be moved about from one branch to another, merely in order to increase his pension.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That is not pertinent to the Question before the House, which is to report Progress.

*MR. WEBB: I bow, Sir, to your decision, but I think enough has been revealed in the course of this discussion to show, not only that the country should have a little time to discuss this Bill, but also that the Government should have a little time to study it in order that they may properly understand it. I think the Debate ought to be put off for a few days, so that the country, through the newspapers, may be informed of the character of the measure.

(10.37.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I will appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in the interests of Public Business, he will not now accede to this Motion? It must be apparent to him that it would be impossible to get through this Bill to-night. There is a very wide field now open, which the House will, without doubt, explore, and I think it would very much promote both the carrying on of the business of the House, and the ultimate passing of this Bill, if the First Lord of the Treasury would now allow this Motion to pass, and undertake that a Memorandum shall be placed on the Paper stating what the effect of this Bill is really intended to be. And I repeat the offer that I made an hour and a half ago, that if the Bill is confined to those persons whom the Secretary to the Treasury has described, we will offer every facility for the passing of the Bill. But if, on the other hand, it is found to re-open the whole question of superannuation, or in any way to traverse the recommendations of the Committee on this subject, we shall be obliged to offer to it a most uncompromising opposition.

(10.39.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With respect to the appeal made to me by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler), I do not pretend to believe that the present humour of the House is such as to encourage the hope of speedy progress with legislation; but I do not think that in itself is a sufficient reason for adjourning the discussion, which I may mention has now been going on for nearly three hours. The right hon. Gentleman says, and says I think truly, that if this Bill is to traverse the recommendations of the Commission of which he was so important a Member, we ought not to press it on the House. But it is a Bill, as the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir J. Gorst) has more than once told the House, small in its scope, small in the number of persons it directly affects, and small in the amount of financial burden which it can by any possibility throw upon the Public Purse. What it really does is to deal with two or three exceptional classes of pensions which have not been brought as yet into line with the general pension scheme. Under existing arrangements a public officer who might be eminently suited for some post in another branch of the Civil Service in which pensions were given under a different scheme is put in this dilemma—either he must refuse the new post, because he would lose pension thereby, or he must take the new post at a great sacrifice of pension. That limits the choice of the Government, which is a misfortune, and it

inflicts hardship on individuals, which is also a misfortune. That is a state of things which we ask the House to remedy. The Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) brought before the Committee the case of some imaginary Civil servant in India who is to be brought home after serving a long time in India and placed in a position of considerable emolument in the English Civil Service. Under certain circumstances, that man might receive a greater pension than he would probably be considered to be entitled to; but, of course, he would not receive a pension in the new place in respect of the service of his old place if his old place had no pension. But we can easily set to work to imagine cases in which people are suddenly advanced from low to very high salaries, and in which the amount of their pension seems excessive in comparison with the general average of their pay over the whole period of their service. I quite grant that that is the case, but that is not a peculiarity of the Bill. It is, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, an established principle of the British Civil Service, and one which, on the whole, I do not think it would be wise for us to alter. It may occasionally produce abnormal pensions, but such cases are rare, and if they take place at all they can only take place in cases of exceptional merit, and in those cases I think the House would not grudge the larger pension which promotion gave to the official of merit. Further, that larger pension would not be given under this Bill, but under the general pension scheme of the country. I have been asked to say in the Memorandum which has been spoken of whether this Bill applies to Resident Magistrates. Certainly it does, just the same as it applies to every other Civil servant—just so much and no more—and I do not think hon. Gentlemen would desire to exclude them from their just rights in the way of pension, which are considered just with respect to the rest of the Civil Service of which the Resident Magistrates are an integral part. It would be in the highest degree impossible to say to any branch of the Civil Service, "You, and you only shall not be affected by the Bill." But the fact that Resident Magistrates are covered by this Bill when they are transferred to other offices is not, so far as I can see, any reason why this Bill should not pass, and I would point out that the only way in which Resident Magistrates can be affected by this Bill is when they are transferred to some other place which at present has not a similar pension scheme, or is not in line with the general pension scheme of the country. I do not know who contemplates the promotion of Resident Magistrates, and I maintain that this is not a sufficient reason for stopping the discussion of this Bill, which is intended to remedy a great, though not a very wide-spread, injustice, and to enable the Government to have a fair field of selection in the transfer of Civil Servants who have deserved promotion by the services they have rendered. There is no desire on the part of the Government to traverse the Report of the Commission to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded, and I earnestly press upon the House not to go further with this Motion, but to proceed to the discussion of the Bill.

*(10.47.) MR. MORTON: Several appeals have been made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give us information as to the estimated charge this Bill will make upon the taxpayers of the country. He has not answered that appeal; but I hope he will do so, because we have a right to insist on having that information. I would also make an appeal to the Leader of the House. He said just now that if this Bill was in any way affected by the recommendations of the Royal Commission of which the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler) was a Member, it ought not to pass. I say undoubtedly it is largely affected by that Report. One of the recommendations of that Commission is that from all future pensions there shall be a deduction of five per cent. towards a Pension Fund. There is no such proposal in the Bill, and there are other recommendations of that Commission which receive no attention in this measure. Under all the circumstances, I think the right hon. Gentleman would save time if he allowed us to report Progress with a view to the preparation of the Memorandum which has been asked for. But if the Government will not consent to that, I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the guardian of the Public Purse, will tell us now what is the estimated charge that this Bill, if it is passed, will make upon the funds.

*(10.50.) MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): We must all acknowledge, I am sure, the difference in manner and tone between the First Lord of the Treasury and the Secretary of the same Department. If the First Lord of the Treasury desires to facilitate the progress of this measure, he would do well first to curb the temper of the Secretary to the Treasury. I certainly hardly remember during the few years I have had a seat in this House such an exhibition as we have had from the Secretary to the Treasury. The First Lord of the Treasury has to a certain extent minimised the operation of the Bill; but the divergence between his language and that of the Secretary to the Treasury adds great force to the demand from this side that the Government itself should have further time to inform itself about the Bill. Members of such great Parliamentary experience as the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) and the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) have made the reasonable demand that we should have in black and white a Memorandum as to the scope and effect of the Bill, and the financial burden it will lay on the taxpayers. Surely that is a demand the Government cannot for a moment deny. The Chancellor of the Exchequer must, in the interests of the great office he holds, have had some idea conveyed to him as to the financial scope of the Bill; and if that be so, why should he not communicate it to the House? The mere fact—admitted under pressure—that Irish Resident Magistrates will have a right to come under the Bill, lends additional force to our arguments. In 1888 I occupied more than an hour of the time of the House with detailed accounts of the doings of these gentlemen, and I stand to everything I said then, yet the taxpayers are to be saddled with a large sum for the superannuation of gentlemen who have been exercising their functions in such an unsatisfactory manner during the past few years. We, who have devoted some time and attention to the government of Ireland in the last five or six years, will feel it our duty to scrutinise closely, and to strenuously oppose, if necessary, a Bill which proposes to alter the financial position of the Resident Magistrates in Ireland. I hope the First Lord of the Treasury will see his way to say that we shall have the Memorandum asked for.

(10.53.) MR. BIRRELL (Fife, W.): I confess that I am sorry I am here to-night, for, after losing my dinner and my temper, and listening to the whole of the Debate, all I know about the Bill is that it is very different from what was suggested on the Second Reading. There is a well-known saying of Dr. Johnson, who, when he was asked the meaning of a particular couplet in Pope, said he did not know what it meant, except that it was meant to give pain to some body. I only know that this Bill is to give pleasure to somebody, and who that somebody is we ought to know before we proceed further. I think an indignity has been put upon the Resident Magistrates by putting them at the tail of the Bill after all the other humbler Civil servants. Their names were not even mentioned on the Second Reading, and could it have been reasonably supposed by any fair-minded man that the Bill would benefit anyone except a humble class of Civil Servants? We find that this class of persons, to which natural objection is taken, are to be benefited; and I hope the House will, in justice to itself and to teach Ministers of the Crown that the best way to get measures through the House is to make a clean breast of it and tell Members what their object is, insist on its right to ask you, Sir, to report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

(10.55.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I only rise to point out the extraordinary self-contradiction in the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury. He told us, as an apology for the present position of the Government in this Debate, that there were only two or three exceptional classes of pensioners which would be dealt with by the Bill, and then within three minutes afterwards he said—I believe I give his own words—that the Bill would include “Resident Magistrates and all classes of public servants.” That is only another instance of what we have before observed with regard to the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues—namely, that they, practically speaking, come before the House and the Committee knowing nothing of the effect of their own Bills. The Secretary to the Treasury gave us what he called a concrete instance. I will, from the First Lord’s mouth, give a concrete instance to show the absurdity of saying that this Bill is only to provide for one or two exceptional classes. I ask, if that be the object of the Bill, why is the vast class of the pensioned officers of the Government of India brought in? They are drawing in pensions at present to the amount of no less than £3,300,000 a year, and are now without the benefit of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman knew that all these public servants would benefit by it, and yet he had the audacity to say that the Bill would only benefit two or three exceptional classes, and he does not give one word of explanation as to why the pensioners from India, already drawing over three millions sterling, have been obviously unnecessarily brought into the Bill.

(11.0.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S): I rise to support the Motion to report Progress, in order that there may be, in the interval between this and the next Sitting of the Committee, a Memorandum supplied to show us explicitly what public servants are to be benefited by the Bill, and in what manner. At length we have before us the Bill to protect the Resident Magistrates; this is the veiled, but real, intention of the Bill, and the Memorandum would show how many of them are to benefit. Eighteen months ago it came to my knowledge, from practically official sources, that the right hon. Gentleman, who was then Chief Secretary for Ireland, had given an undertaking to the Resident Magistrates to provide for them before his Government went out of office. The moment I heard that I gave the right hon. Gentleman ample opportunity of contradicting it if it were true—everyone who has had five or six years' experience of question and answer with the right hon. Gentleman will know that that is not an Irish bull, but is absolutely true. I wrote to the Daily News instantly, making the allegation, and also wrote a second letter, and they have not been contradicted from that day to this. But on the eve of the death of this Parliament comes this Bill, the true intention of which is to provide for the Resident Magistrates. The Memorandum asked for would show that no less than two-thirds of these 73 gentlemen have been in the Civil Service in India or elsewhere. Now that I have the right hon. Gentleman face to face, perhaps he will say whether or not I slandered him in saying in the Daily News that he was determined to protect the Resident Magistrates, and that we were as resolutely determined to oppose him?

*(11.4.) SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I do not intend to prolong the discussion beyond a moment or two; but I do urge on the First Lord of the Treasury—as to whom much has been said by my hon. Friend who has spoken from below the Gangway, and who certainly has shown, on the assumption of greater responsibility, wider and greater consideration to arguments addressed to him than when holding a former and less responsible position than that which he now occupies—to accept the Motion to report Progress. I think enough has been disclosed in this discussion to make it apparent that if the House had realised what were the real nature and scope of this Bill the arguments advanced against the Second Reading would have been different from those which were actually adduced, and we should not have had that Closure which a good many Members of this House now regret. Appeals have been made, none of which have been answered by those who have spoken from the Government Benches. It has been asked what are the classes which it is intended to benefit by this Bill? I cannot suppose that my right hon. Friend whose name is upon the back of this Bill, the Secretary to the Treasury, and those who have instructed him, had not in their minds, definitely and clearly, not the case of the gentleman who occupies the position of a warder in some part of Kent or the Isle of Man—because that case has been obviously got up for the purposes of this discussion. I cannot but suppose that my right hon. Friend and those who have instructed him—or who have informed him, if he objects to the word “instructed”—are thoroughly aware of the classes whom it is intended should be benefited by this Bill. What are these classes? Let it be fully and frankly stated by my right hon. Friend what these classes are. By the language which he has used, it would be made to appear that this was an extremely narrow application of the pension scheme, and that this proposal was only to apply to a little branch of the Civil Service. I think it cannot be supposed that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to whom more than one appeal has been made in this matter, has put his name or caused his name to be put on the back of this Bill without having submitted to him some Memorandum as to what the proposed increased cost of this measure would be to the taxation of the country, if it were passed. He has been appealed to to give these particulars, and he has not responded to the appeal. Lastly, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury said this Bill did not contravene any of the recommendations of the Committee that sat in 1888. While I am not going to discuss the merits of the Bill as a whole on a Motion to report Progress, I may say that I think the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken in that respect. Sub-section 2 of Clause 1 in distinct terms provides that—

“The allowance or gratuity of superannuation to any person is to be such as might be granted to him if his whole service had been in the public office from which he ultimately retires.”

The recommendation of the Committee is this—

"We think, on the whole, the case would be met by fixing the pension in proportion to the average salary for the last ten years."

It has been suggested—I do not know with what truth—that this is only an attempt on the part of the Government to put their Irish house in order, and to provide for the case of the Removable Magistrates. Let me put a case. A man begins with a salary of £300 a year. He shows what I will call extreme zeal in his office, and he is promoted to an appointment worth £600; and ultimately he is promoted to a position worth £1,000 a year. He has got that position only a year ago; and yet, under this Bill, he would be entitled to have a superannuation allowance, not upon the average service or salary of the last ten years, but on the last salary—namely, the maximum salary of £1,000 a year. I do submit, on the whole, that this is a case in which the right hon. Gentleman would be wise to yield to a demand which I submit is reasonable under the circumstances of the case, and let us know more about the history of this Bill, its real object, and its probable cost to the country before we proceed further with it.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): As my right hon. Friend has already stated to the House, it would be perfectly impossible to arrive at any such estimate, as these are exceptional cases. There are but a few cases which have come under the notice of the Treasury, such as the case suggested by my right hon. Friend, so few indeed that a very few thousand pounds would meet the whole of them. The hon. Member spoke as if a whole body were going to be affected by this Bill; but there will only be isolated men—a few men in a very large body, who might possibly be affected. The whole object of this Bill is to insure that transfer from one Department to another, where the pension arrangements are different, shall not inflict loss upon a man so transferred, so that he shall not lose his pension to which he would otherwise be entitled. That would apply to all branches of the Civil Service, but will mainly apply to the cases pointed out by my right hon. Friend, and these are the most numerous cases. So far as I can make out, hon. Members opposite have got hold of a bogey. I can assure hon. Members that really the whole question is a small one, that it applies only to single individuals who are in a special position, and that there is no intention whatever to change by this Bill the general pension arrangements of this country. As regards the argument which has been submitted by the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, and who says that Sub-section 2, Clause 1, runs counter to the recommendation of the Royal Commission which has done such great service, I would point this out to the Committee. If the recommendation of the Royal Commission is carried out—namely, that it is the average salary of the last ten years, and not of the last three years, which should be allowed to count for pension, then that must apply to the whole of the Civil Service, and not only to those transferred from one branch of the Service to another. But this proposal does not run counter to the general recommendation of the Committee; it is only a remedy for the particular grievance of those transferred from one place to another. I do not see—and I think hon. Members will agree with me—why in the case of a transfer the same number of years should not apply as would apply in a case where no transfer has taken place. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton that I have done my utmost, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury has done his utmost, to carry out the spirit and the views of the Royal Commission. If we considered that this Bill ran counter to the recommendations of that Commission, we should not have introduced this Bill, or given our sanction to it. All we wish to do by this Bill is to put a man who has been transferred in the same position as a man who has served continuously in one branch of the public service, and to remove that public grievance that you cannot transfer a man unless you make him sacrifice his pension, and therefore that you cannot promote a man whom you otherwise wish to promote in the interest of the public service, but must either limit your choice, or accept the other alternative of inflicting an injustice on a man who has served for a certain number of years. I assure the Committee that I have now stated frankly and in a straightforward way that the object of this Bill is simply to put men who have been transferred to a Department where different pension arrangements exist, as far as we could, under the same rule as those who have served continuously under one Department.

(11.15.) MR. STOREY: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has explained that this is a small Bill. If I thought that this was a small Bill I should withdraw the Motion which I made some time ago. But I think one is entitled to make this remark if the Bill is a small Bill and touches the interests of so few and so poor persons, I think it is a remarkable fact that a Government which is so greatly in arrear with its public work, and has important Bills which it is yearning to bring before the country, should absolutely force this little peddling Bill on the House. I must say that the draft on my credulity which the Secretary to the Treasury made was large; but in that respect the Chancellor of the Exchequer has exceeded him. I must say that I am very well content with the discussion that has taken place, and I think I have a good right to be, because we have been enabled to show that there is much more in this Bill than the Secretary to the Treasury would have us believe. I do not know what the views of my hon. Friend may be; but, for my own part, I should be very well content now to go to a Division.

(11.19.) MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I think the real difficulty of this evening has arisen out of this point—that we had not a Second Reading Debate on this Bill. When the hon. Member for Peterborough distinctly drew the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton should have an opportunity of discussing this Bill—in spite of that, he went with what I consider indecent haste and rushed through the Second Reading by means of the Closure. He immediately went and put down the Bill for next day. He got the Speaker out of the Chair by the ordinary Rules of the House, and proceeded to thrust the whole of this Bill down our throats, without our having any opportunity of putting down Amendments or discussing it in any particulars whatever. What is the scope of the Bill so far as we have heard? We have listened with attention to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has told us just now that there are only a few isolated cases that are covered by this Bill. If only a few isolated cases are to be covered by this Bill, as he wishes us to believe, these isolated cases can be put clearly and definitely before the House; and we should not be asked to vote for a Bill with general provisions, such as this Bill contains, if there are only a few isolated cases, as the right hon. Gentleman insinuates. But I take it that the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer shows the necessity of your reporting Progress more thoroughly than any argument urged from our side. He has told us that there is a very small scope indeed to this Bill, and that it will affect only a few isolated cases. We ought to give him the opportunity which he must require of laying before the House the necessary information with regard to those few isolated cases. We read this Bill, so far as it is placed in our hands, to have very wide and very far-reaching conditions contained within it. If we are wrong, then let us have full information with regard to it before we are asked to discuss any clause in it, so that we may know exactly where we are. If we are right, then we have justified our position. But I do not think, so far as the Debate has gone, anything has been said from the Ministerial Benches to show us that if we pass this Bill as it is at present we shall not be pledging this House to very far-reaching propositions indeed, and we shall not really know what we have done towards pledging the taxpayers of this country. I want to know —for I cannot find it in the scope of this Bill—what class of Civil Servants is included in it. I want to know whether it brings them all in, or whether those who are of the industrial classes in the service of the Government are covered, and will have an opportunity of reaping any benefit under it as well as those who have had the benefit of holding office in high places and high favour, and with high salaries. The whole of the clauses are a set of general propositions which may be applied just as the Government of the day cares to apply them, and which may be ignored just as the Government of the day cares to ignore them. And I think we should be neglecting our duty as the guardians of the Public Purse if we allowed a Bill of this description to pass through the House until we have been supplied with all the necessary information to enable us to understand the measure. What is the course of the Government? To attempt, as they have done, without any information whatever, to pass this Bill. There was no real information in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and we are expected to swallow this Bill without any information. I think the best thing the Government can do is to give way to the evident opinion of Members on this side of the House. At present the Government do not seem to care to give us that information. The Chancellor of the Exchequer chided Members on this side of the House for believing that there was a large sum of money involved in this Bill. He said it was only a question of a few thousands of pounds. Then, I say we ought to know where those few thousands of pounds are to go to, and to know whether we are committing ourselves to anything else. If it is only a question of a few thousands of pounds, it can easily be set out in a Memorandum, which can be prepared in the next few days, and then we can enter upon the Committee stage of this Bill with a clear mind, knowing exactly where we are going to. I ask the First Lord of the Treasury to give us this information which we desire. I am sure as Leader of the House he would be facilitating very much the progress of the measure in which he seems, or his Government seem to be deeply concerned. He must expect us to feel rather sore with regard to this Bill, and to resent the way in which the Second Reading was got. I know if he were sitting on this side he would be one of the first Members to resent the way in which this Bill has been thrust upon the House, and he must give us credit for holding the same sentiments. I do not know whether he intends to listen to the rational request of the Members on this side, and to the very strong reference which has been made with regard to the Report of the Commission of 1883. It has been pointed out over and over again that this Bill goes contrary to the Report of that Commission. I ask him distinctly and clearly whether he intends that we shall fight this Bill to the bitter end? If he will not listen to our request, then he must be prepared that on every Amendment we move to this Bill we shall fight with determination and as long as we possibly can, because we do not know to what we are being committed. I am not going into the question as to whether this Bill has been put down to stop legislation. I am astounded at the proceedings of the Government not with regard to this Bill, but with regard to other Bills. They say they have a large programme—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member has made a very rambling speech wholly disconnected with the Bill.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: I am very sorry if I have been rambling. I will refer to the Bill directly. I want information before I go into Committee on this Bill with regard to how far the country is pledged under it. I read Section 2 of Clause 1 and I say its scope is of such a character that we have no information before the House enabling us to vote upon it. That information should have been given in the Second Reading of the Bill, and we have a right to ask for it now. I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether we are to have more definite information than we have had with regard to this clause. I have tried to base my criticism upon the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I particularly took

QUESTIONS.

VOLUNTEERS AND JURY SERVICE.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he can state when the Lord Chancellor will introduce the measure contemplated dealing with the Jury Laws; and if, having regard to the facts brought forward showing that the liability to jury service of the Volunteer Force extends to only 25 per cent. of the non-commissioned officers, and eight per cent. of the privates, Her Majesty's Government see their way to extend the concession as regards the officers to other ranks?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The Lord Chancellor has not yet informed me of the date when he proposes to introduce the measure dealing with the Jury Laws. I am afraid I must ask my hon. and gallant Friend to bring his influence to bear upon the Lord Chancellor to secure the further concession he desires.

RE-DIRECTION OF LETTERS.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General under what authority, and at whose instigation, the postal officials of the Western Central District caused certain letters directed to one Woodcock, 106, High Holborn, to be sent to another person at another address from 22nd December, 1891, or from about that date, to 9th March, 1892, without the assent, and contrary to the repeated remonstrances of Woodcock; whether such conduct on the part of such Post Office officials was legal; and whether, inasmuch as there is no legal remedy, by way of damages, for the loss caused by such illegal acts, he will undertake that stringent orders are issued to prevent any repetition in the future of similar acts?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The letters to Mr. Woodcock referred to in the question were, under the authority of the Postmaster General, re-directed to an accountant to whom Mr. Woodcock had made an assignment of all his property except household furniture and leaseholds for the benefit of creditors. The letters could not be delivered as addressed, inasmuch as Mr. Woodcock had left the place of address. They were re-directed to the assignee, because upon perusal of the deed of assignment its terms appeared to be sufficiently large to cover the business letters of Mr. Woodcock. In consequence, however, of the objections raised on the part of Mr. Woodcock the assignee was in March last further communicated with, and it was ultimately arranged that letters addressed in Mr. Woodcock's own name without the addition of the words "and Company" should be re-directed to him. The re-direction was justified by the terms of the assignment; but in future cases of the same kind, where there is any dispute between the assignor and the Trustee as to the delivery of the assignor's letters, it would, I think, be better that such letters should either be delivered as addressed or returned to the senders, and instructions will be given accordingly.

MR. KELLY: Arising out of this answer may I ask whether, in the absence of Orders under Section 26 of the Act of 1883, the Postmaster General claims to have letters re-addressed? May I further point out that the remedy the right hon. Gentleman suggests for the future would be fatal to the debtor—that of sending all letters back to his customers?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Department acted under legal advice in what they did, but I recognise the inconvenience of returning such letters. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that communication between himself and the legal adviser of the Post Office would be useful, then that gentleman will be very happy to see my hon. Friend.

RECKLESS BICYCLE RIDING.

THE MARQUESS OF GRANBY (Leicestershire, Melton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the number of accidents caused to the public by reckless bicycle riders; whether he has seen a letter in the Times, of 3rd May, from a sufferer from injuries caused by being knocked down by a bicycle in Holborn; and whether the police in London have any powers with respect to the regulation of bicyclists in the streets; and, if so, whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the alleged conduct of the constable mentioned in the letter in question?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir, my attention has been called to the considerable number of accidents caused by bicycles and to the letter in the Times to which my noble Friend refers. By the 85th section of the Local Government Act the provisions of the Highways Acts are made applicable to bicycles, and the penalties imposed by the Metropolitan Police Act may be enforced against bicycle riders for furious riding. The Commissioner has issued a special notice on this subject, a copy of which I shall be glad to send to my noble Friend. In the particular case referred to in the question, I am informed by the Commissioner that the constable did not witness the occurrence; but on arriving on the scene of the accident he ascertained from the injured person that he had obtained the name and address of the bicycle rider, and, therefore, no further action was taken at the time. The name and address, however, upon inquiry being made, proved to be false.

CATHOLIC PRISON CHAPLAINS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he would say under what scheme or by what arrangement of the Treasury does the Roman Catholic priest of Liverpool Prison, with a daily population of 800 and commitments of 19,000, receive £300 a year, a house, and pension, while the Roman Catholic priest to Glasgow and Barlinnie Prisons, with a combined daily population of 1,200 and commitments of 26,000, receives £100 a year and has neither house nor claim to pension?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): I answered a similar question on Tuesday last, and I am afraid I cannot add to the answer I then gave to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Dalziel).

DRAWBACK ON BRITISH SPIRITS.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he would state the amount of "drawback allowance" paid on spirits manufactured in the United Kingdom and exported during the last financial year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The amount was £363,614.

Sir J. Fergusson

BRITISH EMBASSY IN MOROCCO.

MR. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the British Embassies are furnished with provisions at the cost of the villagers of the villages through which they pass on their way to Fez from Tangiers by order of the Sultan, or if they pay for their food and forage?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): His Majesty the Sultan provides the baggage animals and their forage on the occasion of a Mission to his Court, but the provisions for the members of the Mission are paid for by Her Majesty's Minister.

PAUPER REGULATIONS.

MR. HARRISON: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can see his way to fixing the age at which paupers entering the workhouses are compelled to chop firewood and pick oakum at 60 instead of 70 years of age; and if he could see his way towards obtaining a better diet for the aged paupers?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The only regulation of the Local Government Board bearing on the subject is that the paupers of the several classes shall be kept employed according to their capacity and ability. The question as to the employment of a pauper depends solely upon these considerations. There is no rule that inmates of workhouses shall be compelled to chop firewood and pick oakum unless they are 70 years of age. As regards the question of dietary, it is the invariable practice to provide for the aged paupers a better diet than that for the other classes.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether there is any law or Order of the Local Government Board which forbids the Guardians of the Poor classifying the indoor paupers, so that the respectable and dissolute paupers may be dealt with in a different manner; and, if so, whether he will consider the propriety of repealing such law or such Order?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Regulations of the Local Government Board provide for the classification of the inmates of a workhouse as follows:—(1) Those who are infirm through age or any other cause; (2) Those who are able-bodied; (3) Children above the age of seven and under fifteen; and (4) Children under seven years of age. The Regulations, however, expressly provide that the Guardians shall, so far as circumstances permit, further sub-divide any of these classes with reference to the moral character or behaviour or the previous habits of the inmates, or to such other ground as may seem expedient.

SUNDAY MAILS FROM LONDON.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware of the great inconvenience to Irishmen in London in not having any convenient receiving office for posting letters to Ireland on Sunday; whether at present such letters have to be posted at Euston Station in order to catch the Sunday night mail; and whether he will consider the desirability of having a receiving office for Sunday evening's mail at Charing Cross or some other central place?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Such inconvenience is shared by Scotchmen and English provincial visitors to London. Letters on Sunday can only be posted at the General Post Office or at the railway termini. The opening of another receiving office at Charing Cross, or elsewhere, has often been considered, but it has not been thought proper to increase the Sunday work in the London post offices without some considerable public demand being made for it.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): Can letters be posted at Victoria Station?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: At all the principal railway termini letters can be posted on Sunday.

FOREIGNERS IN GREAT BRITAIN.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can now, or at what date, state the result of the recent Census as regards the number of persons of foreign birth resident in London and the other large towns in Great Britain in April of last year?

*MR. RITCHIE: A Return of persons described to be of foreign birth resident in England and Wales at the time of the recent Census will be given, as on former occasions, in the detailed Census Report, which will probably be presented to Parliament early next year.

MR. MONTAGU: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us this special information in advance, seeing there are so many contradictory reports of the number of foreigners in this country?

*MR. RITCHIE: It is quite impossible. The tables have to be gone over in regular rotation, and to employ a special staff to go through all the Census papers and pick out the foreign residents would not only cause enormous delay

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have previously mentioned that I acted under legal advice in the way they did, but I recognise the inconvenience of returning such letters. The hon. Gentleman thinks that communication between himself and the legal adviser of the Post Office would be useful, then that gentleman will be very happy to see my hon. Friend.

RECKLESS BICYCLE RIDING.

THE MARQUESS OF GRANBY (Leicestershire, Melton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the number of accidents caused to the public by reckless bicycle riders; whether he has seen a letter in the Times, of 3rd May, from a sufferer from injuries caused by being knocked down by a bicycle in Holborn; and whether the police in London have any powers with respect to the regulation of bicyclists in the streets; and, if so, whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the alleged conduct of the constable mentioned in the letter in question?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. Matthews, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir, my attention has been called to the considerable number of accidents caused by bicycles and to the letter in people of London, having regard especially to the fact that, unless measures are now taken for that purpose, it will be impossible to do so during the current year?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In answer to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to say that my attention has been called to the desire expressed in many parts of the country that some method should be devised for dealing with the question of the immigration of aliens who are likely to become a charge upon the public. From such investigation as I have been able to make into the facts, I should not be disposed to agree with all the statistics and inferences drawn by my hon. and gallant Friend in his question. At the same time, I am prepared to admit that various circumstances—among others the action of foreign Governments—have materially affected, and, in the future, may still more seriously affect, the emigration from the Continent to this country. The matter is one which, as my hon. and gallant Friend is probably aware, is full of difficulty; but my hon. Friend the Home Secretary is anxiously considering legislation by which adequate powers for dealing with and effect may be placed in the hands of the Government.

made in the case of the Morgan Mine, when the circumstances are similar; but each case must be considered separately, and I am unable to give the general undertaking which the hon. Member asks me to give. I can conceive cases in which the temporary concession of a royalty of one-hundredth, pending the Report of the Royal Commission, would raise expectations which that Report might prevent us from fulfilling.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what he means by "circumstances"? Does he mean that persons should commence operations and have royalties fixed after they have gone to the expense of establishing the works?

MR. GOSCHEN: Some persons are perfectly willing to adopt a sliding scale.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question. He talks of a sliding scale which has been refused by all practical miners. Will he charge a uniform royalty, giving a chance for the development of this industry?

MR. GOSCHEN: I should be wrong to undertake anything of the kind pending the Report of the Royal Commission specially charged with inquiry into the subject. Surely the hon. Gentleman will see as well as I that it would be disrespectful to the Royal Commission to make any general reduction when, in a few weeks, we may expect the Report of the Commission.

TELEGRAPH GUARANTEES, IRELAND.

MR. MAGUIRE (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is in the power of a Board of Guardians in Ireland to bind the ratepayers of the Union to guarantee the expenses of a telegraph station to be erected within the Union?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): Yes, under the 8th section of the Post Office Act of 1891, Guardians, as the Rural Authority, may undertake to pay any loss sustained by reason of the establishment of a telegraph office.

ROYALTY RENTS IN DURHAM.

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Epping Division of Essex, as an Ecclesiastical Commissioner, whether, in view of the very large ecclesiastical revenues received from the County Palatine of Durham, and of the present condition of the coal industry in that county, the Commissioners will carefully consider the desirability of reducing their royalty rents pending the issue of the Report of the Royal Commission?

SIR H. J. SELWIN-IBBETSON (Essex, Epping): In answer to the hon. Member, I have to say that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' royalty rents are largely based upon sliding scales, varying for the most part with the selling prices of coal, but in some of the coking collieries with the selling prices of iron. Whenever the opportunity occurs, either in the granting or renewing of leases, or on application on behalf of the lessors to be placed on the sliding scale, the Commissioners will endeavour to extend the adoption of this principle as, in their opinion, the most equitable. The Commissioners, therefore, do not consider it necessary to reduce their royalty rents as suggested.

GOVERNMENT WORKS IN WATERFORD COUNTY.

MR. WEBB: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office how much is likely to be expended on the battery and coastguard works now in process of construction at or near Tramore, County Waterford; and when the works are likely to be completed?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. FORWOOD, Lancashire, Ormskirk) (who replied) said: If the hon. Member will refer to page 62 of the Civil Service Estimates for the present year he will find that the estimated cost of the Royal Naval Reserve Station at Tramore is £2,438. The work is to be completed on or before 1st January, 1893.

MR. WEBB: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Board of Works contemplates spending anything upon the construction of a fishing pier at or near Tramore, County Waterford?

SIR J. GORST: I have made inquiry, and I am informed that the Board of Public Works has no funds at its disposal for this purpose.

HERRING FISHERIES.

DR. MACDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to an indignation meeting of the Lewis fishermen, held at Stornoway on the 23rd April, in reference to the persistence of East Coast fishermen in fishing for herrings there, in contravention of the general understanding for a close time for fishing; what is the result of the inquiries made by the Government as to the advisability of, or necessity for, a close time, and do they intend to take such steps as will prevent herring fishing in portions of the sea where it is almost the unanimous desire of the local fishermen that a close time should be kept?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I have seen a report of the meeting referred to by the hon. Member. The inquiries made by the Secretary for Scotland disclose a considerable divergence of opinion amongst the fishermen, fishcurers, and others interested in regard to the question of establishing a close time for herrings. The Government, therefore, under these circumstances, do not propose to introduce legislation on the subject.

THE FINANCIAL RELATIONS (ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND) MOTION.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I wish to ask when it is the intention of the Government to take the Financial Relations (England, Scotland, and Ireland) Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I understood it was to be taken at six to-night; but it is not on the Paper, and cannot therefore come on.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member is perfectly within his right in putting this question. I regret that I have been unable to make any definite arrangements in regard to the Motion owing to the indisposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Webb

DR. CLARK: When will it be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As the House is aware, the Business to be taken next week is the Small Holdings Bill. On Monday there will be a discussion on Scotch University Ordinances. I am willing to suspend the Debate on Tuesday night at six o'clock, and to take the Financial Relations Motion between that time and the suspension of the Sitting at seven o'clock.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Will it be possible to deal with such a subject, in the short time of the Session that remains?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see why we cannot deal with the subject. I admit that it is an extensive one, but I do not think it needs prolonged discussion.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government will give such time as will render the investigations of the Committee, which it is proposed to appoint on the subject, useful; also whether the Committee are likely to conclude their investigations during the present Parliament?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have hardly the material at my disposal to give an answer to the question of the hon. Member.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL.

[Lords] (No. 228.)

COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for Committee on the Evidence in Criminal Cases Bill [Lords] be read, and discharged; and that the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Law, &c."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(2.47.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The action of the Government on this occasion is quite in keeping with the extremely singular course of procedure they have adopted in connection with this Bill, which proposes to effect an important change in the administration of the Criminal Law, and, in fact, to revolutionise it. It is somewhat strange that the Attorney General should not have thought it worth while to be present when a Motion was to be discussed which would have the effect of removing the Bill from the consideration of the House to a smaller body of Members upstairs. The First Lord of the Treasury is not a Law Officer of the Crown, and I contend that it is nothing short of a scandal that such a Motion should be made with regard to this Bill by a layman. On that ground alone I should have been entitled to move the Adjournment of the Debate. I abstain for the present from doing that; but I suggest that as the Attorney General has treated the Bill with such contempt, the Debate cannot effectively take place on the present occasion. Now, the Second Reading of the Bill was taken late at night as a surprise, and substantially without debate. I have not known in my experience a previous case in which a Motion for the Second Reading of such a Bill has been made within half an hour of midnight. When this Bill was called on, an English and a Scotch Member—not legal Members—spoke against it; but the first Irish Member who offered to speak upon it was met with the Closure. The Bill proposes to revolutionise the Criminal Law of this Kingdom by giving a person accused of any offence against the law the option of making a statement upon his oath in regard to it; yet the Second Reading has been taken without debate. The Irish Members, who are specially interested in it, have been forbidden to speak upon it; the principle of the Bill has never been investigated, which in itself is a questionable procedure, and there is now a Motion before the House to remove the Committee stage of the Bill to a small Committee upstairs. I respectfully submit that such a proposal should not be tolerated without full and unrestricted debate on the Second Reading, and after the House have had an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the principle of the Bill. I would further point out that the stage which the Government wish to avoid is a stage which has actually been commenced. Therefore, the proposal of the First Lord of the Treasury is as inadmissible as it is uncalled-for. It is also a retrogressive one, and invites the House to declare a fiction. Now the Speaker stated, in reply to a question which I put to him on the subject yesterday, that the course proposed was an unusual one, and he added, after further inquiry, that the Bill had been in Committee, and that the Chairman was bound to report something, but that no substantial progress had been made with it. I think he might also have stated that it was not only unusual but unprecedented. No doubt the Speaker did not use the latter word, because he thought it might contain a reflection. At the same time, the term “unusual,” coming from the Chair, was in itself something in the nature of a warning. I am entitled to submit that the Government have taken an unjustifiable course. In the ordinary usage of this House, when a Bill is to be referred to a Committee, it is open to any Member to move an Instruction; but the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury is a restricting Motion, which would deprive the House, as a whole, of the right to give Instructions to a Committee, because the denial of the right of individual Members is also a denial of the right of the House. Surely that in itself is a sufficient condemnation of the present proposal. To refer this Bill to a Standing Committee on Law is a misuse of the machinery of this House. Those Standing Committees were devised for purposes well understood—they were intended to relieve the House of a certain kind of labour. It was proposed—and I think the Debates of the House at the time will show it—in the case of Bills, in regard to which there was general agreement as to their leading principles, ascertained on the Second Reading, and where Bills were complicated and required special knowledge, that it would be more convenient to the House that the Committee stage—the stage of detail and minute examination—should be deputed to a smaller body of Members having special qualifications. And I freely admit that in the case of such non-contentious Bills that procedure is better. But this is not such a case. The Bill is not complicated; it cannot be called a Bill of any length ; it is not a non-contentious Bill. In the opinion of the Irish Members, the Bill is largely contentious, and we protest against such a Bill, with regard to which we have had no opportunity of expressing our views, being taken from the floor of the House, as a destruction of the most valuable rights of Irish Members with regard to legislation in this House. What is the constitution of the Law Committee with regard to Irish Members? The Committee of Law consists of 68. Members, and contains eleven Irish Members of all Parties. On it there are seven Irish Nationalist Members, four of whom—Dr. Commins (Roscommon, S.), Mr. T. M. Healy (Longford, N.), Mr. P. Mahony (Meath, N.), and Mr. J. E. Redmond (Waterford)—are absent. We have no assurance or expectation that any of these Members can attend the Committee upstairs. Six Irish Members have availed themselves of their right to put down Amendments to be dealt with by a Committee of the whole House, and here I have to return for a moment to the subject of the proposal to avoid the Committee stage to remark that the Committee stage had so far progressed that not only had the Chairman taken the Chair and reported Progress, but that these six Irish Members had availed themselves of their right to put down Amendments to be submitted to the Committee of the House, which it is proposed to extinguish. Only two of these Members are Members of the Standing Committee. The other four Members are debarred from bringing their Amendments before that Committee, because they are not Members of it. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir J. R. Mowbray) has, of course, the power to add fifteen Members of the House for the special purpose of this Bill ; but although Ireland is specially interested in the Bill, the Bill is an Imperial Bill, and therefore the Committee of Selection, in adding fifteen Members, would not take any exceptional number of Irish Members. They would probably treat the Irish Members proportionately to their representation in this House. Therefore, we can only look for the addition of two or three Irish Members, and I submit that the four score Members who sit on this Bench would consequently not have any fair representation on the Committee. I say the nature of the Bill is such that it cannot properly be considered by the Standing Committee on Law. The main provision of the Bill is that a person accused of any offence may have the option of offering evidence upon his oath on the hearing of the charge against him. Now, Sir, I submit that if the Committee stage is taken away from this House, where it has the advantage of the presence of a number of gentlemen such as the Solicitor General for England, and the Member for West Ham, Mr. Fulton, and others who are versed in the administration of the Criminal Law—I say that effective consideration of the Bill cannot be had by the Standing Committee upstairs. In connection with the proposition that the person accused of the offence should be entitled to offer evidence in respect to the charge against him, there are two matters which require essentially to be considered. One question is whether such a change in the law will not be calamitous. It has to be considered whether a person accused and guilty of a crime and of opinion that the facts against him are conclusive, might not be tempted to try a last chance by offering a false oath, and to fortify this by the perjury of others. That is one point in regard to which we cannot have satisfactory consideration except by this House itself, or by a Select Committee which would have the opportunity of examining experts. There are two points relative to Ireland. In England the administration of the Criminal Law is impartial ; but in Ireland, owing to political and agrarian conditions, the administration is not impartial. I say that, in order to enable me to vote upon the clauses of this Bill and to vote upon its Third Reading, I require the testimony and evidence of persons versed in the administration of the Criminal Law in Ireland as to whether the ends of justice would not be defeated by a provision of the law which affords the accused person the option of offering evidence upon oath as to a charge against him—self. In my opinion, in any case of political or agrarian character which comes before the Justices, the Police, or the Stipendiary Magistrates, or before a jury packed with persons who are not of the prisoner's creed, or a trial after a change of venue, the option of offering evidence upon oath will be likely to operate against the ends of justice. For, if the prisoner declined to give evidence, it will be taken as proof of his guilt; and if he did offer evidence upon oath, the particular charge against him would be used by the Justices of the Peace, the Stipendiary Magistrates, and counsel for the Crown in cases where the jury was packed, as a means of extracting political information not relative to the particular charge, but relating to movements in the country. It would also be used, in cases where the prisoner pleaded good character, as a most offensive, irritating, injurious, and unconstitutional inquisition into the whole course of his life. I submit there are grave and substantial reasons why the Committee stage should not be taken by the Committee on Law, but by a Committee with power to call experts to give us the evidence we are without at present, and which we require in order that we may come to a judgment upon the matter, and which will not be afforded by the course we are about to pursue. I hold that the most convenient proceeding will be to allow the ordinary course to be taken, so that Members from Ireland and other Members may address themselves in Committee of the whole House to the consideration of the details of the Bill. I submit, under these circumstances, the First Lord will do well to withdraw the Motion which he has made—a Motion which the Chairman has declared to be unusual, and a Motion which carries inconvenient and unconstitutional consequences. If the Government refuse to adopt this course, I submit it is the duty of the House to object to the Motion.

*MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I have on the Paper a notice of Motion which I hope it will not be necessary to move; or at least, before that course is taken, I hope we shall have an explanation from the Attorney General as to the reason of the unusual course proposed in reference to this Bill. I feel especial regret at the absence of the Attorney General, because I have to call the attention of the House to a report—I hope and believe it is an incorrect report—of the speech which he is alleged to have made on the Second Reading of the Bill. That speech, if it was made by him, must have been, from his knowledge and from the circumstances of the case, a deliberate attempt to mislead this House. ("Order!") I say I cannot believe that this speech was made by the learned Gentleman. My hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton)—though no Member of this House watches the proceedings with greater care than he does, in his endeavour to prevent the many injustices which are contemplated constantly by hon. Members opposite—has been slightly inaccurate in his description of what occurred on the Second Reading of this Bill. He has confused the Second Reading of this Bill with the similar stage of another Bill. If the facts had been as he suggested, the present Motion would, indeed, have called for comment. But as the facts stand, the Motion is subject for much more serious comment, and the point is one the House would do well to consider if there are to be any longer relations of ordinary courtesy between Members on one side of the House and on the other. In that interest it would have been better had the circumstances been otherwise. It appears, according to the report in Reuter's Parliamentary Debates, that the Second Reading of this Bill was taken immediately after the discussion of a technical subject on which the majority of the Members of this House were not interested—the Indian Councils Bill. One would have thought that a Minister, rising to propose an important measure after a discussion on a Bill of that character had suddenly ended, would have explained to the House the nature of the measure he was proposing, and whether, from his past experience, the Bill was non-contentious or not. I do not find that the learned Gentleman did anything of the sort. According to this report, he said—

"I beg, Sir, to move that this Bill be now read a second time. There has been a universal expression of opinion in favour of the measure, which was read a second time last year, and which has been most carefully considered by Lord Herschell and by all the lawyers in the House of Lords, and it meets with their approval."

What may be thought of this measure by Lord Herschell or the lawyers of the House of Lords we do not know. It is very probable that they do approve of this measure, because it is a matter of common knowledge that Irish Nationalists are not represented in the House of Lords. They do not want to be. But so far as Irish lawyers in the House are concerned, the Attorney General must have known that they were, and have for many years been, determinedly opposed to this or any similar measure. When in 1888 a similar measure was proposed in this House, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) opposed it most vehemently when the Attorney General had the conduct of the measure. So that it must have been within the knowledge of the Attorney General that, instead of there having been a universal expression of opinion in favour of this Bill, it was a Bill which a large section of Members in this House determinedly opposed, and will continue to determinedly oppose. If, then, the Attorney General did use those words, I venture to say it was most unfortunate, in the interests of courtesy between hon. Members on opposite sides of this House, in the interests of Government business to-day, and hereafter, during this Session, and to the end of the present Parliament, that the statement should have been made. It appears that if this report is correct the Second Reading of this Bill has been obtained by what is little less than fraud. By contrivance it was that the Second Reading was obtained when, of course, no Irish lawyer was in the House, and when Irish Members who are not lawyers did not see what the Bill meant, but were deluded by the statement that there was a universal expression in its favour. But, even so far as Great Britain is concerned, I know there are many distinguished lawyers who are opposed to this measure. The hon. and learned Member for the Brigg Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy), a distinguished criminal lawyer, has told me he is opposed to this Bill because he believes that in many cases it will lead to the conviction of innocent persons. Hence, as far as even England is concerned, it is not the case that there has been a universal expression of opinion in favour of this Bill; and as to Ireland I am not aware of any lawyer there in sympathy with the popular movement who has expressed his approval of this measure. Of course, hon. Members opposite may dismiss Ireland from their calculations when they propose such measures of reform, but we Irish Members are determined to do our duty by those who send us here, and to oppose measures which we believe will lead in Ireland to the conviction of men who are innocent of the charges made against them. We may hear it said that no man need give evidence who does not wish it.

*THE SPEAKER: Order, order! The question is, which Committee is best calculated to deal with this Bill—a Committee of the whole House, a Select Committee, or a Standing Committee.

*MR. KNOX: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have to admit that my words were not perhaps directly relevant. If, however, we had had an open discussion on the Second Reading there would have been no difficulty in explaining the nature and effect of the measure, in so far as it might be necessary to show that it is one which should be considered by a Committee of the whole House. Hon. Members who have no knowledge of the character of judicial trials in Ireland cannot understand what the effect of this Bill will be there, and why it is essential in our judgment that it should be discussed openly and in the light of day. But, Mr. Speaker, without trespassing upon your ruling, I will try to show why it is of vast importance that this Bill should be discussed in Committee of the whole House. In a Committee of the whole House, for instance, Irish opinion will necessarily be more fully represented than it could be in a Committee upstairs, because Irish Members are not always able to give as full attendance to Committees upstairs as they would like. And besides, there are measures before the Standing Committee on Law which have no interest whatever for Irish Members. Then the discussions before a Standing Committee are but slightly reported. Though many hon. Members, and I for one, care little about that, and would be prepared to spend hour upon hour even in camera to prevent such a Bill as this passing, yet it is a noted fact that where proceedings are not reported it is difficult to obtain a regular attendance. But apart from that consideration, this is a matter of great public interest, and one which concerns the constituencies of hon. Members intimately, and for that reason I think it should be discussed under circumstances that will give them the opportunity of knowing how their Representatives act in regard to it. As far as I can learn, no such Bill as this has ever been suggested after mature inquiry by any Commission or other body. The Royal Commission which inquired into the question of the Criminal Code in 1879 did make certain suggestions on this subject, but the learned Commissioners were divided in their opinion. Some of them thought it would be better not to allow prisoners to be examined at all. However, the majority overruled the minority, and they did, under certain conditions, propose to give prisoners the right of giving evidence. But what were those conditions? In the first place, the learned Commissioners considered that it was essentially necessary to give power to the Court to strictly limit the right of cross-examination, not by mere rules of evidence, but at discretion. In the second place, the learned Commissioners did not propose to give a prisoner the right to give evidence on oath, or to give the prosecuting counsel the right to cross-examine, at a preliminary inquiry. They only proposed to give such right to the one or the other at the trial. To Ireland this is a matter of great importance. It means whether or not Removables in Ireland are to have the power to worry and torture unfortunate men who come before them. The Judges of Assize in Ireland are not always beyond suspicion of political feeling. They have obtained their places by faithful service to the Crown in obtaining convictions, and most of them carry to the Bench not a little of the feeling shown by them at the Bar. They remain Crown Prosecutors upon the Bench. There is a danger in the proposals of this Bill in the case of trial at Assize, but there is a greater danger in the case of trial before a Removable Magistrate. If the Government had brought in a Bill in the terms of the Criminal Code recommended by the Commissioners I have alluded to, we might have had less objection to the discussion of the details before a Grand Committee, but as they have chosen to bring in a Bill which is essentially different from what was recommended by those Commissioners, and which has not been recommended by anyone after full inquiry into the subject, I think we have a right to demand that discussion of its details shall be carried on by a Committee of the whole House. Then the Government have deliberately removed the safeguards which were introduced by the wisdom of the learned Commissioners in their Report in 1879, and have neglected to supply any others. Many safeguards might be introduced, if this Bill were considered by a Committee of the whole House. For instance, I notice that an hon. Member opposite—a Conservative of the old school, who does not wish to break up the foundations of the British Constitution—proposes that if prisoners are to be put in this new and dangerous position they shall be provided with counsel to watch their interests. The hon. Member opposite is not a Member of the Standing Committee on Law, and therefore that reasonable Amendment cannot be moved, at any rate by the hon. Member who has designed it, before the Committee upstairs. This is one of the safeguards that might be inserted in the Bill. Well, Mr. Speaker, this Bill is one which we in Ireland are resolutely opposed to, and we will oppose it here or upstairs. Surely there is enough distrust of the law in Ireland already, and enough difference between the tone and temper of the English and Irish Courts, without altering the Criminal Law of Ireland in such a way as to increase that distrust and difference. An hon. Friend of mine, who is a Unionist, went to Ireland, and although he remains a Unionist he said to me, "I must admit that in the tone and temper of the Courts of Justice, and in the way justice is administered in Ireland, as compared with England, there is a difference which the mere letter of the Statute Book cannot explain." The fact is that in Ireland the jury are often of a different religion, and even speak a different language from the prisoner. The Judge, too, from his whole training, is opposed to the prisoner, regarding himself as a being of a superior class. Jury, Judge, and prosecuting counsel are linked in an effort to punish the unfortunate man who is placed in the dock. In England the prosecuting counsel is thought to exceed his duty if, in an ordinary case, he uses all the skill of his profession to obtain a conviction; but in Ireland the prosecuting counsel's greatest achievements are those in which he obtains convictions on behalf of the Crown. I venture to think, Mr. Speaker, as there is already great distrust of the law in Ireland, it would produce a disastrous effect if this House were to decide that a further change in the law, opposed by the vast majority of Irish Representatives, shall be carried out in such a way as will deprive the mass of the people of knowing anything about what goes on. If the Government persists in sending for the consideration of Standing Committees Bills on which there is an essential difference of opinion as to the principle, they will entirely destroy the utility of these Committees. If Bills like this are sent to the Standing Committee there will be no moderate or reasonable measure, about which there is a general agreement, passed through it this year. The consideration of the Amendments to this Bill will necessarily be more lengthy in a Standing Committee than in a Committee of the whole House, for many reasons. In the first place, the Closure does not apply in the same way. At any rate it is not so commonly applied, and for other reasons it is probable that the discussion before the whole House would take a shorter time than the discussion before a Standing Committee. So I venture to ask the Government, if they wish the Standing Committee on Law to do any useful work in the interests of legal reform during this Session, to withdraw the proposal they now make and allow this Bill, which must remain essentially contentious, and on which there must remain an essential difference between the Irish Members and Members on the opposite side of the House, to be discussed in a Committee of the whole House. I appeal to those Gentlemen opposite, who though they may be Conservatives are not in favour of uprooting every principle of freedom which still remains, to help us in passing this reasonable Amendment, and I appeal to them to prevent the passing of a Motion which would be disastrous to the administration of the law in Ireland, and would destroy the last vestiges of respect for the administration of justice that are left in the Irish people.

(3.32.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): With regard to the observations that have been made as to the absence of my hon. Friend the Attorney General (Sir R. Webster), I regret it is impossible for him to attend in his place, but I will try to replace him, and lay before the House certain reasons which I think should convince hon. Members that the course we propose is the correct one. The Member for West Belfast commenced his speech by referring to what happened at an earlier stage of this Bill.

MR. SEXTON: If the right hon. Gentleman will allow me I will at once admit that I fell into error. The Government had rushed the business and we were taken by surprise. In speaking just now I was in error, and had another Bill in my mind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was not going to make any point of it, but I was going to remind the House that the hon. Member had fallen into an error as regards this Bill.

MR. SEXTON: I confused it with another Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There was no Closure on this Bill. It was read a second time without opposition in a thin House, and when the hon. Gentleman and, I have no doubt, several of his colleagues from Ireland were absent. There was no taking by surprise on the part of the Government in any evil sense of the term. The Bill was on the Order Paper in the ordinary way, and the Irish Members were quite aware, or might have been, if they had consulted the Paper, that it was likely to be brought on. The Member for West Belfast alleges that it is not a very usual course of procedure to refer to a Standing Committee a Bill of which the Committee stage in the full House had already been begun. I say that the Committee stage had not been begun. The Chairman had been got out of the Chair, but no question had been discussed, no Amendment had been proposed, and no progress had been made with the measure; and if the Minister in charge of the Bill thinks that its progress would be facilitated by transferring it, even at this stage, to the Grand Committee, I confess I see no objection to that course, and I do not think the House would have any reason to complain.

MR. SEXTON: Even if Amendments have been put down?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that that ought to make any difference. The House is aware that the object for which the Grand Committees were established was to relieve the Committee of the whole House of some of the heavy labours thrown upon it. But the hon. Member has a further objection to the course proposed by the Government, based upon the fact, as he seems to think, that the powers of the House to move Instructions on going into Committee had been destroyed by the particular procedure we have adopted. The hon. Gentleman is certainly mistaken, because, suppose we went on with the discussion before a Committee of the whole House, the power of moving Instructions has already been lost, and no additional or further loss is entailed by the fact that this Bill is to be discussed upstairs. Further, I do not think either the Member for West Belfast or his friends need be afraid of the particular procedure in this case, because I do not gather that any of the points which they desire to bring before the Committee are of a nature which would require an Instruction to be moved. I have taken down some of the points they have mentioned. For example, there is the point that counsel should be allowed in order to protect witnesses; that power should be taken to limit the cross-examination of a person on his trial; a limitation of the subjects on which he may give evidence; and the character of the Court before which this evidence on the part of the alleged criminal is to be taken. All these, I admit, are points of great importance, but none of them would require an Instruction to be moved beforehand that they might be adequately dealt with in Committee. What is true about the details of the Bill is equally true with respect to the next point; and if I may gather from their speeches, what hon. Members really desire is the exclusion of Ireland from the Bill. They based their opinions on certain alleged shortcomings of the legal tribunals in Ireland. They can scarcely expect me to agree with them in their estimate, either of trial by Resident Magistrates or by Judges of Assize. But whatever may be the ground of their opinions, the question of the exclusion of Ireland from the operation of the measure is emphatically a question which can be dealt with without instruction, and emphatically a question to be dealt with by the Grand Committee on Law. In fact, questions of that kind can be far better discussed in the Committee upstairs than in the whole House. Lawyers are very strongly represented in the Grand Committee—Irish lawyers are very strongly represented, and the lay element is not absent, and everyone will admit that subjects such as this should be approached with technical knowledge, which we can hardly in proportion muster in our Debates in Committee in this House. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Knox) said that he is not a Member of the Grand Committee. That would not prevent his Amendment being moved by some other Member who approved of it; and it is the infallible practice of the Committee of Selection, with whom rests the responsibility of constituting these Committees, to appoint additional Members who are specially interested in any subject, and one of their methods of arriving at a decision is noticing in whose name Amendments are down, and who in the House have shown special interest in, or objection to, the measure to be discussed by the Committee. So I apprehend the Members for Ireland will not find themselves excluded from this Committee in proportion to their numbers. The hon. Member (Mr. Knox) also did not disguise his determination to extinguish this Bill by other means than by mere argument and opposition. He openly declared his wish that the proceedings in the Grand Committee on Law should be so protracted as to prevent this Bill getting through, and there can be no doubt that his threat was intended to deter the Government from proceeding further with this measure.

MR. KNOX: It was not intended as a threat. I merely say that the Bill would be likely to be disposed of quicker in Committee of the whole House than in a Grand Committee.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman told us what would take place in the Grand Committee, and left us to infer what would take place in Committee of the whole House, from the number of Amendments which have been put on the Paper. On that I will say no more. I am far from desiring to limit the power of hon. Gentlemen if they set themselves to the task to make it difficult to pass even the most useful legislation. Their power is great, but possibly it may be found to be a little diminished by the fact that some of the discussion will go on in the Grand Committee. I have been reminded, however, that there is a fourth stage of this measure, when it is not possible for hon. Gentlemen to speak more than once on each Amendment. I do not wish to under-rate the gifts and experience of hon. Members opposite, and if they are going to set themselves to work to lengthen the discussion on the Report stage that opens a prospect which I, as the Minister in charge of the Bill, cannot look forward to with agreeable feelings. But that is in the future, and I hope at this stage hon. Members will not oppose the transfer of this measure with respect to which they have safeguards both in the House and before the Grand Committee.

*(3.38.) MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I have for four or five years occupied the position of Chairman of one of these two Grand

Committees, and I have, therefore, gained some experience of the way in which they do their work. I yield to no one in my admiration of the manner in which that work is done; but I must say that a great deal depends upon the character of the Bills that are submitted to the Committees. Bills involving some technical legal question or some mercantile point, on the principle of which the House is agreed, can be dealt with much better, so far as details are concerned, by a limited body of experts. There are several reasons which point to the advisability of Bills of this kind being referred to the Grand Committees. First of all, the Members of the Grand Committees do not vote on party lines; secondly, they always hear the arguments, and last, but not least, their proceedings are very rarely reported, and Members, having no temptation to play to the gallery, generally make their speeches short and to the point. But Bills of a party character have no place in those Committees. Who would think, for instance, of referring to a Grand Committee the Irish Local Government Bill, the details of which, as well as the principle, are of a highly contentious character, and ought not to be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the House? Then there is a third class of Bills, of which I think this is one, which are not exactly party Bills, but involve very strong feeling and very strong animus on the part of a section of Members of this House; and experience shows us that this class of Bills ought not to be referred to Grand Committees. The Home Secretary will remember that three years ago an Employers' Liability Bill was referred to the Grand Committee on Law Bills, and we were engaged upon it de die in diem for about a month. When the Bill came to the House there was a complaint both on the side of the employers and workmen that the details of the measure had not been fairly discussed and the result was that the Bill was strangled at the Report stage or Third Reading. The right hon. Gentleman has never tried the experiment of bringing that Bill before a Grand Committee again. The present Bill is one of no complication whatever; and a simpler Bill I do not think I ever read. It consists of two or three clauses, and there is nothing to call for that minute, careful, professional discussion which would take place in a Grand Committee, and there are several special reasons why it should not be referred to a Grand Committee. One is that the principle has not been discussed at all in the House, and I never knew a case of a Bill referred to a Grand Committee in which the principle had not been carefully considered. Then, with regard to the right to move Instructions, it seems to me that if the hon. Member who desires to move an Instruction has to take the chance of the ballot for an opportunity, the right to move an Instruction becomes a mere farce. Upon the general principles that I have endeavoured to lay down, I think this Bill should not go to a Grand Committee; but whether it should go to a Select Committee or not is another question. Meantime I would venture respectfully to make the suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman that he should undertake to omit Ireland, and then, if he sent the Bill to a Committee of the whole House, it would pass in a couple of hours. I am strongly in favour of the Bill, and anxious that it should pass into law, but I see clearly that if it be referred to a Grand Committee, in which, of course, there is no such thing as Closure, the chance of passing the Bill this Session will be very small.

*(3.53.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): When the learned Attorney General brought in this Bill I felt the greatest objection to it, and I was surprised that there was no discussion on it, as it was not sprung as a surprise upon the House. I understood the Attorney General to say that there was, in his belief, a universal feeling among the highest legal authorities in favour of the Bill; and though I view the Bill with the greatest anxiety, I am bound to say that so far as my knowledge goes there is a very large majority of the legal profession with a strong prepossession in favour of it. I have heard it stated that one of its effects will be that more convictions will be obtained than is now the case. I believe that is so, though I do not oppose it on that ground. Considerable weight is to be attached to the objection that in a Grand Committee the debates on the Bill will not be reported, for it seems to me we ought to consider to whom the measure will apply. Will it apply to the whole community or to the poor and ignorant members of it? If there is a Bill which of all others will unquestionably affect the poor rather than the rich it is a Bill of this kind. I regret exceedingly that anything should have been said against the administration of justice in Ireland, but I conceive that that is a reason for keeping the Bill in this House. I ask the House to consider what the Grand Committees are. I notice that the right hon. Member for Denbighshire (Mr. G. O. Morgan) spoke with admiration of the way work is done in Grand Committees. I have served upon two of them, and on those Committees there were few practising barristers or solicitors, and those who were Members were seldom present. They are excused attendance on Committees because they are practising lawyers, and yet the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House tells us that the presence of these lawyers will be a guarantee of proper discussion. This question should be discussed by lawyers and largely by men who are not lawyers. In the Grand Committees on which I served we had to wait many days to get a quorum, out of 80 or 90 Members we could not get 20 present. The principal decisions were taken over and over again by less than 30 Members, and we never had 60 per cent. of the Members present. Again and again also we were out-voted by the Government, as will be remembered by those who were Members when the Bankruptcy Bill was under consideration. I want the House to consider that the questions would practically be decided by 25 or 30 Members, and yet if we were to try to raise the same questions on Report in the House, we should be met with the argument that the matter was fully and properly discussed in Committee, and that further discussion, in view of the large majority which decided the question, would be trifling with the time of the House. I believe the Bill cannot be effectively discussed by a Grand Committee, as it is not a question of detail, but one of principle. I believe the great mass of the people of England are in favour of the maintenance of the present system, and look with absolute horror at the introduction of the system in vogue in France and other countries, where it often happens that poor, dazed, half-educated women are subject to severe cross-examination without any proper protection being afforded them. But I do not believe the English Judges would allow this to go on, at any rate to anything like the same extent. Holding, as I do, that the great question in the Bill is the principle, I ask the Government not to send it to a Grand Committee, but, if they will not leave it to the House, to send it to a tribunal like a Select Committee, where the matter can be thoroughly discussed. I move to omit the words "Standing Committee on Law, &c.," to insert the words "Select Committee."

DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.) seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the words "the Standing Committee on Law, &c.," in order to add the words "a Select Committee."—(Mr. Kelly.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the Standing Committee on Law, &c.,' stand part of the Question."

possible if he was as accurate in his statements on that occasion there were members of the Committee who thought they had more important business elsewhere. The hon. Member declares himself an opponent of this Bill, and says it has not been discussed in the House. My memory does not carry me back to the number of times it has been discussed. It has been carried by both Parties in the House, and the majorities in favour of it show that it has been approved of on several previous occasions. While I give the hon. Gentleman credit for being able to add something novel to this Debate, I do not recollect that on previous occasions he used any arguments to show that this is a bad Bill. He speaks of the iniquity of allowing prisoners to give evidence. I should like to know how he voted when it was decided to allow persons to be examined at a private inquiry in Ireland in 1882 and 1887, and I should be surprised if he then thought there was any objection to allowing an accused person to give his own version of the case. The question now is whether this Bill is to pass or not. I regard this Committee as a fitting tribunal to take charge of the Bill, to discuss it, and to place it in such shape as would be acceptable to those on the Committee best able to decide. But there is an opinion opposed to that view, and if you do refer the Bill, that course will not probably cause the Bill to become law. There will be the Report stage and the Third Reading, and I am so anxious to see this Bill in the Statute Book that I would earnestly ask the Government to see if they cannot make some concession, and I will briefly endeavour to place before the right hon. Gentleman some considerations for doing so. This Bill is necessary on behalf of justice and humanity. I am certain of this, that for years past—though our desire has been to administer justice fairly and purely—year by year innocent persons are convicted because they have not had the opportunity of stating the truth of their own case. We have admitted it in several cases, where we were creating new offences, or framing new procedure—in the Explosives Act, and the Criminal Law Amendment Act his sentences to reply to. I did not invent sentences of my own. It was his remark and not mine about the few thousand pounds; it was his remark and not mine that only a few persons were concerned under the scope of the Bill.

(11.30.) Mr. A. J. BALFOUR rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: I have to thank the First Lord of the Treasury for this.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(11.33.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 170; Noes 112.—(Div. List, No. 106.)

Question put accordingly, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

(11.45.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 111; Noes 171.—(Div. List, No. 107.)

(11.52.) DR. TANNER: As one of the Members who opposed this Bill at the previous stage, I cannot but be gratified at this magnificent exposé of the hand of the Government. If anything can add to the scathing rebuke the Government have received this evening, it will be the Amendment I have to move. I propose to change the words "one month" in the first clause, as the period after the passing of the Act when the Treasury may make their regulations, to "twelve months." With most indecent haste the Government have endeavoured to press forward this Bill. The Debate on the Second Reading was closed when we had had the Bill before us for only half-an-hour, and now in Committee the first proposition we come to is that the Bill shall take effect in one month from its passing. With this haste we at once suspect some sinister design, and possibly this is that the period shall cover the time before a Dissolution of Parliament, so that the Government may be enabled to make provision for their protégés, their

"sisters, their cousins, and their aunts," at the shortest possible notice. So, with good reason for it, I, with the greatest pleasure, move this Amendment to provide that twelve months shall elapse before action may be taken under the Bill. In the first drafting of my Amendment, I put down a period of "six" months; but going more carefully through the Bill in the brief time at our disposal, I found that in the second clause, in dealing with the extension of the Rules to Indian employments, I had to put down a period of twelve months, and, to be logical in the carrying out of my view, I must move to make the period in this clause twelve months also. My desire is, that the Bill shall not come into force until the present Government shall be out of office, and will be unable to make use of the Bill for the payment of their employees for past services rendered. I mean, particularly, those Removable Magistrates in Ireland who have acted as gaolers to some of us—men promoted from other Departments to carry out the duties of the office thrust upon them. I desire that these creatures of the present Administration shall not have this payment until another Government shall have come into power, and shall have the opportunity of investigating the merits or demerits of the claimants. I am not going to talk out my own Amendment—I shall stand to my guns. I have found out the Government in a trick, trying to carry a job; and I want them to understand that, bowing to your ruling, Mr. Courtney, I shall do my utmost in what I consider my duty to show up the nefarious plot hatched by the Government, to drag forth to light all the hidden works of darkness which have been concealed under the studied utterances of the Secretary to the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The more we probe these utterances with Amendments such as these, the more jobbery will be revealed, and the House will discover and condemn this last action of unjust stewardship before its authors are finally dismissed by the constituencies.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, to leave out the words "one month," and insert the words "twelve months."—(Dr. Tanner.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'one month' stand part of the Clause."

(12.0.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I have an Amendment to propose before that. I put it in writing before the Clerk at the Table. It is practically the same Amendment, but—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! No Amendment has reached me—

COLONEL NOLAN: I put it before the Clerk.

THE CHAIRMAN: No Amendment has reached me. The hon. and gallant Member should have interposed before. He has allowed his hon. Colleague to make his speech and Motion, and the Question before the Committee now is, "That 'one month' stand part of the Clause."

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

BARGEOWNERS, &c., LIABILITY BILL. (No. 211.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill, and I may state that the President of the Board of Trade has assented to the suggestion that it shall be referred to a Select Committee, together with the Watermen's and Lightermen's Company Bill. The proposal for a Select Committee comes from the promoters of the latter Bill, and I shall be glad to agree to it.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): That is the arrangement, and upon this understanding I hope the Bill will be allowed to proceed.

Objection being taken,

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

Dr. Tanner

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON (SUPERANNUATION) BILL.—(No. 96.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): As a Member of the Select Committee now considering this subject, I respectfully put it to the House that it is very undesirable that a Bill dealing with a subject specially referred to a Select Committee should be pressed forward at this time. That Committee is now considering its Report, and I think this a sufficient objection to taking the Bill now.

Objection being taken,

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

SOLICITORS' APPRENTICES (IRELAND) (COMMISSIONERS' REPORT).

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I am informed by the Secretary to the Treasury that while he is willing to give the Reports of the Commissioners he is not willing to give the evidence given before the Commission. I shall inquire if that will be sufficient for the parties concerned, and will put down a Notice of Motion for Monday.

ORDNANCE SURVEY.

SELECT COMMITTEE. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [4th May], "That the Order [11th February] that a Select Committee on the Ordnance Survey be appointed, be read, and discharged."

Question put, and agreed to.

Order discharged.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 1) BILL.—(No. 256.)

Reported, with Amendments [Provisional Orders confirmed]; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

SALMON AND FRESHWATER FISH- ERIES BILL.—(No. 258.)

Considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

—we allowed the prisoner to give evidence.

*MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is dealing with the general question of the principle of the Bill, and he is travelling beyond the limits of the Amendment now before the House.

SIR H. JAMES: I beg the pardon of the House for having travelled away from the question, but I was anxious to ask the Government to re-consider their determination of refusing to allow Ireland to be omitted from the Bill. Nothing is further from my mind than to cast the slightest slur on the administration of justice in Ireland. If it were suggested that Ireland could not be omitted without a slur being cast on the Irish Judicial Bench, nothing would be further from my intention. When I had charge of the Bill in 1886 I took that course and offered to strike Ireland out of the Bill, and my view was that there was not the slightest reason to suppose that any slur would thereby be cast on the Irish Judicial Bench or on the Irish Bar. But I did feel that there are different phases of advocacy existing in Ireland to those existing in England. That is not because any blame attaches to my brethren of the Irish Bar, but is in consequence of the difficulty of bringing the necessity of conviction home to the minds of Irish jurymen; and they have, therefore, become more persistent in their advocacy, and their cross-examination of every witness necessarily differs in degree from the practice in this country. If the majority of the Irish Members are opposed to the extension of the Bill to Ireland why cannot you say, "We will not refuse it to those who do want it, because of the objection of those who do not." I hope this will be no bar to the consideration of the question whether this Bill should be referred to a Standing Committee. This is not in any sense a slur passed upon the administration of justice in Ireland; it is simply intended to facilitate the passing of this Bill into law, so that the experiment may be tried in England; and if it be found successful, it may in course of time be applied to Ireland also.

(4.11.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman has made a direct appeal to me, and I am unwilling for one moment to leave it without an answer. He has urged that Ireland should be excluded from this Bill, and on two grounds: He has urged it, first, on the ground of Parliamentary time. He has told us that this is a Bill which is much required in the interests of justice in England, that there is an annual crop of false verdicts given in England, by which innocent persons are sent to gaol or to penal servitude for want of this Bill. If these are the blessings which would flow from this Bill I confess I should be very reluctant that they should not be extended to Ireland. Then the right hon. Gentleman said, having regard to Parliamentary time, that the opposition raised by hon. Gentlemen opposite was of such a character that everybody knows, unless Ireland is excluded from the Bill the Bill cannot pass. Well, I am not in a position to give a direct negative to that forecast. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that both the condition of the Notice Paper, what we have heard this afternoon, and the threats held out by the hon. Member for Cavan do not foreshadow a very cheerful prospect for those who have the conduct of business. If the right hon. Gentleman had rested his case upon the ground of Parliamentary time, I should have very little to say against the force of his observations; but he went further than that, and stated that there were methods of advocacy pursued at the Irish Bar which made it undesirable that this Bill should be extended to that country. I, of course, have no personal knowledge of these legal matters either in England or in Ireland. I have no personal knowledge, nor will the House take me as an authority on the proper method of conducting public trials or on the actual method in which public trials are conducted on one side of St. George's Channel or the other. But I must say, from my knowledge of the gentlemen who conduct public trials in Ireland, and upon whom a large amount of criticism has been passed, that I do not believe that Irish advocates would condescend to use towards Irish prisoners methods that would not be adopted by advocates in this country. I entirely repudiate the view which the right hon. Gentleman has put before the House. However, I pass from that. The right hon. Gentleman believes that if this reference to Ireland were dropped the Bill would immediately pass into law without further difficulty. One right hon. Gentleman said it would pass in five minutes. I confess my information on the subject leads me to greatly doubt that. I believe if Ireland were omitted from the Bill on the ground that Irish counsel, Irish Judges, and Irish Magistrates are not fit to conduct their business in the same way as English Judges, English Magistrates, and English counsel—

SIR H. JAMES: I did not say that.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I know the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not say that; he confined his observations to counsel; but other hon. Gentlemen, speaking on the same side of the House with the right hon. Gentleman, did say so.

MR. SEXTON: My argument was confined to the difference in procedure.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is true of the hon. Gentleman; and I think the hon. Member for Cavan chiefly dwelt upon the shortcomings of the Irish Bench and the Irish Magistrates. But my own forecast is that if we omitted Ireland from the Bill, hon. Gentlemen from Ireland on this side of the House would oppose the Bill, and its passage would not be so easy as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury is at present disposed to think. However, I recognise that, after what has occurred, it is very improbable that with the time at their disposal the Government would be able to get this Bill through the House. I should therefore like to have a little further time to consider what the future course of the Government will be in reference to the Bill. But at all events, I may state that I do not propose to attempt to force the Bill through including Ireland; that proposal, after what has occurred, might result in our not being able to pass the Bill at all.

MR. SEXTON: Do I understand that in any event the right hon. Gentleman does not propose to force the Bill through, including Ireland, against the wishes of the Irish Members?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; not this Session.

MR. J. MORLEY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if we are to understand that the Government maintain an open mind with regard to the advisability of including or excluding Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No. We recognise that in any case Ireland cannot be included. We recognise that it would be almost impossible by physical force to get it through including Ireland. We must remember the fact that, after all, there are only six days in the week, and only so many weeks in a Session.

(4.20.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I cannot help thinking that many hon. Members on this side of the House, and a great number of hon. Members on the other side of the House, will hear that statement of the right hon. Gentleman with great satisfaction. It is obvious that if the Government go on with the Bill including Ireland the result will be that as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury says, and as everybody who has attended to the question for many years knows, an experiment which, whether the right hon. Gentleman regards it as a beneficent experiment or not, public opinion in England desires to have tried will not be tried. I do not desire even for a moment to get on to the contentious ground of the Coercion Act; but I only want to make one remark. The right hon. Gentleman said it was hard that he should be asked to deprive Ireland of a change in the procedure which my right hon. and learned Friend described as a great boon; but that is a principle of his legislation, which he forgot with respect to criminal procedure in Ireland. But I do not want to put the case upon that ground. Nor do I wish to put it on the ground stated by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury who objected to the extension of this Bill to Ireland on account of the difference that exists between Irish and English advocacy. It is not necessary, in order to justify the exclusion of Ireland from this Bill, to go into that. The sole direct ground on which, in the present case, I should press the Government to consider favourably the exclusion of Ireland is this: that it is desired to have an experiment tried in England in conformity with English opinion, but they ought not to wish to impose upon Ireland a change which Irish opinion does not like.

*(4.22.) MR. BARTON (Armagh, Mid): I am a supporter of the principle of this Bill; but I shall strenuously oppose it if Ireland is omitted from its scope, and I believe that other hon. Members sitting near me will take the same course. It is all very well for the right hon. and learned Member for Bury to say that he did not intend the suggestion that Ireland should be excluded as any slur upon Ireland. But it would be a slur if a measure generally admitted to embody a desirable amendment in the Criminal Law should not be extended to Ireland. Having been engaged at the Irish Bar professionally for some years, and largely employed in criminal cases, usually for the defence, I can state that there is no difference as to the mode of advocacy between Ireland and England. There may be a difference in the circumstances to which that advocacy may be applied, but there is no difference in the method. The right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. J. Morley), who has just sat down, has had some experience of how trials are conducted in Ireland, having given evidence as a witness and having been cross-examined for several hours; and I was glad to note that he was very careful not to rest his argument on any such ground. Lord Coleridge, speaking on this very Bill in the House of Lords, said that since the passing of the Prisoners' Counsel Act—

“Prosecuting counsel do now, in reply, speak with a force and energy and with a partisanship against prisoners which formerly, when there were no speeches by counsel for prisoners, they were not in the habit of doing.”

Such was the Lord Chief Justice's comment on the methods of English advocacy, which do not differ from those of Irish advocacy. The newspapers from time to time report “scenes” in Irish Courts, which are calculated to give a false impression in this country as to how trials are conducted in Ireland; and injustice is done by them both to the counsel who defend, including hon. Members opposite, and to the counsel who prosecute for the Crown. It has been further suggested that there is a difference in the spirit governing the administration of the law in Ireland which would justify this exception being made in the case of that country. I have been engaged in many criminal cases, including about twenty cases of murder, during the last few years in Ireland; and I can say most positively that, if there is any difference, it is that there is a more sympathetic feeling towards prisoners in the administration of an Irish Court than in that of an English Court. I believe that a prisoner in Ireland gets “the benefit of the doubt” extended to him more favourably than in England. Lord Morris mentioned to me to-day that he was 22 years on the Irish Bench, that he tried numerous criminal cases, and that there never was a single prisoner executed who came before him. I venture to say that no English Judge who has been on the Bench for the same length of time could say the same thing. I most respectfully repudiate the suggestions which have been made against the Irish Bar and the administration of justice in Ireland. The danger which attends the administration of the law in Ireland is not partiality in the Judge; it is intimidation directed against the tribunal.

*(4.28.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I think the House should not allow itself to be beguiled into a controversy as to how trials are conducted, and the respective merits of English and Irish advocacy. Let us look at this Bill as practical men. The question has not been discussed in this country with reference to Ireland, but it has been discussed, and discussed for many years, by the most eminent lawyers in this House and on the Bench, with respect to English trials, English jurisprudence, and English rules of procedure. A very large number, at all events, of those who know something of the administration of justice in this country are of opinion that if this change were introduced into the criminal system, some guilty persons who now escape would be convicted, and a great many innocent persons who are now convicted would be acquitted. Parliament itself has recognised it in two of the most recent and most stringent Statutes—namely, the Criminal Law Procedure Amendment Act and the Explosives Act. We want this reform in England. We have wanted it for many years. As practical men why should we not have the experiment tried? The right hon. Gentleman says it would take a great deal of time; it could not take a great deal of time. I venture to say that one single day's sitting in the Grand Committee would pass this Bill. It has already passed through the House of Lords; and it has come down here with the stamp of their approval. It has passed the Second Reading stage in this House. I believe one day in the Grand Committee, and possibly one night—no, not a half or a quarter of a night—spent on the Third Reading would put the jurisprudence of England and the English people in possession of a great boon which they desire and which they believe would promote the administration of justice. I appeal to the First Lord—I appeal to the Government—to pass a measure which I venture to say will be found to be one of the most beneficial which they have placed on the Statute Book during the present Parliament.

INDIAN COUNCILS ACT (1861) AMENDMENT BILL [Lords].—(No. 182.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

(4.31.) Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—"A record of all proceedings at the meetings of the Viceroy's Council, as now published in the 'Gazette of India,' and of the Presidency and Provincial Councils, shall be published in separate volumes and presented yearly to Parliament."—(Mr. Schwann.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 8, inclusive, agreed to.

(4.32.) SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): Before we lose sight of this Bill in Committee, I should like to make a last effort to obtain from the Government an express recognition of the principle which they have admitted, of the desirability of representative natives being added to the Indian Councils: This is the last opportunity that we can have of rectifying what I believe is a defect, and I hope that that defect may be rectified. Every single administrator of great experience who has held high position in India has now admitted the desirability of this change in our administrative system in that country. The change has been admitted as desirable in years long gone by, but opinion is now much more largely gathered together in favour of its adoption. Now, Sir, I believe there is one method by which this recognition can be at this stage of the Bill admitted. I do not suppose the hon. Baronet the Member for the Evesham Division of Worcestershire would raise any opposition to the recognition of this principle of representation which I seek to see admitted into the Bill. I was very grieved to hear in the Debate a few nights ago the remarks which fell from the hon. Baronet. He qualified the words which he had used, but he stated distinctly that in times of crisis and danger the natives of India were not, for ability and energy, able to take the place of Europeans. I would traverse altogether that statement. I think it is most unfortunate that an hon. Gentleman in his position and with his knowledge should have ventured to formulate such an opinion and to have expressed it in this House. He, I believe, was not present in those series of sad events which took place in 1857 in India. I think the country was unfortunate in his absence, and I think the hon. Baronet himself was unfortunate in being absent, because a man of his great administrative ability would in these serious occurrences have been of great assistance in the country; and, on the other hand—

(4.36.) THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): I understand the hon. Member desires to move an Amendment to this Bill referring to the desirability of adopting the representative principle in the Councils. The Preamble is always taken last, in order that it may be in perfect consistence with the Bill in its final shape. The Preamble would not be consistent with the Bill in its final shape if amended as proposed, and therefore the Amendment would be out of order.

(4.37.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Is it within your knowledge, Mr. Courtney, that the Government have in three cases admitted the representative principle?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That is in no way relevant.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH
(SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 230.)
COMMITTEE. [Progress, 29th April.]
Considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

POSTPONED CLAUSES AND SCHEDULES.

Clause 4.

(4.40.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I think this clause must be again postponed, as it is a Definition Clause, and there must be modifications made in it.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): If it be a competent course it is desirable, as this is a clause that must be amended in a consequential manner, to bring up the Amendments on Report.

(4.41.) DR. CLARK: This is a Definition Clause, which requires modifications. As a rule, Definition Clauses are at the end of a Bill, otherwise you must have discussion upon them. Therefore, I think it had better be postponed; but I do not desire to press its postponement. One of the matters which we must discuss if it is gone on with now is Sub-section 9, which covers the word "Commissioners," as against "Councillors."

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! It would be very unusual to postpone a clause again. It appears quite simple and not a disputed matter to make Amendments to a Definition Clause at a subsequent stage of the Bill.

(4.42.) DR. CLARK: I have an Amendment to leave out of this clause Sub-section 9. This raises the question as to whether the title in the burghs shall be "Councillor" or "Commissioner." The old term in all the Royal burghs, and in all the burghs, until I think the Police Act, was Town or Burgh Councillor, and this term is used in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. But the Council in a police burgh in Scotland is called a Board of Commissioners, and the members are named Commissioners, so that under the present position of things you have old Royal burghs with a population of 700—sometimes only 300 or 400—with Councillors, and large police burghs with Commissioners. I am a little doubtful whether, under the new clauses, even an old Royal burgh, except under the old Royal Burgh Charters, will not change its terms, and the members be called Commissioners. New police burghs of a population of 68,000 or 70,000 are very much more important than the old decaying and dying Royal burghs; and it is a point of honour among them that they have a right to the terms "Council" and "Councillors." I am glad to say we have carried our point so far that in future these large burghs will have a Provost, and Magistrates, and Councillors. If the Lord Advocate will give us any explanation why he should have the two phrases then, of course, I will not press my Amendment; but to place the large burghs under the Police Acts in the same position as Royal burghs as to name, style, and authority, is practically the aim and object of this Bill; and I do not see why we should retain both names.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 9, to leave out Sub-section (9).—(Dr. Clark.)

*(4.44.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: In one sense this may be regarded as a verbal matter; but there is another sense disclosed by the speech of the hon. Member, that shows it is more important, for it touches sentiment. I believe myself there are sufficient reasons for keeping this designation. In the first place, it has become a perfectly well-known and distinct term in Scotland, because it is a term applied to bodies created under the Police Acts of 1850 and 1862, and has a distinct meaning. Having that meaning, it has not only passed into the ordinary language of the people, but has been over and over again adopted in Statutes. It is a convenient term, as indicating the fact that these bodies are acting under certain Statutes, and are not Town or Burgh Councils, in the sense in which these words are understood throughout the whole of Scotland. If there is any value in the distinction, it does appear to me that as a matter of convenience it ought not to be confused, as it certainly would be by the Amendment. For these reasons, I think the clause should remain as it is.

(4.46.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): We must look at this matter practically. We are dealing with a Police Act and a Public Health Act, which is to apply to all burghs in Scotland, police, as well as to every other burgh in Scotland. We are conferring upon these burghs equal powers, and if we are going to have uniformity at all, why should some burghs call their Magistrates Commissioners, while others call their Magistrates Town Councillors? We are now attempting to introduce a uniform system, and give uniform powers in all the burghs in Scotland; and I do not see why, in the future, there should be in some cases the title of Commissioner, and in others the title of Town Councillor. It has been urged, as an argument for retaining the distinction, that these were introduced as Police Commissioners. They were introduced then, because their powers were of a very limited kind. They were only practically, police powers, and, therefore, had to be distinguished from Town Councillors, who had larger powers. But the object of this Bill is to bring about uniformity in local management, and I can see very great inconvenience in keeping up the distinctive terms. I hope, therefore, the Amendment will be accepted.

(4.48.) DR. CLARK: I take it that under the first Schedule we are repealing all the other Burgh Acts of all kinds, of William and all the other Sovereigns before Victoria. We are beginning again de novo. This is a Bill to consolidate, and if the Lord Advocate will kindly look at page 5, Clause 5, he will see that the words are—

Sir C. J. Pearson

"This Act shall apply from its commencement to every existing burgh; and (b) to every burgh created under this Act."

So that the Bill will affect every burgh now in existence, and every burgh that is created; and as you repeal all the other Acts—the Acts of William and others—all your old burghs, your Royal burghs, will be in the same position, and you will, practically, be taking away, under this clause, the title of Councillors from those burghs. I contend that small toy burghs, with only 250 or 270 inhabitants, ought not to have, as a matter of sentiment, any right to such a title when large burghs with 60,000 inhabitants are debarred from it.

(4.51.) MR. BARCLAY: I think that the office of Burgh Councillor or Commissioner should be aggrandised as far as possible. I would suggest that in all burghs in which the Chief Magistrate is called "Provost" the term "Councillor" should be used.

(4.52.) MR. ESSELMONT: I do not see that any hardship would be inflicted upon anybody by adopting the term "Councillor."

(4.53.) MR. McDONALD CAMERON: Some difficulty may arise with regard to the title in cases where, as in my own burgh, they are governed by a local Act.

(4.54.) MR. CRAWFORD: I sympathise a good deal with the Amendment, but I think it would be extremely difficult to carry out the change of name throughout the Bill. On the other hand, it would be easy to change the name afterwards by a subsequent Act if it is thought convenient to do so.

DR. CLARK: I think it is important to take the sense of the House upon the matter.

THE CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. Member for Caithness that if this Amendment were adopted it would, perhaps, involve five or six other Amendments.

DR. CLARK: Then I will withdraw it, and take a Division on an Amendment to another clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(4.57.) DR. CLARK: I now propose to leave out the word "Commissioner," and to insert "Councillor."

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 40, to leave out the word "Commissioner," in order to insert the word "Councillor."—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Commissioner' stand part of the Clause."

The House divided:—Ayes 228; Noes 27.—(Div. List, No. 108.)

Clause 5.

DR. CLARK: This is a clause in which certain burghs are exempted. Edinburgh, Glasgow, and some of the smaller towns are exempted, and a number of the smaller burghs wish also to be exempted. Perhaps, however, the best time to consider the matter will be on the Schedule.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

Clause 15.

DR. CLARK: Connected with this clause is one of the most curious features. These large towns, having fought against the Bill, now change their tactics. They desire to be exempted, and we are exempting them. Now they ask for the right to take any section or sub-section they think proper. I think their position ought to be either that they want the Bill, or that they be taken out of it altogether. I do not see any reason at all for empowering them to take just what they want.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the Clause.—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: In the Police Acts hitherto passed, there has been power of adoption, and the course seems to me desirable in the interests of all concerned. If any of the larger towns think that any particular section suits them or contains additional powers they ought to have, I think it is reasonable they should be permitted to adopt them without incurring the expense of coming to Parliament for a special Act. I, therefore, appeal to the hon. Member to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 28.

DR. CLARK: This is a Limitation Clause. We have found lately that ladies are very useful as members of School Boards and in other capacities. They have been elected even to the London County Council. I want to have Home Rule, and therefore beg to move to omit the word "male," in order that duly qualified ladies may not, on no other ground than that of sex, be excluded from the scope of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 16, line 17, to leave out the word "male."—(Dr. Clark.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 36 agreed to.

Clause 42.

DR. CLARK: It appears that the object of this clause is, that where there are various jurisdictions in one burgh, for instance a Burgh Commission and a Police Commission, each with certain powers, they are to be united. The original clause dealing with this subject went very much further than the one now before us, inasmuch as, among other things, it determined how the union was to take place. I do not see how you can carry out the proposed object by the present clause. It seems to me to be very vague. I will take one of the places which will be affected by it. In the burgh of Thurso there are two classes of Commissioners—namely, the Burgh Commissioners who exist in virtue of the burgh being a burgh of barony, and the Police Commissioners. Now, the intention of this clause is that those two bodies shall be joined together. The wording is that—"All the powers and duties already existing, or conferred by this Act in relation thereto, shall thereafter devolve and be invested in, and be wholly exercised by the Provost, Magistrates, and Town Councils or Commissioners as the sole Municipal Authority."

Now in a burgh of barony the Police Commissioners have the larger powers, and what I want to know is, after this clause passes, will the Police Commissioners be the authority, and the Burgh of Barony Commissioners cease to exist? Of course there is no Provost in the place. Take another case. There is the Royal Burgh of Wick and the large Police Burgh of Pulteney Town. I take it that they would not be merged. The people of Pulteney Town are under the impression that they will be merged with Wick against their will. There are a number of other burghs of the same character. The original clause had much more in it than this, and it seems to me was much clearer. The clause now before the Committee is somewhat vague, and I fail to see how it will act.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It seems to me that the original clause was a totally different one from this, because it dealt with combinations of burghs under a voluntary arrangement, whereas the present clause is only intended to secure that there shall be no conflict or complication of jurisdiction in a burgh. It seems to be obviously proper as a matter of convenience to the Magistrates and citizens that there should not be a double jurisdiction. Burghs such as the hon. Member referred to would come under Clauses 22, 23, 24, or 25. In the case to which the hon. Member referred, the effect of this Bill would be to sweep the jurisdiction into the hands of the Police Commissioners, and not into the hands of the Burgh Commissioners.

MR. ASHER (Elgin, &c.): I have given special attention to this clause, as part of my own constituency seems affected by it. This clause has clearly the effect of merging various authorities over the whole of Scotland into one Municipal Authority. I do not think the clause will be found to contain anything at all objectionable.

MR. McDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.): I have in my constituency two burghs, the Royal Burgh of Wick and another one, Pulteney Town, which is governed by Police Commissioners. The people of Pulteney Town have taken counsel's opinion on this clause, and they have been advised that they will have to amalgamate with the Royal Burgh of Wick, and that they will cease to exist as a separate burgh. Well, they object to be coerced, and they want some definite and reliable assurance that amalgamation will not be compulsory.

Dr. Clark

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Bute): The conclusion to which the hon. Member has come seems to be an extraordinary one. On the arguments used by him, such places as Portobello will be merged with Edinburgh and Govan with Glasgow.

MR. McDONALD CAMERON: When this clause is passed am I to understand that it will leave the burghs such as I have referred to at liberty to take advantage of this Act as they wish?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I do not see how you can force the combination of two separate burghs by this clause. I do not think the hon. Gentleman need have any fear on that point.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 46, 60, 75, and 76 agreed to.

Clause 77.

DR. CLARK: I suppose this is one of those clauses on which the Lord Advocate proposes to make an Amendment at a later stage.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: That is so.

DR. CLARK: The object of the clause is to place Medical Officers of Health in the counties and in the burghs in the same position so far as qualification is concerned. Now, diplomas are granted for sanitary science, and we think it is desirable that the qualification should be amended. We think it would be better if the clause were delayed so that it might be re-cast with the object of placing the Medical Officers in the burghs and the counties on the same footing.

MR. McDONALD CAMERON: I agree with the hon. Member who has just spoken; and I think it is very necessary, in view of the difference that has been made in the examinations, that the qualification should be maintained.

DR. CAMERON: I think it would be well if the Lord Advocate would consent to the postponement of this clause in order that the Medical Officers of Health might lay their objections before him. We have made great progress since 1862, and I think the Medical Officers appointed under this Act of 1892 should be at least on a par so far as qualification is concerned, with the Medical Officers appointed under the Local Government Act. In the small burghs it would be impossible to appoint highly-salaried men, who alone would be competent to discharge the duty of Medical Officers, and I think the clause should be altered so that the qualifications of the Medical Officers should be on a par with those required under the Local Government Act, and that the small burghs should be empowered to make arrangements with the County Authorities, so that one fully competent officer could cover a large area. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has his Amendment ready, or whether it might not be as well to postpone this single clause.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: This is, to a certain extent, a question of procedure, and I do not think there is any ambiguity on the subject to which the hon. Member has referred. It may be in the recollection of the Committee that the Public Health Clauses of this Bill, strictly so-called, were strongly opposed by a certain body in Scotland and by some hon. Members of this House. It was thought desirable, in order to facilitate the passage of this Bill, that these clauses should be dropped, and the Bill was very carefully gone over with a view to select those clauses which were admitted by those interested to fall within the category of Public Health Clauses. The result was that the clauses with which the Committee is now dealing were selected, and I may say that the hon. Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron) has accurately described the Amendments which the Government are prepared to introduce in this clause. The Amendments which the Government propose to make are entirely within the scope of what has been said, and hon. Members may rely upon it that they will not raise any matter other than what has been raised in the statement just made. I propose to bring them up on the Report stage, and I believe that the proper form is that the clauses should pass subject to that undertaking, and not that they should be postponed or reserved. Hon. Gentlemen who are interested may feel assured that their position will not be in any degree worse than it is now.

DR. CAMERON: I have no desire to offer any opposition to the Bill, and what I would suggest is this: The hon.

Member for Caithness has an Amendment on the Paper as to the qualification of Medical Officers; that might be put in at this stage, and that would give the sanction of the Committee to the Amendment. Then the right hon. Gentleman could make his modification on the Report stage.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON: I have a Petition from the Town Clerk of Musselburgh in favour of those Public Health Clauses being included in the Bill.

MR. R. T. REID: I have some Petitions in the same strain.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I have no doubt that most people in Scotland would rather have a portion of the Bill than lose it altogether, and it was with that view that we were prepared to consider the Public Health Clauses as a separate part of the Bill. I do not object to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member, and I will accept the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: No Amendment has been moved.

DR. CLARK signified that he moved his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 32, line 19, after the word "practitioner," to insert the words "registered as qualified in sanitary science, public health, or state medicine."—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 78.

DR. CAMERON: My Amendment refers to the size of the burghs to be affected by this Act, and I propose it at the request of one of the burghs which will be affected. I will read a letter on the subject which I have received from the Town Clerk of Clydebank, who says—

"Amongst the clauses of this Bill which have been postponed for further discussion is Clause 78, which seriously affects the burgh of Clydebank. The burgh was formed in 1886 with a population of 5,000, and rose to 9,998 at the last Census. We have not had many months to consider our position in regard to the management of the police force till a proposal is made to alter the law with the effect of throwing us back 20 years before we could again hope to manage our own police. Surely the population limit of 7,000 is a sufficient safeguard without further restrictions. It stands so in the Police Act of 1872 and the Local Government Act of 1889; and if burghs with a population of 7,000 have managed their police force satisfactorily in the past, and are to be entrusted with the same powers in years to come, there can be no good reason why burghs with a similar population, but which have not yet taken over the control of the police, should be debarred from so doing until their population reaches 20,000 at a regular taking of the Census. Assuming that you are taking an interest in this clause on behalf of other burghs similarly situated, permit me to suggest one or two alternative Amendments suited for burghs over 7,000, but which have not yet taken the police into their own hands: (1) Clause 78, page 33, line 5, delete 'And at the date of the passing of this Act maintained a separate police force, and of burghs which at the date of the last Census had a population of not less than 20,000,' or (2) Clause 78, page 33, line 7, after 'force,' insert 'or formed into a separate police district in terms of the County Police Act, 20 & 21 Vict., Chap. 72,' or (3) 'That the limit of population be 10,000, instead of 20,000 (line 8), and that Clydebank be scheduled as having a population of 10,000 at last Census for the purpose of the Act.' I shall be glad to furnish you with any information regarding this burgh which you may deem necessary; and trusting you may be of some little service to us with the least possible inconvenience, I am, &c."

The Amendment I propose would meet such cases as this, and I move to delete from the word "thousand," in line 5, to "shall," in line 8.

Amendment proposed,

In page 33, line 5, to leave out from the word "thousand" to the word "shall," in line 8.—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and at the passing of this Act' stand part of the Clause."

DR. CLARK: Clydebank is not the only place affected in this way. There are other burghs where a similar expression of opinion has been made, and the general feeling, I am sure, is that it is better for the control of the police to be as local as possible. Where the Burgh Magistrates have the control of the police, they find that they are more respectful; but when the police are under the control of the County Authorities, they are not so deferential to the Burgh Magistrates as is considered desirable. I would also suggest that it is a big jump all at once from 7,000 to 20,000 in the way of population; and if the Government cannot see their way to accept this Amendment, they might accept 10,000 as the population. With a population of 10,000 they ought to have the option of having their own police, and I think the jump from 7,000 to 10,000 would be fairer than from 7,000 to 20,000.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It is quite obvious that no figure which could be fixed upon would be altogether satisfactory, as populations will fluctuate. With reference to the suggested compromise of 10,000, I would remind the Commission that the figure 20,000 is a compromise. There was a proposal of 30,000, but it was put down to 20,000 by one of the Select Committees, and the reason for not putting it lower is that in regard to the administration of police there is a strong opinion entertained amongst those responsible for that administration that it is inexpedient to have a separate police force in very small communities, and that 20,000 is about the limit below which a separate police force should not be upheld, except in those cases where a separate police force has hitherto been maintained, as in many cases it has been in burghs of much smaller area and population. The limit of 7,000 is the old limit, and it is enforced only in burghs which, at the date of the passing of this Act, contained 7,000 inhabitants and a separate police force. But, as regards those which do not, it is considered desirable that a separate police force should not be set up afresh and maintained unless the population reaches so much as 20,000.

MR. ESSLEMONT: These small burghs have practically their own police. The question is whether it is to be a separate force with a Chief Constable. In all burghs they have their police force within themselves, and I do not think the matter is of so much importance as has been made out. It is inconvenient in very small burghs that you should have a separate force and a separate superintendent. I have not known that there was any trouble in arranging with the Chief Constable of the county to have a certain number of police subject to the orders of the burgh.

*MR. BARCLAY: This is a very delicate question indeed, and the burghs have very strong feelings on the matter. One of my burghs, with between ten thousand and eleven thousand inhabitants, had given up the control of its police to the county, and, feeling very dissatisfied with the way their affairs were conducted, resumed control of the police. If the smaller burghs come under the county, they ought to be treated as a part of the county; but it seems that the County Council can make separate police districts of the burghs, and impose special rates. These burghs would be in a minority on the County Council when the question of special rating came up, and would not, therefore, be in a fair position. That being so, they should be absorbed into the county, and not created separate districts with special rates.

MR. STEPHEN WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.): I cannot vote for the Amendment. My burgh of Renfrew, with a population of 7,000, has not only a separate police force, but a Chief Constable, and they set great store upon it.

MR. McDONALD CAMERON: I think with the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) that there is often great difficulty experienced in the smaller burghs, where higher rates have to be charged for a separate police force. I know several burghs where a special rate has been imposed, and it has given great dissatisfaction.

DR. CLARK: Perhaps the best way to meet the case of Renfrew as well as other burghs with regard to special rating would be to postpone the coming into force of the Act till the 1st January, 1893, which would give them time to consider what they would do.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 231; Noes 71.—(Div. List, No. 109.)

(6.14.) On Motion of Mr. CRAWFORD, the following Amendment was agreed to:—

In page 33, line 8, after the word "thousand," to insert the words "and of any burgh with respect to which it shall be at any time proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff on the application of the Commissioners of such burgh that it has a population of not less than twenty thousand."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 83, 87, and 100 agreed to.

Clause 101.

(6.15.) DR. CAMERON: I beg to move—

In page 42, line 7, to leave out the words "and to enforce payment thereof in the same manner as penalties."

This clause relates to the case of a man who accidentally injures a lamp. He is liable to be brought before a Magistrate and compelled to pay the amount of the damage. I do not object to that; but this clause confers power on that Magistrates to "enforce payment thereof in the same manner as penalties." This clause is taken from the Act of 1862. At that time imprisonment for debt existed; since then it has been abolished, and there is no imprisonment for a civil debt, but there is imprisonment for the enforcement of a fine. The preceding clause, 100, deals with the case of malicious mischief, where there is any fault. This clause deals with the case where there is no fault. The effect of my Amendment would be not to allow the Magistrate to enforce payment of the fine by imprisonment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 42, line 7, to leave out the words "and to enforce payment thereof in the same manner as penalties."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(6.16.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: After consideration, I feel disposed to accept this Amendment. I think, however, to make the matter quite clear, we should add the words, "the sum shall be recoverable as a civil debt."

Amendment agreed to.

*(6.17.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: I beg to move, in page 42, line 7, to insert the words, "and the sum shall be recoverable as a civil debt."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 104.

(6.19.) DR. CLARK: I beg to move, in page 43, line 14, to leave out the words "occupier or occupiers," and insert the words "owner or owners." This is a clause which requires modification. The owner of common stairs and passages is required to put up lamps and light them with gas on the landings of houses with flats; and this clause compels the occupier or occupiers of such common stairs or passages to light and extinguish such lamps or lights at such hours as shall be fixed by the Commissioners by any bye-law or regulation, a fine of 10s. being payable for not doing so. I can quite understand the lights on a staircase coming under the control of occupiers, and that they should light them and put them out; but they may be away for a month, and perhaps during that time the gas is lit and goes on burning night and day, there being nobody to look after it. This is work which I think ought to be done by the Commissioners. The Commissioners may pass resolutions by which they will be able to clean and light these places, and then charge the occupiers of the house for it. I do not see why the owners of the front land shall be compelled to pay in respect of these passages, when they not only go to the back land, but go straight on. They then come to be thoroughfares, and the cost ought to be borne by those who take advantage of them. I think the clause as it is drawn now is very unfair to the occupiers. It places on them a burden that ought to belong to the owners or to the general ratepayers.

Amendment proposed, in page 43, line 14, to leave out the words "occupier or occupiers," and insert the words "owner or owners."—(Dr. Clark.)

(6.22.) MR. McDONALD CAMERON: I hope the Government will accept the Amendment. The reasons which the hon. Member for Caithness has given show clearly that the clause will remove the responsibility which ought to rest with the owner. I am perfectly certain that under the clause as it stands the work will not be well done, and will not be effective.

*(6.23.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: This clause is expressive of the law as it now stands; it will not lay any additional burdens upon the occupier. If a passage, though used as a thoroughfare, is nevertheless private, then it will be a matter not for the Commissioners, but for the owner or occupier to look after the lighting. It will be noticed by the Committee that the first paragraph of the clause lays upon the owner the obligation of providing, upon requisition by the Commissioners, all necessary lamps and means of lighting, and the necessary supply of gas or other light; so that the proposition is this: that the owner, having done that, shall, in addition, have to come in the morning to clean, and in the evening to light, and at night to extinguish the lamps, and that these are not among the ordinary duties of the occupier. I appeal to the hon. Member on the ground that this is not an increase of the burdens of the occupier, and also on the ground of the obvious propriety of the provision in the clause, not to press his Amendment.

(6.25.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I do not think the right hon. Gentleman quite understands the effect of this clause. It, on the face of it, reverses what I believe has been the invariable practice in Scotland. In Scotland the occupiers provide the gas fittings, but the clause proposes that the landlord shall do so.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: There is nothing to prevent the occupier putting up as many gas fittings as he likes.

MR. BARCLAY: I am afraid I have not made my meaning quite clear. What I say is that it is usual for the gas fittings to belong to the occupier.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY: Inside the house.

MR. BARCLAY: But here the first portion of the clause provides that the owner

"Shall provide all necessary lamps, brackets, and other means of lighting."

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY: That has nothing to do with the inside of the house.

MR. BARCLAY: If it is not inside the house, why on earth should the occupier pay for it? This is a practical question, for the clause is intended to apply to tenements with 20 or 30 tenants. Now, how is it practicable, with this class of tenants, who occupy for perhaps only a few weeks or months, to come to an arrangement with them as to when the gas is to be lighted, when it is to be extinguished, and how the cost is to be provided? It is impossible.

*(6.27.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: The gas will be paid by the owner. There is no question in this case as to the owner or the occupier paying for the gas. It is a mere question of cleaning, lighting, and extinguishing the lamps.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I do not think that there is any necessity for this clause at all. I think it might be well left to private arrangement between the owner and occupiers, and I would, therefore, suggest to the Lord Advocate that he should take out this section altogether.

(6.28.) MR. BARCLAY: I think the hon. and learned Gentleman has not thoroughly mastered this clause. By a subsequent section he will observe that the cost of the gas, if there is an arrangement between the Commissioners and the owner and occupier, is to be borne by the occupier, and that the cost may be recovered by the Police Commissioners. Anybody who knows anything about these houses and their tenants must know that this is practically impossible—that the Police Commissioners could not go weekly and collect the cost in amounts of a few shillings.

MR. ESSLEMONT: The clause does not provide that they should.

MR. BARCLAY: I think it does, and in order that the Committee may understand it, I will take the liberty of reading the third part of the section—

“It shall be in the option of the Commissioners to resolve, on a Motion, of which due notice has been given, to contract for, or supply, gas or other light for such common stair, passage, or private court, and to clean, light, and extinguish the same by their servants, and recover the expense thereof to an amount not exceeding the sum of 20s. for each burner per annum from the occupier, or, if there are more occupiers than one, then proportionately, according to the number of the occupiers of any building to which access is obtained by such common stair, passage, or private court.”

That seems very clear and distinct, but that is what I object to, because it is impossible for the Commissioners to accomplish it. The lighting of these common stairs, which are in one sense public thoroughfares, and in another part of a private building, ought to be laid upon the owner, and, if he likes, he can add so much to the rent of the house in consequence. I am surprised the Government should persist in refusing to accept the Amendment.

(6.32.) DR. CLARK: If the Lord Advocate will look at the sixth line of the clause he will see that it is incumbent upon the owner or owners to supply the necessary gas or other light which may be required. It is very clear that the owner or owners are to supply the light. Under the first sub-section of the clause the occupier or occupiers are required to do the cleaning and to light the gas and to put it out, but under the last sub-section the Commissioners can at any time supply the gas and do the cleaning, and instead of it being paid by the owner and occupier, it is all to go upon the occupier. So you propose by the first sub-section that the cost shall be borne by the owner; then, by the second sub-section the cost of the cleaning and lighting goes upon the occupier, and by the third you propose that the Commissioners can come in and say: “We will both supply the gas and the cleaning, and charge it all to the occupier.” The whole of the burdens should have been shifted, not upon the occupier, but upon the owner. That is why I move to leave out the words “occupier or occupiers,” and to insert “owner or owners.” It would be difficult for the Commissioners to arrange this matter; it has been tried and found to be unsuccessful. It is very easy to place the burden upon the owners, and then the owners can raise their rents if they like for this extra labour you are putting upon them. I think it is a far better plan to lay the whole thing upon the owners and give him the control, with the Municipality; it is easier to deal with a few hundreds of owners than to deal with thousands of occupiers. I hope the Lord Advocate now understands the clause, and I hope he will give us some reason for refusing the Amendment.

(6.34.) MR. THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk): I only rise to say that I think it will be much better to put the burden upon the owners, because that is the only means whereby the money can be collected.

(6.35.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) This clause contains the most absurd and idiotic provisions I recollect in any Act of Parliament for a long time. We are familiar with the case of common stairs in the Temple, and I put it to hon. Members who have chambers in the Temple how, as occupiers, they would like the obligations put upon them to clean and light and extinguish the gas upon the stairs? Anything more inconceivably idiotic I never heard of in my life. The rational way of dealing with cases of this kind is that there should be some common property as in the Temple and Inner Court. The whole of this clause is a thing which is absolutely absurd and impracticable. It has been pointed out that there is an additional reason why nothing should be thrown upon the occupier, because in the last sub-section the Commissioners are empowered, if they think fit to exercise their powers, to charge as much as 20s. from the occupier for each burner. That is a most monstrous charge upon the occupier, and that is a charge not merely for the obligation which is thrown upon the occupier by the provisions of the section, but also for the whole of the gas which is consumed. There is absolutely no sense of propriety in this. I am told it was in the Act of 1862; I am astonished to hear it. I think the duty of lighting the gas at a particular time and putting it out at a particular time is a perfectly absurd one to throw upon the occupiers.

*(6.35.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: The Amendment is in line 14, to substitute "owner" for "occupier," but the suggestions have ranged over the 1st and 3rd sub-sections, and the references to the Act of 1862 have no connection with the provision here.

DR. CLARK: I may explain that I did not want to put so many Amendments on the Paper.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: My proposal is that we consider this Clause in reference to the supply of gas, and that we bring up a Clause on Report. The Amendment does not raise that point. I will inquire if there is any reason for the distinction made in the Clause between the liability of owners and the liability of occupiers. While I cannot accept the Amendment—for I think it is reasonable that the owners should undertake the duty of cleansing, lighting, and extinguishing—I will undertake to re-consider the Clause.

DR. CLARK: I have no objection to passing over the Clause now; but it will be very difficult to carry out this method, if not utterly impossible.

*MR. BARCLAY: In a building containing twenty or thirty tenements, and occupiers constantly changing, I do not see how it will be possible for the occupiers to hold meetings and come to arrangements for the lighting and putting out, &c. I should strongly recommend the withdrawal of the Clause now, and the introduction of a new clause.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY: The Clause is precisely the same as that in the Act of 1862, which has been attended with no inconvenience.

MR. HUNTER: Because it has not been enforced. It is a question for the Commissioners to deal with. I hope my hon. Friend will divide on the Amendment.

MR. ESSLEMONT: Where the duty is laid upon the owners there will be no difficulty in the owners making an arrangement with the lighting authority or with their own tenants. The putting these words into the Clause is an entirely unnecessary interference.

DR. CLARK: Does the Lord Advocate propose to postpone the Clause, or to agree to it and modify it on Report?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It cannot be postponed at this stage; it must be passed or negatived. I would suggest that we pass the Clause now subject to an undertaking to bring up a clause on Report dealing with all the points.

DR. CAMERON: Let us divide on the question that the Clause stand, and if a new clause is brought up on Report we can then deal with that new clause.

*MR. BARCLAY: There are two questions at issue—

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I quite recognise that.

*MR. BARCLAY: There is the question whether the occupiers should pay for the lighting, cleansing, and so forth, and whether the light should be paid for by the owners. I certainly think the Clause should be withdrawn, and a new clause brought up on Report.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It is really immaterial. I am quite willing to withdraw this Clause now, and I will propose a new clause on Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause withdrawn.

Clauses 108, 109, and 114 agreed to.

Clause 115.

Mr. Hunter

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I hope the Lord Advocate will consent to the omission of this Clause. The 1st section proposes that the duty of sweeping and cleansing the footway in front of a dwelling shall rest with the occupier. Since the clause was originally drafted this question has been fully inquired into by a Select Committee appointed, I believe, to inquire into the Public Health (London) Act, and in the result a clause was introduced into the Act for London, under which the duty is cast upon the Local Authority. If the Committee will consent to the omission of this Clause 115, I propose to substitute the clause from the Public Health (London) Act, with the necessary alterations to make it locally applicable, whereby the responsibility for keeping the footway clear shall rest under penalty upon the Local Authority, not upon individual citizens.

DR. CAMERON: I trust the Lord Advocate will favourably consider this proposal. The subject was much debated on a former occasion in this House, especially in reference to the clearing away of snow and so forth. Up to the present, the duty has devolved on the householder, but I think to the detriment of the community generally. The provision it is now proposed to re-enact was in accordance perhaps with the spirit of the time in 1862, but since then legislation has advanced, and the duty is now recognised as one for the Local Authority. My hon. Friend's proposal to take the clause of the more recent Act as a model is a reasonable one.

DR. CLARK: At the present time, the Commissioners under the clause have to keep clean the footway in front of unoccupied houses, but in front of occupied houses the duty is with the occupier. It is frequently the case after a fall of snow that while the occupiers do their duty, the Commissioners altogether neglect their share. Certainly, I think the duty should altogether lie with the Local Authority, following the principle adopted in London.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I can speak from some experience, and say the clause in the Act of 1862 has worked most unsatisfactorily.

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday.

CHARITY INQUIRIES BILL.—(No. 278.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. A. H. Dyke Ackland.)

Objection taken.

MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I hope my hon. Friend (Mr. Morton) will not seriously object to the Second Reading. The object is simply to enable County Councils—and it is purely permissive—to assist in parochial inquiries. County Councils are anxious to have this enabling power, and the Bill has been introduced at their request.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I have no desire to oppose the wish of my hon. Friend, but, as I read the Bill, it simply allows the County Council to find the money, having nothing to do with the inquiry at all. However, Amendments may be brought forward in Committee, though it may be difficult to find the opportunity for their discussion.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (WALES) BILL.—(No. 215.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SAMUEL H. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid.): This is simply an enabling Bill to allow two County Councils to combine for the support of an intermediate school for the wants of two countries. The proposal is simply to do for the Intermediate Education Act what the Technical Instruction Act of last year did for the Act of 1889.

Objection taken.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (PURCHASE) BILL.—(No. 257.)

Read the third time, and passed.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 1) BILL.—(No. 256.)

As amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

TOWN HOLDINGS COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That Mr. David Randell be discharged from further attendance on the Select Committee on Town Holdings.

Ordered, That Mr. Thomas Ellis be added to the Committee.—(Mr. Arnold Morley.)

PUBLIC LIBRARIES LAW CONSOLIDATION COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That Mr. Paulton be discharged from further attendance on the Select Committee on Public Libraries Law Consolidation.

Ordered, That Mr. Brunner be added to the Committee.—(Mr. Arnold Morley.)

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ORDER (GLASGOW, &c.) BILL [Lords].

Read the first time; and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, and to be printed. [Bill 333.]

COURSE OF BUSINESS.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say what business, if any, will be taken this evening?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): As the hon. Gentleman well knows, we are obliged to set down Supply as first Order; and on the Motion that you, Sir, leave the Chair, several hon. Gentlemen have Notices of Motions, discussion upon which may occupy the whole evening.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): And on Monday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As good progress has been made with other Bills this afternoon, I propose to put down Committee on the Small Holdings Bill as the first Order on Monday.

LORD SALISBURY'S SPEECH.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if there is any truth in the report of the speech delivered this afternoon by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, in which it is distinctly stated that he called upon the Orangemen of Ulster to fight in the event of a decision adverse to the present Government being come to at the General Election; and, further, I wish to ask if there is any truth in the report of the speech of the noble Lord where it is said that he stated—openly stated—that in the event of the Orangemen of Ulster—a very unlikely event—taking up arms in support of their so-called interests, the Forces of the Crown should not be used against them, and that, for his own part, he would do everything to prevent the Military Forces being employed against these men in case they rebelled against the decision of Parliament and the Crown? I want to know if there is any truth in the assertion that the noble Lord used this language, which I find reported in the evening papers? I think, at any rate, we may expect some explanation from the noble Lord's relative.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I was not so fortunate as to hear the speech to which the hon. Member refers, I am not in a position to answer the question he has put to me.

DR. TANNER: I will ask the question on Monday.

EVENING SITTING.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at five minutes after Nine o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 9th May, 1892.

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND), ORDINANCES.

*LORD WATSON: My Lords, I venture to ask your Lordships to present an humble Address praying Her Majesty to withhold her assent to the words "or in mathematics" occurring in Clause IV. (2) of the Ordinance No. XI. framed by the Commissioners under the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889. A single sentence will suffice to explain why I have ventured to take this step. The clause in question requires that a student shall pass in a higher standard so far as regards mathematics. For a pass degree mathematics is an alternative subject with natural philosophy, but the same conditions do not apply to a class in natural philosophy. Attendance at a mathematical class does not count as part of the degree curriculum, unless the higher standard has been previously passed. Attendance at a class of natural philosophy counts, without any such requirement. It has appeared to me, and it is also the opinion of men much more capable than I am of judging of these matters, that the tendency of the regulation as it stands will be to discourage the teaching of mathematics in the Scotch Universities in the case of students proceeding to a pass degree—a result no Scotchman can contemplate with satisfaction. I wish to explain that according to my view, although these words are struck out of the regulation that will not make the Code perfect; but my object in asking your Lordships to petition Her Majesty humbly to withdraw her assent from these words is in order that the way in which these two subjects ought to be dealt with—mathematics and natural philosophy—may be re-considered by the Commissioners and made the subject of a supplementary Ordinance. I do not anticipate that the noble Marquess who takes charge of Scotch affairs in this House will have any objection to the Motion, and I am assured that the Commissioners themselves agree to the propriety of the course which I ask your Lordships to adopt.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying Her Majesty to withhold her assent to the words 'or in mathematics' occurring in Clause IV. (2) of the Ordinance No. XI. framed by the Commissioners under the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889."
—(The Lord Watson.)

*LORD SANDFORD: My Lords, I am sorry that Lord Kelvin, the highest authority in this country on the subjects involved in the Motion of the noble and learned Lord, has been summoned to Scotland by the death of a brother who was, till within the last few months, a no less distinguished professor in Glasgow than the noble Lord himself. In his absence, and with his approval, I rise to say that the Scotch Universities Commissioners offer no objection to the excision of the words objected to by the noble and learned Lord. They were certainly put in, in the first instance, on the advice and with the concurrence of those who were most competent to guide us on the subject; but I do not think that the full effects of the small change made at that time were appreciated. The words certainly destroy the balance between the subjects of examination, not only for entrance into the Universities but for the purposes of graduation; and, in assenting to the change, I quite agree with my noble and learned Friend (Lord Watson) that it will be necessary for us to exercise our discretion as to passing hereafter an explanatory or amending Ordinance in consequence of this change.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Before this question is put, might I ask for an explanation with regard to this Clause IV.? Sub-section (1) says that attendance on any class shall not qualify for graduation, and then follow Sub-sections (2) and (3), which refer to attendance on particular classes. I cannot myself understand why those sub-sections are needed, and I would ask for an explanation. No. (1) appears to cover the two others.

*LORD SANDFORD: If the noble Lord will look at No. (1) I think he will see that it means that attendance at no class shall qualify for examination until the whole preliminary examination is passed, while No. (2) merely raised the second barrier in the erection of a higher standard of mathematics before a student can attend a qualifying class in that subject. This brought mathematics into conflict with natural philosophy, but there is really no discrepancy between the two sub-sections of Clause IV. of the Ordinance.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of Lothian): My Lords, I have only to say that I made inquiries after the noble Lord put down the Motion upon the Paper, and I find that the Scottish Universities Commission, who framed this Ordinance, are entirely in favour of the Motion of the noble and learned Lord, and also that the Universities themselves are in favour of it. Under those circumstances I have no objection to offer to the Motion of the noble and learned Lord.

Motion put, and agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 9th May, 1892.

QUESTIONS.

- HERSHAM SCHOOL AND THE CONSCIENCE CLAUSE.

MR. CUBITT (Surrey, Epsom): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if it is correct that complaints have been made that children attending the Hersham School, a public elementary school under the School Board of Walton-on-Thames, have been compelled to receive religious instruction in contravention of the Conscience Clause of the Education Act; whether the Hersham School has been declared inefficient in consequence of the result of the last examination; and what steps have been taken with respect to the Walton School Board under these circumstances by the Education Department?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Although the direct responsibility of the Board was not proved, breaches of the Conscience Clause did in effect occur in one or two instances some time ago, and the Department is now engaged upon the investigation of another charge under the same section of the Act. It is also the case that the Hersham Boys' School has been declared inefficient. The Department has no intention that the Board should evade its duty either in regard to the Conscience Clause or as to maintaining its schools in a state of efficiency; and unless its procedure is thoroughly reformed, it may render itself liable to default.

THE CONVICT KINSELLA.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to the case of a prisoner named Kinsella, at present in Maryborough Prison, in ill-health, undergoing a sentence of 20 years' penal servitude, for an aggravated assault upon a man named Sullivan; and whether, in view of the fact that Sullivan obtained £150 compensation, and has long ago recovered from his injuries, and that the sentence of 20 years' penal servitude passed upon Kinsella was inflicted at a time of great social disturbance and excitement in Ireland, he can see his way to advise the Lord Lieutenant that the ends of justice have been satisfied by the term of 10 years' penal servitude already undergone, and that the clemency of the Crown might now be exercised to remit the remainder of the sentence?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am informed that the convict referred to was sentenced, with three others, for the attempted murder of John Sullivan, who was beaten about the head with iron bars and left for dead. I am not aware of Sullivan's present condition of health. The question of revising the sentence passed upon this convict has been before two Lords Lieutenant, who decided that they saw no reason for remitting the sentence in accordance with memorials received.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman say, has the memorial been before the present Lord Lieutenant?

*MR. JACKSON: I will inquire if it has been; I think it has.

EVICTED TENANTS AND THE LAND PURCHASE ACT.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has observed that almost every Corporate Body and Poor Law Board in the County of Cork, with the strongly-expressed approval of the Recorder of Cork, has now passed unanimous resolutions urging an extension of time for the operation of the Evicted Tenants' Clause of the Land Purchase Act of last Session; and whether, in view of the strong expression of public opinion among all classes upon the subject, he will introduce a short Bill making the required extension?

*MR. JACKSON: This question is substantially the same as a question addressed to me by the hon. Member on 19th February last, and I then stated that if information came to me that both the landlord and the former tenant desired to avail themselves of the provision contained in the section referred to of the Act of 1891, but found themselves precluded from so doing through the limited time in which that section was in operation, I should consider as to the course to be taken. That information would be a condition precedent to any action on my part, and no such information has reached me.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Boards of Guardians are composed equally of landlords and tenants, and have not these resolutions been passed unanimously with the assent of the ex officio Guardians? Can the right hon. Gentleman have a better expression of both landlords and tenants?

*MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member has, I think, rather missed the point I wished to bring before the House. I said, if evidence were produced before me showing on the part of tenant and landlords—in other words, the parties interested in making agreements—that they desired to make such agreements, but were precluded owing to the lapse of that section of the Act, then I would endeavour to find some means of meeting the difficulty. No such evidence has come before me.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: In what form would the right hon. Gentleman desire the information to come? Would a memorial from any body of tenants, showing the necessity of this, satisfy him, or would he wish landlords to join in such representations?

*MR. JACKSON: I said landlords and tenants.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when the Return relating to the way in which the Resolution of the House of 13th February, 1891, in reference to the question of Government Contracts is being carried out, will be printed and circulated?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Return mentioned by the hon. Member is now being printed, and I hope it will be distributed in the course of a few days.

E.C. DISTRICT POST OFFICE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that newspapers, posted in Fleet Street and other parts of the E.C. Postal District at three p.m. on Saturdays, are not delivered in Kensington and other places within a three mile radius until eight a.m. on the following Monday; whether he is aware that this delay is caused by the insufficiency of the sorting staff and the want of space in the E.C. District Office; and whether, considering the great inconvenience to the public by delay, and the important revenue derived by the Postal Department from the distribution of newspapers from this centre, he will provide a sufficient staff and a suitable building for the expedition of the business of the E.C. Postal District?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The omission complained of is exceptional and not regular. Newspapers posted up to 4.45 p.m. in minor offices, and up to 5.30 p.m. in larger Branch Offices, are in time for delivery on the same evening. There has been some unusual pressure lately in the East Central Office on account of numerous vacancies among sorters, but that is in course of remedy.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Office is not at all suitable for the business to be done there?

SIR J. FERGUSON: I am aware of that; it is about to be enlarged.

PUBLIC HOUSE CLOSING HOURS IN SCOTLAND.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Licensing Court of the Comal District of Argyllshire has granted certificates extending the hours of closing during June, July, and August in Dunoon, Sandbank, and Innellan beyond the hour prescribed by the Licensing Authority under the Public Houses, Hours of Closing (Scotland) Act, 1887, namely, "the Justices of the Peace of the county in Quarter Session assembled"; whether he is aware that in a case arising out of a similar conflict of alleged authority between the Justices in Quarter Session of Forfarshire and the Licensing Court of Arbroath District, it was decided by the Court of Session that District Courts cannot override a decision of the Justices in Quarter Sessions as to the hour of closing; and whether he will take steps to call the attention of Clerks of the Peace to the definition of the Licensing Authority under the Public Houses, Hours of Closing (Scotland) Act, 1887, as interpreted by the Court of Session in the case referred to?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I am informed that the facts stated in the question are correct. I will direct the attention of the Clerk of the Peace of the county where this irregularity occurred to the decision referred to; but I am afraid I cannot undertake to supply all such officials with the decisions of the Supreme Courts which may affect their particular duties.

SCOTCH PRISON OFFICIALS.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Committee appointed by the Secretary for Scotland to inquire into the salaries, &c., of Scotch Prison Officials have made any Report; whether the Government intend to take any steps to remove the distinctions which at present exist between the English and Scotch prison officials; and whether the Government, for the information of Parliament, will explain why higher salaries are paid to English warders and guards than they pay to Scotch officers?

SIR J. GORST (who replied) said: The hon. Member will allow me to answer the question. The reply to the first paragraph of the question is in the affirmative. The Report has been presented. With reference to the second and third paragraphs, I can only repeat what I have said in answer to similar questions already put to me, that it is impossible in reply to a question to compare the various considerations that justify the rates of salaries in each particular case.

MR. ESSLEMONT: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will put this Report on the Table of the House?

SIR J. GORST: That is a question the hon. Member should address to my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate. Perhaps he will give notice of it?

MR. ESSLEMONT: I will put the question on Thursday.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH DRIMNIN.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received complaints regarding the want of telegraphic communication betwixt Lochaline and Drimnin; and could he see his way to accept a much smaller guarantee than that last asked for an extension to Drimnin?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: An application for a telegraph office at Drimnin was made by the hon. Member for Argyllshire. The extension would cost about £270. The annual expenses would be about £50, and the revenue, it is believed, would not be more than about £5. It is, therefore, impossible to accept a smaller guarantee than £50.

MAGHERAFELT COURTHOUSE.

MR. McCARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is now aware of the unsanitary state of Magherafelt Courthouse; whether his attention has been called to the report in the Irish News of the 2nd instant of the emphatic protest made by County Court Judge Neligan, Q.C., on the previous day, as to the "abominable stench" and "most dangerous draughts" which sweep through the Courthouse; whether the learned Judge stated on the previous Monday—

"He was obliged to adjourn the Court before he had sat for an hour and to send home all the people who were in attendance as suitors and witnesses, and inflict on them the inconvenience and loss" of coming back again; whether fully one-third of the County Court business of the entire County of Derry is transacted in Magherafelt; and whether he will consider, in the interest of the public, what steps can be taken to remove the danger to health and life which at present exists there?

MR. JACKSON: The attention of the responsible officer shall be called to the matter, and he will, I hope, take the necessary steps to have the Courthouse put into a sanitary condition.

HORSE BREEDING IN IRELAND.

MR. McCARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the subsidy of £5,000 voted towards the improvement in the breed of horses in Ireland, whether he will state how much of it has been so applied, and what has been done with the balance, if any; whether he is aware that there is no person from the Division of South Down on the Committee appointed under the scheme for the County of Down, and that none of the four registered stallions selected for the county ever visit any place within the district of South Down; and whether, in view of the fact that the population of South Down is chiefly made up of small farmers who stand in need of such facilities as are offered under this scheme, steps will be taken to give this division of the county the benefit of the scheme?

*MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member does not specify any particular year; but I presume he desires to know how the annual grant of £5,000 for improving the breed of horses and cattle in Ireland is allotted?

MR. McCARTAN: This year.

*MR. JACKSON: I cannot give the figures for this year, because the expenditure is not yet completed, but I find by the published accounts of the Royal Dublin Society, that their expenditure in this regard during their last completed year, ended 31st December, 1891, was as follows:—By amount paid to owners of horses, service premiums, fees, &c., £3,290 5s.; by expenses of local committees, £119 17s. 2d.; by service premiums for bulls, £1,201 18s.; by prizes for mares at local inspections, £955; by purchase of pony stallion, £150; by Stallion Show, Dublin, £198 6s. 5d.; by auditor's fee, £2 2s.; by balance in bank, £492 1s. 3d.; total, £6,409 9s. 10d. The reply to the second paragraph appears to be in the affirmative. It is stated that the benefits of the scheme were offered equally to all parts of the country; but no stallions were tendered for registration for service in South Down; accordingly there is no registered stallion in that district.

MR. McCARTAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say how it is that there is no representative from South Down on the Committee?

MR. JACKSON: I presume that the Committee is appointed by the Royal Dublin Society.

MR. McCARTAN: They appointed no person from South Down.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.), on behalf of Mr. M'DERMOTT (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that last year the sum of £960 was given in prizes to brood mares in 16 districts in Ireland; and whether the Royal Dublin Society have discontinued the grant this season; and, if so, for what reasons?

*MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the sum of £955 was given in prizes in Ireland for farmers' brood mares in 1891. The Royal Dublin Society have discontinued these prizes this year, and given the money instead to farmers in part payment of the fees for the service of thoroughbred registered stallions. It is believed that the expenditure of the money in this way will confer greater benefits upon the farmers.

COMPENSATION FOR MURDER IN IRELAND.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report of a case in which Mrs. Perry, the widow of a land agent who was recently shot when driving to Mass at Tulla, County Clare, was awarded by the Grand Jury £20 as compensation for a horse which was shot at the time of the outrage, but in which the claim for £1,000 for his injuries served by Mr. Perry, before he died a lingering death from his wounds, was disallowed on the ground that the Presentment Sessions had no power to award compensation to the representative of a murdered person; and whether the decision that there is now no power to award such compensation was correct; and, if so, whether he will consider if he will introduce a measure to give power to award compensation in such cases?

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: In the event of the Government deciding to introduce a Bill for the purpose of awarding any such compensation, I hope it will include the families of men shot down at Mitchelstown, Youghal, and Tipperary under orders from the Irish Government.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): My attention has been called to the report of the case in question. There is under the existing law no power to award compensation in such cases. The Government do not propose to introduce legislation dealing with the question.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Can the right hon. Gentleman explain how it was the widow of Captain Plunket got compensation—an annual allowance?

MR. MADDEN: I do not think that has anything to do with this question.

BIRTHS IN PRISON.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, having in view the repugnance to the infliction of the indignity on children being born in prison, and the danger to the lives of both mothers and children, he will consider the advisability of so altering the Prison Rules as to permit the removal of all female prisoners to a public hospital during confinement?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I know of no sufficient reason for changing the present practice. A pregnant woman is always released from prison where, in the opinion of the medical officer, her confinement in prison would be attended with risk to her life or to that of the child. Women confined in prison are attended to in the prison infirmary, where they find as much care and medical skill as in a public hospital. It is not so much the place of birth as the conviction of the mother which involves what the hon. Member describes as an indignity.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that a very strong opinion found expression in the Press in relation to a recent case against the indignity of a child being born in gaol? Can the right hon. Gentleman say to what class those women belonged to whom he referred on a former occasion as having been released under these circumstances?

MR. MATTHEWS: I mentioned twelve, I think, and these all belonged to the humbler classes, women convicted of theft and such offences. I am quite aware of the feeling to which the hon. Member alludes; but, as I have said, I think the conviction of the mother is more prejudicial to the future of the child than the mere place of birth.

SPECIAL TELEGRAPH DUTY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether amongst the telegraphists requisitioned for special duty at the last Epsom Spring Meeting, were two from Derby, one from Northampton, one from Leeds, two from Leicester, three from Birmingham, three from Brighton, one from Manchester, two from Bristol, and two from Southampton, most of whom were employed on special duty, and paid at special rates during the ensuing week; will he explain why it was necessary to bring telegraphists such a lengthened distance, and at such a large additional cost, when the staff of the Central Office in London were available; and whether he will see his way, in justice to the clerks at the Central Telegraph Office, and with a view to economy, to supply the staff at special events from the nearest centre?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The arrangements made for the service in question were those which were deemed most convenient and economical, and no question of justice or injustice arises in connection with them.

APPOINTMENT OF TEACHER AT DOWNPATRICK WORKHOUSE.

MR. McCARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the protest against the election of Miss McGifford as teacher in the Down-patrick Workhouse, forwarded by eleven of the Poor Law Guardians to the Local Government Board on Saturday, 30th April; whether he is aware that the Roman Catholic children in Downpatrick Workhouse are in a proportion of five to one of any other denomination, and that, there being no Catholic official in the Workhouse, the Catholic Guardians claimed the right to have a Catholic teacher appointed; that Lord de Ros, a Protestant, in voting for the Catholic applicant (Miss Dixon), said "he voted for her because he believed the claim of the Catholics was a strong one," and the Hon. Somerset Ward, a Protestant, said "he voted for her because she was best qualified for the position"; and whether, considering that the voting was equal and the Chairman gave his casting vote for the Protestant, he will cause inquiry to be made into the matter, with a view of having the present election annulled?

*MR. JACKSON: The Local Government Board for Ireland have received a representation of the nature mentioned in the first paragraph. It appears that of the 21 children at present in the Workhouse school, 15 are Roman Catholics and 6 are of other denominations. I have no official information in regard to the observations attributed to the two Guardians mentioned. The Chairman of a Board of Guardians has no casting vote; but the Chairman gave the vote to which he was entitled as a Guardian to Miss McGifford. As the proceedings at the election were legal and formal, and as the inquiries of the Local Government Board in regard to the elected teacher are satisfactory, there is no ground for interference on the part of that Board.

THE WEARING OF PRISON CLOTHES.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough), on behalf of Mr. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what number of prisoners in Irish prisons sentenced to imprisonment after conviction on indictment were, on the 30th April, 1892, wearing prison clothes, and what number were permitted to wear their own clothes?

*MR. JACKSON: With reference to this question, I find that since the alteration was made in the prison rules in 1889, 179 prisoners have applied for, and been granted, permission to wear their own clothes. There were in the year ended 31st March, 1890, 105 applications; 31st March, 1891, 58 applications; 31st March, 1892, 14 applications; and in the month of April, 1892, two applications; making a total of 179. But by the wording of the question, the question is limited to "prisoners sentenced to imprisonment after conviction on indictment." Of such prisoners there were in custody in Irish prisons on 30th April, 1892, 471. From these prisoners only one application was received, and it was granted.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): Who was that one—a fraudulent stockbroker?

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if there was only one prisoner? Will the right hon. Gentleman lay the Report from the Irish Prison Commissioners before the House stating whether the relaxation in the case of this one prisoner was made on account of the nature of the crime or the social position of the prisoner?

*MR. JACKSON: I have no objection to lay the Report on the Table, but I imagine the answer would be that neither of the reasons stated by the right hon. Member was the right one.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Then I would ask the reason why in this case the Prison Rules were relaxed?

*MR. JACKSON: The right hon. Member appears not to be aware of the Rule with respect to which relaxation is granted. I stated it at length recently. The Rule provides that permission may be granted where the Prison Commissioners are of opinion, expressed in writing, that the wearing of the prison clothes is not desirable for the purposes of health and cleanliness. I stated further that in all cases where application had been made under this Rule permission had been granted.

MR. MAC NEILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that before the Rule was made, while the Belfast forgers were allowed to wear their own clothes when conveyed after conviction from Dublin to Derry, Irish Members imprisoned were stripped naked?

Mr. Jackson

*MR. JACKSON: I do not see how the remark of the hon. Member arises out of the question. I am asked as to what has happened since the Rule has been in force.

ADVANCES BY THE IRISH BOARD OF WORKS.

MR. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what sums are now available in the hands of the Board of Works for such advances as are authorised to be made to companies and occupiers of land by the 31st section of the Land Law (Ireland) Act of 1881?

SIR J. GORST: The amount now available is £680,000.

BELFAST POSTAL DELIVERY.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General why, since the acceleration of the arrival and delivery of the English mails in Belfast, there is no delivery of local letters outside a half mile radius from the General Post Office from the first delivery at 7 a.m. until the delivery at 4.30 p.m.; and why letters received from Londonderry and the North at the General Post Office at 11.15 a.m. are not delivered outside the half mile radius until 4.30 p.m.?

*SIR J. FERGUSON: The present delivery of letters at Belfast are at 7 a.m. (general); 10.20 a.m. (general); 12.30 p.m. (restricted); 4.15 (general); 8 p.m. (general). The 10.20 a.m. delivery includes local letters as well as the English and Scotch night mail letters via Holyhead, and Stranraer. The 12.30 p.m. delivery is restricted to the central portion of the town and letters, therefore, received at 11.15 a.m. for places outside that portion have hitherto been delivered at 4.15 p.m. A revision is now under consideration for making the 12.30 delivery general like the rest, and the above letters will then be distributed by it.

LONDONDERRY TELEGRAPHIC STAFF.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin County, S.) (for Mr. JUSTIN MCCARTHY, Londonderry): I beg to ask the Postmaster General why the increase of clerical force of three second-class telegraphists, sanctioned in July, 1891, in the Londonderry Telegraph Department, has not yet been carried out; whether complaints have reached him that the present staff is inadequate to do the work required of it; and whether the telegraphic business of the district suffers delay in consequence?

SIR J. FERGUSON: No such sanction was given in July, 1891, but I lately decided to add three to the staff in question, which will be done as soon as the necessary forms have been gone through. No complaints from the public of unsatisfactory service have reached me.

WOODFORD AND WHITEGATE POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.) (for Mr. McDERMOTT, Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to the improvement of the postal communication between Woodford and Whitegate, whether he is aware that the people of the district are of opinion that the additional cost of giving the extension required, would be amply covered by the increased number of letters which such extension would bring; and whether, considering the great inconvenience to the district of the present system, he will consider the desirability of giving the proposed extension a trial for at least one year?

SIR J. FERGUSON: I regret to say that the reports made to me show that the receipts would be altogether incommensurate with the cost, and I am therefore unable to give the service desired.

WRONGFUL ASSUMPTION OF "M.A." DEGREE.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor has been called to the public scandal which has been caused by its having recently become generally known in the neighbourhood of Ross that the Reverend Edward Burdett Hawkshaw, the Chairman of the Ross Bench of Justices, wrongfully assumed, during 18 years, the title and hood of a Master of Arts of Oriel College, Oxford, although he was in fact only a Bachelor of Arts, and so conducted the services, and administered the Sacraments of the Church; whether he is aware that the Bishop of Hereford discovered this upon the collation of the Reverend Edward Burdett Hawkshaw to the prebendal stall of Nonnington, in Hereford Cathedral, for which a Bachelor of Arts is not eligible, and compelled him to take the degree of Master of Arts; whether one of the canons of the Church prescribes the punishment of suspension for the offence of conducting the services and administering the Sacraments in a University hood of a higher degree than that which the clergyman possesses, and such an offence is also punishable under the statutes of the University of Oxford; and whether if, upon inquiry, these facts are found to be correct, the name of the Reverend Edward Burdett Hawkshaw will be removed from the Commission of the Peace?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information as to the various allegations in the question. I have drawn the attention of the Lord Chancellor to them, and I learn from him that he has caused inquiry to be made.

EDUCATION OF SOLDIERS' CHILDREN.

SIR T. ESMONDE for Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether the Queen's Regulations for 1881, which allowed a soldier, on conscientious grounds, to send his children to a certified efficient civil school instead of the regimental or garrison schools, have been altered this year, so as to deprive the Catholic soldiers and their children of religious liberty in the matter of education, and compel all warrant officers, non-commissioned officers, and men to send their children to the school of the corps or garrison, except where, "with a view to obtaining a higher class education," the children are permitted by the General Officer commanding to attend a civil school?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The Army Order referred to was issued two years ago, and it does require that soldiers shall send their children to the corps or garrison school. It was found that their going to civil schools did, to an appreciable amount, involve the risk of introducing infectious disease into barracks; but the main reason for the order was that, as soldiers frequently move from station to station, it was indispensable that their children should be educated on a uniform system. Army schools being all under one management secured this, while the latitude allowed to the managers of civil schools resulted in children taught in one school being frequently quite out of touch with the course in the school of another place. Army schools are altogether undenominational, and every facility is afforded for religious instruction being imparted by the ministers of the denomination to which the parents belong.

THE ENGLISH AND DUBLIN MAILS.

SIR T. ESMONDE (for Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will take into consideration the very serious inconvenience and loss resulting to the people of the towns of Castlefin, Killygordon, Ballybofey, and Stranorlar, in County Donegal, from the fact that the English and Dublin mails which arrive in Strabane at 10.45 a.m. are not despatched from that place till 5.20 p.m., although a train leaves Strabane at 11.20, calling at all the above-mentioned towns, and actually conveying mails to places beyond?

SIR J. FERGUSON: This matter has already been under consideration, and arrangements are being made for the establishment of a mail to the places named by the 11.20 a.m. train from Strabane.

THE SKENE SCHOOL BOARD.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the recent dismissal of the female teacher Miss Anderson, and the illegal appointment of the Chairman of the Board of Garlagie School, have created great dissatisfaction in the parish of Skene, Aberdeenshire; and whether the Scotch Education Department have received a petition, largely signed by ratepayers, protesting against recent proceedings in Garlagie School, and praying that the Department may end the difficulty by themselves appointing a new Chairman of the Board?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I understand that the recent dismissal of Miss Anderson, and the appointment of the Chairman of the Skene School Board, have been discussed in that parish. The Department have received a petition asking that another person than the present Chairman of the Board should be nominated as a member of the Board; and they have also received a petition from ratepayers in favour of the present Chairman continuing in office. As at present informed, I do not see that the case is one which calls for the interference of the Department.

POLYNESIAN LABOUR IN QUEENSLAND.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, pending the receipt of the Bill passed by the Queensland Legislature for allowing the re-introduction of South Sea island labour to that colony, Her Majesty's Government will secure that the traffic shall not be re-opened; whether he will engage that the Papers relating thereto shall be laid upon the Table of the House before the Royal Assent is given to the said Bill; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of Lord C. Scott, the Admiral of the Station, and that of Captain Davies, who has had a long experience in the Polynesian Islands?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Since the hon. Member put his question on the Paper the Secretary of State has telegraphed to the Governor to ask whether he had assented to the Bill, and whether it is in operation. If it has been assented to, Her Majesty has only the power of disallowing the Act which has become law. The Secretary of State has further telegraphed that he trusts that the Colonial Government, if it is practicable, will delay issuing the licences under the Act until he has received and considered the measure and the safeguards with which it is doubtless surrounded. The Reports of the naval officers mentioned in the question shall be given with other Papers bearing upon the subject. It may be satisfactory to the House that I should mention the fact that Polynesian labourers have been introduced under the existing regulations to Queensland in increasing numbers up to the beginning of last year, and I may state that in 1890, 2,459 labourers were so introduced, and that since the beginning of 1885 no case of kidnapping or of serious infringement of the regulations has, as far as we know, been brought under notice. It may, therefore, fairly be assumed that the regulations are sufficient if properly watched and enforced. And to this end the attention of both Her Majesty's Government and the Queensland Government will be steadily directed.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I wish to know whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman has been called to the statement which appeared in the Daily News of Saturday, stating that the Melbourne Trades Council had resolved to appeal to Her Majesty the Queen to veto the Bill recently passed by the Queensland Government, promoting the re-introduction of South Sea island labour into the colony?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: No, Sir; my attention has not been called to the statement.

POLICE CONSTABLES AS FIREMEN.

MR. SAMUEL HOARE (Norwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether an injury to a constable, while acting as a fireman, would be an injury received in the execution of his duty, so as to entitle him to a grant out of the Police Pension Fund, under the scale applicable to injuries received by a constable in the execution of his duty; and whether, if such is not the case, he will consider the hardship which may often arise, especially in the case of constables who are engaged on distinct terms to act from time to time as firemen?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am advised that except in cases where there is special provision on this subject in Local Acts—and there are many such Acts—a constable who is injured while acting as a fireman is not entitled to a grant out of the pension fund under the scale applicable to injuries received by a constable in the execution of his duty. With reference to the second paragraph of the question, my hon. Friend will bear in mind that a constable is still entitled to a pension or gratuity on the ordinary scale. He is, therefore, in a better position than a fireman, who is not a constable and who receives no pension except in cases where it is provided for in Local Acts.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION AT FENIT.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the nature of the wayleave which prevents the opening of a telegraph station at Fenit, County Kerry, which is the port of Tralee; whether he is aware that fishing boats coming into the bay laden with fish have to send foot messengers seven miles to Tralee to get the light railway to run down a train to take off their freights of fish, in consequence of which unsatisfactory arrangement these freights of fish often miss connection with the Great Southern and Western Railway, and are damaged and sometimes destroyed; and whether, in view of the fact that the telegraph can be either taken along the main road from Tralee to Fenit, or along the line of railway, and further that the guarantee required by the Post Office has been long since obtained, a telegraph office at Fenit will be opened at once?

SIR J. FERGUSON: The difficulty is to come to terms with the Railway Company for the attachment of the wires to their poles, but I hope that this will be got over. To erect new poles along the road would cost much more. I do not know the circumstances mentioned in the second paragraph, but I know that the telegraph is much wanted.

ARDFERT TELEGRAPH STATION.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what guarantee was required by the Post Office for the opening of the telegraph station at Ardfert, County Kerry; and whether the guarantors have ever been called upon to make good any deficiency in the receipts of that office?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Telegraph Office at Ardfert was established about 20 years ago. At that time the system of guarantees had not been introduced.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN KILDARE.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the cause of the delay in the erection of the labourers' cottages in the County Kildare portion of the Edenderry Union, the schemes for which have been approved and sanctioned more than two years since by the Privy Council?

*MR. JACKSON: The erection of 32 cottages in the Edenderry Union has been authorised. Of these two have been erected, and a tender has been accepted for the building of one more. The Guardians have repeatedly advertised for tenders for building the remainder of the cottages, but considered those received to be too high. New plans for the further contract will, in all probability, be considered on the 14th instant.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he will state to the House the terms of Reference to the Departmental Committee on the Ordnance Survey; and whether its Proceedings and Report will be made public?

\*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lancashire, Sleaford): The Departmental Committee to which the hon. Member refers has been appointed to inquire into a Report on the present condition of the Ordnance Survey, and especially to consider: (1) What steps should be taken to expedite the completion and publication of the new or revised one-inch map, with or without hills, of the British Isles; (2) what permanent arrangement should be made for the continuous revision and speedy publication of the maps ( $\frac{1}{250,000}$ , towns) 25 inches, six inches, and one inch scales; (3) whether the maps as at present issued satisfy the reasonable requirements of the public in regard to style of execution, form, information conveyed, and price; and whether any improvement can be made in the catalogue and indices. I propose to lay the Report and Proceedings of the Committee upon the Table for publication as a Parliamentary Paper.

MR. BUCHANAN: Will the management of the Survey and the character of the managing staff be included?

*MR. CHAPLIN: No, Sir.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): Does the inquiry extend to Ireland?

*MR. CHAPLIN: Yes.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, in reference to his statement on 22nd February last, he has now received the Report of the Departmental Committee appointed to inquire into the grievances of those employed in the Ordnance Survey, and will lay it upon the Table?

MR. FRANCIS EVANS (Southampton) had notice of the following question:—To ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Report of the Departmental Committee inquiring into the grievances of the Civil Servants of the Ordnance Survey has yet been completed; and, if so, whether the Report, together with the decision arrived at in relation thereto by the Board of Agriculture, will be laid upon the Table of the House before the Vote on the Estimates for the Survey comes under discussion?

*MR. CHAPLIN: I will answer the question of the hon. Member for Southampton at the same time. I have received the Report of the Departmental Committee to which the hon. Member refers, and the recommendations it contains are now under consideration. I hope to be able to announce the decision before the Vote for the Survey in the Estimates comes under discussion, and in the meantime I will lay the Report on the Table.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is aware of the dissatisfaction existing among Welsh scholars, geologists, and others, with regard to the inaccuracy and incompleteness of the place-names in the Ordnance Survey maps of Wales; and whether he will take steps to secure the aid and co-operation of Welsh scholars to ensure accuracy in the nomenclature of these maps?

*MR. CHAPLIN: I was not aware of the existence of the dissatisfaction to which the hon. Member refers, and I am informed that every Welsh name appearing on the Ordnance Survey maps has, as a matter of fact, received the sanction of a competent Welsh scholar. I am quite aware, however, of the difficult and delicate nature of the subject, and will endeavour to ascertain whether the existing arrangements are capable of improvement. The question, I think, might with advantage be considered by the Departmental Committee now sitting, and I will bring the matter under the consideration of that Committee.

GIBRALTAR SANITARY COMMISSION.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in expressing his willingness to make certain concessions to the Gibraltar ratepayers, the Secretary of State for the Colonies made those concessions dependent upon the ratepayers assenting to the Chairman of the Sanitary Board being appointed by the Governor, and to the office of Engineer to the Board being held by the Colonial Engineer, ex officio, until the new drainage and waterworks are completed?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Secretary of State informed the deputation of Gibraltar ratepayers that he was willing to make certain concessions on the understanding that further opposition to the recent Order in Council would be withdrawn; but that he could not agree to the repeal of the provisions of the Order vesting the appointment of the Chairman of the Sanitary Board in the Governor, and combining the offices of Colonial Engineer and Engineer to the Sanitary Commissioners. He intimated, however, that the question of the separation of those offices might, if thought necessary, be again brought forward after the completion of the new drainage and waterworks.

MR. CAUSTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Colonial Engineer at Gibraltar, when acting as Engineer to the Sanitary Commissioners, was in 1886 removed from the latter office by the Governor, which decision was approved and confirmed by the then Secretary of State; and whether he will state the reasons given for removing him from such office?

BARON H. DE WORMS: In 1886 the then Governor of Gibraltar recommended the separation of the two offices referred to, and his recommendation was approved by the then Secretary of State. The reasons assigned by the Governor were that, in his opinion, the duties of the two offices were rather conflicting, and their combination led to inconvenience, and that he was not satisfied with the manner in which the duties of Engineer to the Sanitary Commissioners were performed by the Colonial Engineer. These reasons have been fully reconsidered, and the Secretary of State has arrived at the present decision with the full concurrence of the present Governor, and in accordance with the recommendation of Major Tullock.

MR. M'LAGAN (Linlithgow): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will inform the House of the decision the Secretary of State arrived at, on the circumstances placed before him, with regard to the conduct of the official at present holding the post of Colonial Engineer at Gibraltar, which has on two occasions—1885 and 1890—been brought officially to the notice of the Secretary of State for the Colonies?

BARON H. DE WORMS: On the first of the two occasions referred to the Secretary of State, Lord Derby, arrived at the conclusion that a charge made against the officer in question, while acting in another capacity, had not been proved. On the second occasion the Secretary of State directed him to be reproved for an act of irregularity, not connected with his office and not derogatory to his character.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is a fact that, after the Colonial Estimates (Gibraltar) for 1892 were published for general information, a Supplementary Estimate was prepared but not made public, by which, among other things, the salary of the Colonial Secretary was increased; and whether the community of Gibraltar, which contributes nearly £60,000 a year by local taxation, has any voice in the expenditure thereof?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The salary of the Colonial Secretary was increased by direction of the Secretary of State from 23,060 pesetas to 25,000 pesetas—roughly £65—when the Estimates for 1892 were sanctioned, as he considered it desirable that the remuneration of that officer should be placed on a level with that of other officials at Gibraltar whose duties were not of so responsible a character. The revenue of Gibraltar derived from taxation, other than port dues, which are paid by the shipping, amounts to between £14,000 and £15,000 a year, of which a considerable part is paid by the garrison. The hon. Member has probably included in the £60,000 port dues, rents of Crown property, postal revenue, and other items which cannot properly be classed as taxation. The public expenditure is under the direct control of the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is a fact that a Government employee, on full pay of the active list, is also employed by the Anglo-Egyptian Bank in Gibraltar as manager of its Gibraltar Branch; and whether the circumstance has been previously brought to the notice of the Colonial Office, and what was the decision of the Secretary of State thereon?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The circumstance referred to was brought to the notice of the Secretary of State. The gentleman alluded to undertook the joint managership of the Branch of the Anglo-Egyptian Bank as an incident to the administration of a trust estate, and could not relieve himself of it without injury to those for whom he is trustee; and the Secretary of State, upon the strong recommendation of the Governor, decided in these circumstances to allow the arrangement to continue as a wholly exceptional case, by which the gentleman in question gives his services to the Bank after office hours.

THE CORK AND AMERICAN MAILS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is proposed by his Department to take any further steps to promote the acceleration of the Cork and American mails via Cork?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: As I have already stated, this matter will be re-considered along with other mail improvements which are desired in various parts of the country, and which were not provided for in the present Estimates because the expenses of the Department had already been largely increased.

DR. TANNER: Is it a fact that it is only a matter of £3,000?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is only a matter of a few thousands in the present case, but this case is joined to others.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Great Southern and Western Railway has expended upwards of £100,000 at Queenstown in the endeavour to provide proper accommodation for the landing of the mails at the railway. Seeing this is a matter of the greatest importance to Ireland will the Government endeavour to take steps to relieve the deadlock?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I cannot go further than I have done.

THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY AND ST. PANCRAS.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the Midland Railway Act (ch. xxxix.), 1889, which gives that Railway certain powers to acquire land in the Borough of St. Pancras, subject to a provision inserted (on representations made by the Home Office) placing restrictions on the Company in regard to displacing persons of the labouring classes; whether he is aware that, whilst large numbers of the inhabitants of the district have been evicted from their dwellings under this Act, to their inconvenience and to the consequent loss of the trade of the locality affected, no steps have up to the present been taken to re-construct artisans' dwellings under Clause 31 of this Act; and if he will cause inquiry to be made into the subject?

MR. MATTHEWS: Under the Midland Railway Act of 1889, to which the hon. Member refers, the Railway Company only acquired power in the parish of St. Pancras to take a portion of the churchyard, and the statements in the question are not relevant to proceedings under that Act in the parish of St. Pancras. By the Midland Railway Act of 1890 the Company did take powers to acquire houses in the parish of St. Pancras in the occupation of the labouring classes, but the Company have not cleared, or caused to be cleared, any of the houses referred to, and have done nothing, and will do nothing, in that direction pending the erection of artisans' dwellings. In accordance with the Act, the Company have for this purpose submitted a scheme which, after careful examination, I caused to be amended in certain particulars. Thus amended, the scheme has been submitted by the Company for my approval, and I have every hope that proceedings to give effect to it will be commenced at an early date. I am not aware of any circumstances calling for inquiry.

MR. WEBSTER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, from his reply, I understand rightly that all the clearances have been done by private individuals, and not by the Midland Railway Company?

MR. MATTHEWS: That is exactly what I intended to convey.

VOLUNTEERS AND HONORARY MEMBERSHIP OF CLUBS.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cocker-mouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the notices issued to the Volunteers attending the Easter Manœuvres in Chatham last month, stating—

“Volunteers in uniform will be made honorary members of the following Clubs during their visit on furnishing their names and rank to the respective Secretaries: Liberal Club, Castle Hill, Rochester; Conservative Club, Star Hill, Rochester; Workmen's Institute, Chatham; Reform Club, Military Road, Chatham”;

whether he is aware that large numbers of Volunteers entered the said Clubs, and were supplied with intoxicants, in many cases without giving any name or address; and whether the action of the said Clubs is a violation of the laws regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors?

MR. MATTHEWS: Even assuming the facts to be as stated in the question, I am unable to see that there has been any violation of the law in reference to the sale of intoxicating liquors.

SIR W. LAWSON: Are these Clubs allowed to sell to anyone?

MR. MATTHEWS: The question states, and I believe accurately, that Volunteers were made honorary members of the Clubs. That was undoubtedly a bonâ fide proceeding in this case. These honorary members are as much entitled to buy intoxicating liquors as are members of the Diplomatic Corps to buy a bottle of wine at the Athenæum.

MR. WEBSTER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that there are a large number of quasi Clubs in London where the entrance fee is purely nominal, and where the members entering are practically elected by the hall porter? Has the right hon. Gentleman any information as to these Clubs, and, in the interests of temperance, will he cause inquiry to be made?

MR. WINTERBOTHAM: Did the right hon. Gentleman quite grasp the fact that these honorary members were admitted without their names being submitted as honorary members? and does he really mean to compare that with the action of the Athenæum or any other London Clubs?

MR. MATTHEWS: Certainly the Volunteers in the Clubs were in uniform. I do not think it is within the range of practical possibility that a toper should provide himself with a uniform in order to get drunk.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): Is it possible for persons to be made honorary members of a Club without their names being inscribed in the books in some way?

MR. MATTHEWS: That is a question for the secretary of the Club.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Is it possible for any of these small Clubs to make the whole British Army members?

MR. MATTHEWS: I tried in my original answer to draw a distinction between a bona fide Club and nominal membership of bogus Clubs, such as those referred to by my hon. Friend behind me. The distinction is one of fact, and in some cases may not be very easy to draw, but in this case the Clubs were really within their right.

MR. WEBSTER: Has the right hon. Gentleman any means of inquiry as to the number of bogus Clubs at present existing in London?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have at various times made inquiry not only in London, but in other parts of the country. If the hon. Member will supply me with a satisfactory definition of bogus Clubs, I shall be extremely grateful to him.

SIR W. LAWSON: Would policemen in uniform be allowed to become honorary members?

PENSIONS TO MEDICAL OFFICERS.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the seven-sixtieths hitherto added to the pensions allowed to medical officers has been withdrawn; and, if so, from what date such change would come into effect?

*SIR J. GORST: In the case of all appointments made to professional offices in the Civil Service since 30th November, 1888, the Treasury Minutes entitling the holders to retired allowances above the rate of one-sixtieth of the salary for each complete year of service have been suspended; and if Parliament should take away the power to grant such special rates of pension, no officer appointed since the date named will receive on retirement the benefit of additional years.

JUDGMENT SUMMONSES.

MR. HARRISON: I beg to ask the Attorney General what number of judgment summonses were heard before His Honour Judge Abdy at Waltham Abbey on Wednesday, 20th April, and what number of committals were made, and the reasons for each committal, and what time was occupied by the business; whether he is aware that a carpenter named Field was committed by the Judge for six weeks unless the whole of the debt, over £2, was paid in 14 days, although the evidence showed that Field had been out of work, and was still out of work at the time of hearing, and what evidence, if any, there was of means; whether his attention has also been drawn to the case of a debtor named Matthews, a machinist at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield, who was committed for six weeks in default of paying two instalments on a judgment order amounting to £4, although he had paid £2 on such order, and during the month of March it was proved that Matthews' wages since such payment of £2 were £1, 15s., 16s., 6s., and an additional sum of 12s.; whether he is aware that Matthews' debt was for costs in a libel action, in which he had succeeded in getting a verdict of £100 and costs against the publisher of such libel, but had failed against the printer, and that Matthews had failed to get a farthing either of such damages or costs; and on what grounds such a heavy order was made against Matthews, and the reasons for his committal, or what evidence of means was given other than those stated?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir B. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I am informed by the learned County Court Judge that on the occasion in question there were four judgment summonses for hearing, occupying about twenty minutes. In two of the cases the defendants bore the names mentioned in the hon. Member's question, and one of them had been previously heard by the learned Judge, on which occasion both parties had been represented by professional advisers. In both the cases the learned Judge was satisfied by the evidence before him that the defendants had had, since the date of the judgments, means with which they might have satisfied the debts, but had neglected to do so.

EXCHANGE OF CONSOLS FOR LAND STOCK.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the National Debt Commissioners have been authorised by the Treasury to give Consols in exchange for Land Stock to the extent of five millions; and, if so, when the exchange will be made?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Treasury have authorised the National Debt Commissioners to give Consols in exchange for Land Stock to the amount of five millions. The exchange will be made from time to time whenever Stock is presented. I regret to say, though nearly half a million of advances have been applied for under the Act of 1891, there is no immediate chance of Land Stock being required unless special machinery is provided for clearing away the arrears under the Ashbourne Act, which are still outstanding.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Land Stock is to be at the rate of 100 or 96 according to legal decision?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Is it proposed to take any steps to bring up those arrears under the Ashbourne Act? I understand that there are cases as far back as 1887 which have not yet been settled?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As to the question asked by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. T. M. Healy) notice must be given, as I am not familiar with the legal point raised. With regard to the other question submitted by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. T. W. Russell), my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant is engaged considering what steps can be taken to deal with this matter.

VOL. IV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman say at what rate the National Debt Commissioners will treat the Stock which an Irish Judge said is only worth 96?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The learned Judge would not say so to-day. To-day the price of Consols is 97, not 96. Whatever the price is, Stock for Stock is the basis on which exchange will take place. The arrangement is made perfectly clear by the Act.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Are we to understand, then, that for 100 only 96 or 97 are to be given?

*MR. GOSCHEN: A nominal £100 of Consols will be given for a nominal £100 of Land Stock.

THE COMMITTEE ON PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING.

MR. MORTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has yet arranged to appoint the Committee to consider the question of Parliamentary reporting?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope the Committee will be appointed in a day or two.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND CONVENTION.

MR. FRANCIS EVANS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table the Correspondence which has passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Newfoundland, respecting the proposed Convention recently agreed to between the Governments of the United States and of Newfoundland?

BARON H. DE WORMS (who replied): The Report will be issued as soon as possible.

MR. FRANCIS EVANS: Arising out of that question, I beg to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman can inform me if the Convention between the Newfoundland Government and the United States has received the assent of Her Majesty's Government?

BARON H. DE WORMS: That is a question for the Foreign Office.

MR. FRANCIS EVANS: I give notice that I shall put the question down to-morrow.

BOROUGH BOUNDARIES.

MR. W. H. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any Petitions have been presented under the Municipal Corporations Acts, 1859 and 1882, for the alteration of the number or boundaries of the wards of a borough; and, if so, whether he can state the names of the boroughs by which such Petitions have been presented?

MR. MATTHEWS: I think my hon. Friend will find the information he desires in the Index to the Statutory Rules and Orders in force in January, 1891.

POLICE ON SIR GEORGE COLTHURST'S ESTATE.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that the police, hitherto stationed in the old barracks on the estate of Sir George Colthurst, Baronet, in Ballyvourneg, County Cork, have been removed from thence to a new hut at Ballymakeery, outside the estate; and, if so, for what reason?

*MR. JACKSON: The Constabulary authorities report that the change mentioned in the question has been rendered necessary owing to the barracks being damp and unhealthy. I understand there is no other house available.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the case that the police have been removed in consequence of being boycotted by Mr. Jeremiah Hegarty, of Millstreet, who refused to give them the right to take turf on the estate?

*MR. JACKSON: I think the police are well able to take care of themselves.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the fact that these policemen, who have been taking charge of the office of Mr. Hegarty, have repeatedly requested the Dublin Castle authorities to relieve them from such duties on account of the friction existing between them and Mr. Hegarty.

CORK LUNATIC ASYLUM.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, having considered the attitude assumed by the Governors of the Cork Lunatic Asylum against the Board of Control and against the decision given as regards visiting physicians, he purposes taking any steps to prevent further trouble in the interests of the Institution in question?

*MR. JACKSON: The Board of Control report that every effort has been made to discharge the duties which are by law cast upon them without giving any reasonable cause for friction with the Governors of the Cork Asylum.

DR. TANNER: Will any steps be taken?

*MR. JACKSON: I think not.

POLICEMEN AND THEIR VOTES.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Regulations of the Metropolitan Police Force prohibit constables from recording their votes in Vestry or other elections while on duty; whether constables were punished recently for voting in a Vestry election at Walthamstow, although they were on duty in the immediate vicinity of the polling station, and were not therefore absent from their beat; and whether he will cause such an alteration of the Police Regulations as will allow all constables entitled to the franchise to exercise it without fear of punishment?

MR. MATTHEWS: The answer to the first and second paragraphs of the question is in the negative. Circumstances might arise which would prevent constables recording their votes at the polling station at which they would be entitled to vote, but in such cases the constables have the benefit of the 2nd section of the Police Disability Removal Act of 1887. As there are no Police Regulations prohibiting constables from voting while on duty, and as no constable or constables have been punished for voting, no action on my part is necessary.

ENGLISH COLLEGE GRANTS.

SIR J. LUBBOCK: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government intend to propose any additional grant this year to the English Colleges?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I regret that the margin of revenue over expenditure in the present year does not permit me to propose any addition to the grant for the English Colleges. I hope, however, that another year it may be possible to make an addition to the grants.

MR. JOSEPH BOLTON (Stirling): Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether an equivalent increase will be made to the Scotch Colleges?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I do not think that the footing of the Scotch Colleges is analogous to that of the English.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask whether the ordinary business of the House will be suspended to-night at eleven o'clock in order to afford an opportunity for the discussion of the various Motions with regard to the Scotch University Commission?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am not aware that there has been any change since my last answer to a question on this subject. What I said was that I quite recognised the desirability of, if possible, commencing the discussion at an earlier hour than twelve, but I could not promise to do so unless we made good progress with the Small Holdings Bill. If we do that, I shall be prepared to move the adjournment of the Committee soon after eleven o'clock. But the hon. Gentleman will see that the Government have only power over the Government Orders of the Day; and that, unless there be an understanding that the forty odd Bills down in the names of private Members should not be taken, there will be an almost insuperable difficulty in the way.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): There might have been a notice of Motion on the Paper to the effect that the subject of these Ordinances be taken after the first Order of the Day, because it is absurd to suppose that we can run the gauntlet of 66 Orders of the Day with any prospect of getting to the discussion of the Scotch Universities question after twelve o'clock. I therefore appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to say whether he could not now make some other arrangement?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If good progress is made with the Small Holdings Bill I should be willing to stop that Bill on an Evening Sitting in order that the Scotch Universities question may be discussed. That, however, seems a course hardly practicable to-night. But perhaps hon. Members would prefer a brief discussion at the Morning Sitting to-morrow, and in that case we might adjourn consideration of the Small Holdings Bill at twenty to six o'clock. There would, in that case, be a discussion of at least an hour.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): On this subject I would suggest that it is possible, with the consent of the House, to now make a Motion postponing other Orders in favour of this. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you will tell me whether I am in order?

MR. SPEAKER: If it is the general wish of the House the First Lord of the Treasury can doubtless make such a Motion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, with the consent of the House, I shall be glad to move—

"That the several Notices of Motion relating to the Scottish Universities Commission Ordinances have precedence this day of all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion subsequent to the first Order of the Day."

Motion agreed to.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Do we understand that the arrangement holds good that as soon as the Small Holdings Bill is through Committee the Irish Local Government Bill will be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is the view of the Government. The only conceivable doubt is with reference to the Budget proposals, which have been postponed partly because my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) was not able to be in his place, and partly because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) could not make it convenient to be present at the beginning of this week. With that exception the Order will stand as the hon. Gentleman has suggested.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Irish Education Bill will follow the Irish Local Government Bill?

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I should like to ask whether Supply will be taken this Session?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir, I hope so. As to the Education Bill, I can give no answer respecting that until we see how we are getting on with the Bills I have already mentioned.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

SMALL AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.—(No. 183.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 11th April.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I beg to propose the following Amendment:—

In page 1, after line 13, insert—"And the Local Government Board may, by a Provisional Order, authorise a County Council to take compulsorily any land referred to in such Order for any term not exceeding 99 years, at a rent and subject to terms and conditions to be determined in case of difference by arbitration in the manner prescribed for determining a question of disputed compensation by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same, which shall apply as if such compulsory taking for a term of years were a purchase of land otherwise than by agreement."

I do not propose to detain the House by making a long addition to what I had an opportunity of saying the other night. I desire now to call the attention of the House to the fact that this Amendment is not new. It has already been adopted in the Crofters Act and in an Irish Act passed in 1875 by a Conservative Government. Sir, we hear now a good deal about equal laws for England, Ireland, and Scotland. Well, I claim the same advantages for the agricultural classes of this country as are enjoyed by the Irish and the Scotch. Looking back to the Debate on the Allotments

Act, when I moved a similar Amendment to this, I find the chief objection taken to it was that it would be an injustice to the landlord. I differ entirely from that view. Instead of doing injustice to landlords, I believe that this Amendment would be welcomed by them. I admit at once that an injustice might be done to the landlord if it was proposed by compulsion to take a piece out of the centre of his estate, thereby, perhaps, ruining the amenities of that estate and reducing its value in the market. But, Sir, this Amendment proposes to do nothing of the kind. It simply proposes that the landlord shall do what in his pecuniary interest he is bound to do. He is bound to let his estate to someone, and this Amendment proposes that he shall let it to a good tenant—namely, the County Council, for the purpose of carrying out the objects of this Act. Well, Sir, the landlord can, by letting his estate to the County Council, introduce into the covenants provisions which may protect his rights; and I think, therefore, it is idle to object to such a very reasonable proposition as this on the ground that it would do any injustice to him. In my Amendment I propose that the maximum term shall be 99 years, but I am perfectly willing to give way on that point, and agree to reduce the maximum term to 40 or 50 years. There is no limitation in my Amendment to the ground to be taken, but I am ready to consent to any such limitation. My sole object is to make the Bill, if possible, of some use. The President of the Board of Agriculture (Mr. Chaplin), when he introduced this Bill, said it was a tentative measure. Surely, if that is the case, it would be better to try an experiment in a limited way by taking land on lease in the first instance; and, if that succeeds, then will be the time to introduce compulsory powers for the purchase of land outright. I believe, if the Government will only agree to this Amendment, this Bill may be of some practical use, instead of, as I consider it in its present condition, mere waste paper.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 13, after the word "holdings," to insert the words—"And the Local Government Board may, by a Provisional Order, authorise a County Council to take compulorily any land referred to in such Order for any term not exceeding ninety-nine years, at a rent and subject to terms and conditions to be determined in case of difference by arbitration in the manner prescribed for determining a question of disputed compensation by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same which shall apply as if such compulsory taking for a term of years were a purchase of land otherwise than by agreement."—(Mr. Seale-Hayne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Probably the hon. Member is aware that the Committee has already discussed the question of compulsory purchase, and has negatived the proposal. There is no need, therefore, to examine that subject again in detail. I cannot see that the Crofters Act and the Irish Act, to which the hon. Member has referred, afford any precedent whatever in support of this Amendment, which is one the Government are unable to agree to. It is obvious that its effect would be to place the landlord at a great disadvantage if he should desire to realise his property.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I hope the Committee will not refuse to accept the present proposal. It is of less magnitude than the previous one, and can be carried out without serious inconvenience to the owners of land generally. If it were proposed to give the County Councils power to purchase land compulsorily, it might be argued that they would render themselves liable for future contingencies for which future generations might refuse to be held accountable; but in a proposal of this kind, limited for 99 years, or for 40 or 50 years if the Committee wishes, the argument does not apply to the same extent. I do not see how the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman would meet those cases in which land in different parishes is in the hands of one man, who is either unwilling or unable to sell in spite of Lord Cairns' Act, or of any Act of a similar kind. There may be a difficulty in the case of such an owner, either in regard to his family or on account of his trustees, which might render it impossible for him to sell his land to the County Council. In such a case I think the landlord would welcome a provision of the kind now proposed.

*COLONEL E Y R E (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough): I object to any proposal which directly or indirectly introduces the principle of compulsion. Hon. Members might, by referring to a book in the library of the House, see that out of 1,100,000 owners of land in England there are 850,000 persons holding less than one acre, and if they still further investigated the Return in question they would find that, in Lincolnshire—where I have the honour to represent a Division—there are no less than 30,000 holders of land, 15,000 holding from one to ten acres, and 10,000 holding from ten to fifty acres; and in one ringed fence in part of the Division out of 50,000 acres there is only one estate of 3,000 acres, the remaining 47,000 acres being in the hands of small owners and occupiers, men who, without the assistance of the State, have been enabled to purchase their own small holdings. I can assure hon. Gentlemen opposite that the result in my Division of the attempt to introduce the idea of compulsion has been to consolidate the votes in my interest, and I can safely say that the same feeling is spreading throughout the county of Lincolnshire, the reason being that the introduction of the principle of compulsion creates a feeling of insecurity. It was only the other day that an hon. Member who represents a Division of Northampton narrated to me the following incident: At one of his meetings a man suggested that a certain field was wanted for the agricultural labourers, and that it should be taken by compulsion. The owner who was present jumped up and said, "I brought up a family on this field, which I purchased myself, and I do not see what right any one has to turn me out of it." Well, what affects the small owner affects the large owner. In one town in my Division, representing 5,000 acres, there are no less than 260 owners and occupiers, of whom 160 are owners, and the average ownership, or "take," is something like 30 to 40 acres of land. If the principle of compulsion were inserted in this Bill, any man from any part of the world could come and take up a lodging in the town or village and claim that these small holders should have their land taken from them. But, Mr. Courtney, there is another point which seems to me of importance. Will not the security of investments in land be affected if it is known that the County Council may take any portion of land over any part of the estate without consulting the mortgagee? Who are these mortgagees? Rich as well as poor men. Take the first class. Nearly 50 per cent. of the securities of the Life Assurance Companies is in mortgages on land, directly or indirectly through Land Improvement Companies. Let us go a step further, and take the Friendly Societies, and in particular the Manchester Order of Odd-fellows, with a capital of £7,500,000. More than half of that amount, which is the hard-earned savings of the working classes, is invested as mortgages on land. There are also schools, hospitals, charities, and trust money, all of which are affected by the security or insecurity of land. If their land is to be taken compulsorily, and the value of it thereby diminished, I scarcely think that the working classes throughout the country, who are members of those societies, will appreciate the efforts of hon. Members opposite. I merely mention these facts, because I consider them to be of considerable importance in the discussion of this matter; and I know, at the same time, from letters I have received, that I am speaking in the interest of a large number of small holders in my Division.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I think the hon. Member need not be alarmed at the prospect of small holdings being taken for the purpose of creating small holdings. In that part of Lincolnshire represented by the hon. Member (Colonel Eyre) there are a large number of small holdings. But that is an exceptional case.

COLONEL EYRE: Small holdings exist all over England.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I contend that the state of things in the Division represented by my hon. Friend is exceptional, and that in a great portion of England large ownership of land is the rule. In a great number of districts it is totally impossible for small owners to obtain land by purchase. My own belief is that in nearly half the rural parishes of England the land in each parish belongs substantially to a single owner. That is the conclusion I have arrived at after careful consideration, and it is in these cases that the Bill will operate to the best advantage, and it will be precisely in these cases where there will be the greatest difficulty in getting land for the purposes of this Bill. Now, the House has refused to give compulsory power to purchase in fee, which I should have much preferred to the present proposal. We have therefore to fall back on something less than that, and I think it would be better that there should be included in the Bill power to take land for 99 years than that there should be no compulsion at all, and for that reason I shall support the hon. Member's proposal.

(5.0.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): The hon. Gentleman who moved this Amendment (Mr. Seale-Hayne), in introducing his remarks, stated that in the absence of the present Amendment the Bill would be nothing more than waste paper. My opinion is that, whatever may be the value of the Bill as it stands, this Amendment is worse than useless. The compulsory leasing of land will destroy the whole character of the Bill and make it inoperative, and, indeed, make it so unpopular with the ratepayers on account of the risks involved that it would be practically a dead letter. Suppose this Amendment were adopted, what would it mean? In the first place, there must be a valuation and the law costs therein involved; and then the Local Authority, which represents the ratepayers, would obtain possession of the land, with all the costs of compulsory acquisition, for a term of fifty, sixty, or, it may be, ninety-nine years. The result would be that a Local Authority might become responsible for large tracts of land—that is, for the payments under the lease, and at the same time have no security that the rents would be paid, or, indeed, that the land would not be thrown on their hands. Then, again, with respect to buildings, the proposal would put an end to all possibility of the small holder having any buildings on his land, for, of course, the Local Authority, under a forty or fifty years' lease, cannot put up the buildings, knowing that at the end of the lease they would simply go into the hands of the landlord, and the tenant will not put up buildings for the same reason. In fact, what is being advocated now has all the evils of the leasehold system, which I thought was regarded with feelings of aversion by hon. Members on this side of the House. But another difficulty presents itself. Suppose the Local Authority acquires five hundred acres on lease, the land will have to be adapted to the small tenants; there will have to be a water supply, and various other expenses will necessarily be incurred. What will happen at the end of the forty or fifty years, when the lease expires? Will the landlord require that the land shall be put back in the same condition as it was when he leased it, or will the Local Authority simply have to lose all outlay made upon the land, and the tenant have to sacrifice his proportion in the way of what he has put into the land? I venture to say, in view of the expense that would be involved in acquiring land under this clause, and looking at the insecurity in the matter of compensation for improvements, and looking at the other drawbacks, that the clause would be a dead letter, and no Local Authority would be permitted by the ratepayers to involve itself in the enormous liability to loss this leasehold system would involve. The principle of this Bill is to create occupying owners of the land, and I hope the Government will stick to this principle. On the other hand, there is an attempt to turn this into a Bill for creating small tenants, and I hope the Government will not make this their leading idea, but will resist the Amendment, which I regard as most damaging to the main intention of the Bill.

(5.6.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I agree with the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) in thinking that the leasehold system is a very unfortunate one, and I think it would be a deplorable thing if that system were introduced into agricultural holdings. But the Amendment now before the House has been proposed only to facilitate the letting of land on lease because we are unable to get facilities for taking the land in fee, and my hon. Friend's objections are valid to a certain extent, but only to a certain extent. The defect does not lie in the object of the Mover of the Amendment (Mr. Seale-Hayne), but in the unfortunate obstinacy of the Government, who refuse to give facilities for the compulsory acquisition of the freehold of the land. But I do not think this Amendment can be set aside, for that reason, and I shall vote for it. The hon. Member for Bordesley says that the task will be thrown upon the Local Authority of ascertaining the value of the fee simple; but the same task would be thrown upon the Local Authority if they were to buy the fee simple. Then he says that buildings will not be erected on the land under the leasehold system by the tenants. Buildings are now erected under the leasehold system of 99 years, and even a shorter term. It is deplorable, no doubt, that the tenants cannot get better tenure; but they are obliged to content themselves with the best they can get. The main justification of this Amendment is that in the course of a very few years this Bill will be made of value by having inserted the compulsory clauses which are now omitted. And whether that is done by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian or the Member for West Birmingham, whichever it may be that will dictate the course of policy in the near future—for I believe they are both agreed on the principle of compulsion—it is desirable that, in the interval between the present time and the insertion of these compulsory powers, we should have the power of leasing land, and the leaseholders will then very easily be turned into freeholders.

(5.10.) MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): This Amendment raises two questions of the highest importance, but it raises them in a most inconvenient way. The two questions are whether there shall be compulsion in the application of the provisions of this Bill, and whether there should be leasing as well as, or instead of, the creation of absolute ownership. As regards the principle of compulsion, it appears to me that the House has already decided that question, because all of us agree that if compulsion is to be employed at all, it would be much better to employ it in creating owner-ships than in creating leasehold tenancies. And, as the House has decided against compulsion in the former case à fortiori, it will so decide in this instance, and, in my opinion, will rightly decide. I would say to my hon. and learned Friend behind me (Mr. Reid), who anticipates, as I think I am a little inclined to do myself, that in the course of a few years the objections to compulsion will die away, and that some form of compulsion will be introduced, that his argument will not be answered by introducing now the inferior form of compulsion for leases. I am well aware that the former proposal was for the introduction of compulsion for the very important purpose of creating freeholds, and what this Amendment does is to raise the question in another form; but, having settled once the issue of compulsion, I think the majority of the House will have no doubt as to what course it ought to take. But I am very sorry that the Amendment is not moved in a form in which the House might have come to a decision upon it, as undoubtedly it contains another point quite separate and apart from compulsion, which is of the very greatest importance—namely, whether, as I have said, small holdings are to be created in the shape of tenancies as well as in the shape of owner-ships. I must say it appears to me that there is a good deal of confusion on this point amongst hon. and right hon. Members on this side of the House. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian is not here.

A right hon. GENTLEMAN: He will be here.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am glad of that, because the other night when he was speaking on the subject of compulsion he also spoke of leases, and he appealed to me saying he thought I might agree with him on that subject. I said I did not think I agreed with him at all; but I have come to the conclusion since, partly from having had a number of conversations with him, either that he did not explain very clearly what he meant, or that I was not intelligent enough to understand it. I now understand that what my right hon. Friend wishes is to introduce into this Bill, in addition to the provisions that are already there, provisions for enabling the Local Authority after it has obtained possession of the land to be let on perpetual feu. All I can say is that to that principle I should give my adherence.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman himself has said this discussion is raised in a most inconvenient form. The question is the acquisition of land by the County Council, and not what is to be done by the County Council in respect of the land which has been obtained. The discussion on that point will arise on Clause 3. It will be well that this discussion should keep to the point at issue.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE: I did not raise this discussion.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I agree, Mr. Courtney, as to the inconvenience; but I must point out how I think my remarks are in order and arise naturally out of the Amendment in its present form. It declares that the County Council shall have power to obtain land on lease for 99 years, or on periods of less than 99 years; consequently it is perfectly evident that, having obtained the land only on lease, it must let it on lease, and cannot sell it. If no shorter term than 99 years were mentioned it would be impossible for the County Council to sell to the small holders. Consequently, the whole question of leasing arises on this Amendment. I was saying that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was for compulsory feu, and that, I need not say, is not a question which arises on this Amendment, because this must be restricted to leasing and letting for a less term than 99 years. But there is another point on which we are in some doubt, and that is what amount of land is to be so leased. Does the hon. Member mean that the terms of his Amendment shall apply to all holdings, between one acre and fifty acres, this being the general limit of the Bill? If he intends only to apply this to small quantities of less than fifty acres, then I think the Bill already goes a long way to meet him, because it provides that the County Council shall have power to lease land up to ten acres. Therefore the only point between us would be whether that power should be extended up to fifty acres. That is the point that is raised by the Amendment. Is it desirable in this Bill to give power to the County Authorities to lease land in any quantity up to fifty acres, either on annual tenancies or on any term up to 99 years? This is a subject which was carefully considered by the Committee of which the hon. Gentleman himself was a member, and, unless I am very much mistaken, he voted in a sense which I should say was inconsistent with his present Amendment. The Committee came to the conclusion that if any Bill were to be brought in with these large provisions for creating small tenancies, one great object of the whole of this legislation would be entirely lost sight of—namely, the creation of a peasant proprietary. And, unless you get that, you lose entirely that sentimental feeling of possession which induces a man to put more work and more money into the land which is actually his own than he will into land which is not actually his own, which never will be his own, and which he only leases for a term of years. I would urge upon the House the importance of that consideration in this matter. You cannot let the land to these small holders at a price as low as the landlord can let it now, because if the landlord is willing to let at all, he is willing to let at two per cent. on his outlay; but if you are going to buy the land and then borrow money at 3 or 3½ per cent., and incur the various responsibilities which necessarily follow, you will have to let at a rate equivalent to 4 per cent. The only inducement to the small holder is that under this Bill he will be the actual owner of his land, and as the owner he can afford to put much more labour and energy into the land than he could afford to do if he were paying 4 per cent., and can make it pay much better. All that you might get in the shape of small ownerships you will lose entirely if you adopt a plan of small tenants. Another thing which was touched upon by my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Jesse Collings) is the enormous increase of risk to the ratepayers if you substitute tenancies of this kind for ownerships. Is it not perfectly certain that there will be fluctuations in seasons and prices, and periodically times will be bad? How is a popularly representative Local Authority to resist the pressure that will be brought to bear on it under these circumstances for a reduction of the rent? At such times the landlords will be reducing their rents; at times of pressure they invariably do reduce their rents, and if they are not compelled to do so they do so voluntarily. The Local Authority will be under compulsion to reduce the rents, and the example of the contiguous landlords will be brought to bear upon them to enforce the argument for reduction. Under these circumstances, and as a Local Authority will never be able to raise the rents, it is absolutely impossible that a transaction of this kind can be carried on without loss to the ratepayers. Perhaps you may be willing to face this; but the moment it becomes evident to Local Authorities that they cannot carry out the Bill without a loss of this kind, from that time they will cease to carry it out at all, and unless you are going to compel the Local Authorities to buy land, no Local Authority in the Kingdom will undertake any transactions under this Bill. Then we must look at the important question of improvements. If you make a small tenant the owner of the land, you get rid at once of all those complicated questions of tenants' improvements which must arise if he is to become a temporary occupier only. Although this House has been trying for a great number of years to arrange for some satisfactory scheme of compensation for improvements, I believe by common consent, it has failed, and I believe it always will fail. There is no satisfactory compensation for improvements possible, except the increased value a man may obtain on the sale of the land if he is himself the owner. That is another source of difficulty you are putting in the way of the creation of small holdings if you adopt a system of tenancies instead of ownerships. Then the question of buildings was referred to. I do not lay much stress upon that; but, at the same time I believe that where a man is the absolute owner of the land, and has no landlord to consult, there is a probability that he will put up buildings, which, although they will not be as good as the landlord's, will be sufficient for the purpose of the tenant, and from time to time they will be improved; and, unless you leave the responsibility of providing these buildings to the tenant, the expense to the Local Authority of providing them will so enormously increase the risk, that there, again, you will almost make it prohibitory. The Amendment proposes that the Local Authority should have power to lease for any term less than 99 years, and my hon. and learned Friend behind me (Mr. Reid) said there were numberless cases in which persons had put up buildings on land which was held for 99 years. But that is assuming that the maximum term will always be the minimum term.

MR. R. T. REID: I have known buildings put up on much less than 99 years' lease.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have known cases of forty years, and one case of 21 years, but I think that is an uncommon state of things. I am sure my hon. and learned Friend will agree with me, that if the lease is to be for a short term, say 21 years, there would be much more difficulty in the way of the tenant putting up the necessary buildings than if he were the absolute owner. I put before the Committee the objections which struck me as insuperable to the ideas contained in the Amendment. A great number of these objections, probably all of them, would not apply to such a proposal as I understand might be made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian. A proposal for a perpetual feu is, of course, a proposal for what is equivalent to a perpetual freehold. There are some advantages in favour of such a system, but I will not discuss them now. I see, also, some disadvantages, and I want to call the attention of hon. Members on this side of the House to the fact that it is not upon that we are voting now. If we must vote against this Amendment, we can vote against it without committing ourselves in any way to a general objection to the principle of a perpetual quit rent or feu; and we naturally object to the proposal in the Amendment, which, in its present form, will be absolutely unworkable.

*(5.25.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I hope the Member for Devon (Mr. Seale-Hayne) will go to a Division, for now we have heard the Members for Bordesley and West Birmingham we understand what we are going to vote about. I will not follow the right hon. Gentleman into the question of what is to be done with the land when it has been obtained; first, because I prefer to follow your ruling, Mr. Courtney, and not his; and, secondly, because I believe it will be very much more convenient to deal with that subject under Clause 3. This Amendment aims solely at giving Local Authorities another means of obtaining land necessarily only for letting purposes. The hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) said that he looked upon this Bill mainly and chiefly as an ownership Bill. We do not. Hon. Members who are going to vote against this Amendment regard this as a Bill mainly for the purpose of creating a yeoman farmer class. We look upon it, if it is to be of any value at all, chiefly as a means for allowing the Local Authorities to obtain land for the labourers, and this is a question we shall hear more about. The labourer does not generally want to buy the land. He cannot do it; he has not got the money to do it. He has told you so at your Congresses over and over again. If there are a few who are able to do it, by all manner of means let them become yeomen farmers. I know the agricultural labourers of the West Country, and they are not able to buy; but many of them are anxious to acquire land as tenants at a fair price and a fair tenure, and to put their little capital and their little savings into the land. The Member for Bordesley has stated the great difference of view between us quite accurately and fairly; and I am going into the opposite Lobby to him because I believe the labourers want to be tenants and not owners. This Amendment merely proposes an extra alternative. You do not prevent a County Council from buying land from a willing landlord; but there are many landlords in England who are unable or unwilling to sell their land because of the tenure, or because of the conditions of ownership, who may be perfectly willing to let land to the County Council on lease for 50 years, and they may be willing to insert clauses to give fair compensation for improvements, which, of course, if they are honest men, they ought to be anxious enough to do. The Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) spoke about the difficulties of estimating this compensation. That is, no doubt, a very vital question, but I do not think it arises on this clause. I could tell this House, if I were in order, of land sold last week in the Eastern Division of Gloucestershire, where the rent has been run up from £3 to £10 per acre, and is now sold by auction over the heads of the tenants, who have no claim for compensation or prolonged possession. If this Bill leaves the House without some better security for compensation than is suggested by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, there will be very little encouragement for these poor labourers to put their hearts into the land. I also differ entirely from the right hon. Gentleman's statement that people can get land in the open market from willing landlords at a rental based upon a 2 per cent. profit on the landlord's capital. If that is what prevails in the neighbourhood of Birmingham I am very glad to hear it. I am well aware that many large farms are let, in certain districts, at an equivalent to 2 or 2½ per cent.; but I am aware of no district where landlords, however benevolent and well-disposed, are willing to let land in small lots to labourers at two per cent. on its value. I think it will be much better, therefore, for the County Councils to get this land, in many districts at prices which will give the landlords three per cent., on long leases, and the labourers will only be too glad to pay four per cent. to the County Council. This would avoid all risk to the ratepayers, and create a sinking fund, if you like, for the possible ultimate purchase of the land. We vote for this Amendment because it gives an extra alternative to the Local Authority for acquiring land for letting in small portions, and we vote against the view of the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) that this is a Bill for creating yeoman farmers and owners only.

(5.32.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): I feel very much, in conformity with what has dropped from the Chair, as to there being an inconvenience in discussing together two questions which are quite distinct, and each of which deals with a subject of sufficient magnitude to deserve separate attention. At the same time, after the remarks of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), I admit, when it is proposed to give a certain power to the Local Authorities to acquire land upon leases not exceeding 99 years, we cannot avoid in some degree taking into consideration the question whether, when they have got that land they can find useful employment for it? Now, Sir, my position is this. The Mover of this Amendment, I should think, in the abstract, is not at all satisfied with his own Amendment; that is to say, he is not satisfied with the limited sphere in which he, and I, and all of us are obliged to act. We wish to give powers under which the Local Authority would be able to make much more efficient arrangements; but being cribbed, cabined, and confined as we are, we are bound to make the best of the situation. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has made a concession, and an important concession, in promising when we reach the proper portion of the Bill to introduce the principle of renting land. That I admit to be a concession which we ought to welcome, and therefore the question I have to ask myself is, not whether the Amendment of my hon. Friend does all that can be desired. There I agree with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham that the arrangements that can be made under this Bill by the Local Authority would be very imperfect arrangements, but still they will be worth having, and I am so convinced that my hon. Friend is right about the unpreparedness of the labourers to pay down capital sums as a general rule, that every alternative to that is to me welcome even within the narrowest limits. I will take leave to make one comment by way of criticism on the remarks of my hon. Friend who has just sat down, and that is this. He said that the labourer has no general anxiety to become a proprietor, he wants to get the use of the land, but not as a proprietor, evidently because, in my hon. Friend's view, that becoming proprietor involves paying down a capital sum which he has not got in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of one thousand. Yes; but there is one form in which, if we were in a position to give it, he would be glad to become a virtual proprietor, that is under the form of freeing the land, but that is out of our power. We look to this Bill as an interim Bill, and we accept it in the hope of enlargement and improvement in the future. But, undoubtedly, when I consider the difficulties in the way of bringing the farm labourer into contact with the land, into a use of the land for his own profit—which is the object we all have in view—I do accept every method which opens to him a door, even though it be a wicket door, and as, undoubtedly, I think endowing the County Council, with besides the option of buying the land the option of leasing it, does enlarge the limited sphere in which we are permitted to act under the provisions of this Bill, and endeavouring to look at the question simply and solely from a practical point of view, that the Amendment of my hon. Friend will make the Bill a better Bill than it is without it, I shall undoubtedly be disposed to accept it in the same spirit in which it is proposed.

(5.37.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I hope the Committee will not introduce the leasing principle into the Bill, my objection to it being that the labourer will not bestow on land, belonging to somebody else, the same amount of labour which he would if he were the owner. There is another great objection which I have—namely, that it would lead to the compulsory purchase of the land at excessive prices, and in addition there is the practical objection that when you carry out these transactions it is of the greatest importance that all the parties should know what they are doing. The County Council should know what price they are going to pay for land, and the labourer should have some idea of the price he may expect to get it at. Under this system of compulsory purchase they will not know. The Council will have to serve notice on the landlords, and from the date of that notice the land belongs to the County Council, the price having afterwards to be determined. The County Council may find when that price is fixed that it is one which will prevent them letting the land at a price the labourers will pay, and the land will be left on their hands. If the County Council acts under the compulsory terms they will be saddled with land which they can only deal with at a loss. For these reasons I object to the leasehold system and compulsory purchase.

*(5.40.) MR. SEALE-HAYNE: The argument of the President of the Board of Agriculture amounts to this: that the landlord injures his estate by granting a lease. Every landlord in the country grants leases, why should he not grant one to the County Council? I cannot understand the position of the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) with regard to the Amendment. I proposed an Amendment on the Allotments Bill in almost the same words, and he supported it with his vote. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham appeared to get completely mixed up in his argument, for he talked about the County Council getting land and letting land as if these were the same question. The Amendment deals with the question of the County Council taking land on lease, and not with that of letting land. I hope, after this discussion, I shall get the support of hon. Members opposite who are perfectly well acquainted with the wants of the agricultural labourer, and know that what he wants is to rent land at a fair agricultural value.

(5.42.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I desire to support the Amendment. I know that in the county with which I am best acquainted—Essex—compulsion is not needed, as land is going out of cultivation. But I cannot understand why, having digested the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts and the compulsory clauses of the Allotments Acts, and in view of the possible expropriation of the land by Railway Companies, hon. Members on this side should refuse to swallow the mild compulsion of the Amendment.

(5.44.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I was surprised at the speech of the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay), because I have among my papers a representation from his constituency pointing out that this question of leasing is to them the most important thing which could be put in the Bill. His constituents think that the County Council of their county will not be induced to embark on a large transaction of purchase out and out. They think that the Council should be empowered to take such land as is wanted on short leases, and to re-let it in small holdings. In Forfarshire there are probably more small farms—from 50 to 100 acres—than in any other county in Scotland, and they are held under this very tenure which the hon. Member rises up to condemn. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) put one or two cases which seemed of a formidable nature, and it is true that the system of ownership is preferable. But in many cases these small tenants cannot purchase out and out, as they have not the quarter of the purchase money required; but if the County Council has power to take land on lease these tenants can come in and take a small holding on lease. It seems to me that is a useful form of transaction, and one which we ought to provide as an alternative. I have also received representations from my own county, from the class likely to be most intimately concerned in the matter, to the effect that they believe the leasehold system will be the one most readily available, and I, therefore, wish to take this opportunity of expressing my opinion on the question.

(5.48.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I only came into the House while the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was speaking, and if the Division had been at once taken I should have been inclined to vote with him; but I agree, on an examination of the clause under discussion, and the Amendment, that the right hon. Gentleman got rather mixed in his arguments. They were sound on the point to which they were directed, and I thought from them that the point he was combating was that of allowing tenants under the County Council to let their holdings to others; that would be a most objectionable proposal. But I find that the proposal is really for the County Council to take land compulsorily on leases not exceeding 99 years. I agree in the desirability of this proposal to give further scope to the Bill, but, in my opinion, the Amendment does not go far enough; why should they be limited to leases not exceeding 99 years? Why should they not be empowered to take land for 999 years or on perpetual leases? If that were done, I do not see how the difficulties referred to by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) as to buildings, improvements, and so on, would apply at all. Although in my view this is a rubbishy measure, and hardly worth our attention at all, so limited is its scope and so little good is it likely to be to those it is desired to help, I am anxious, by supporting an Amendment of this kind, to enlarge the scope as much as possible, and so make the Bill a little more useful. The hon. Member for Essex (Major Rasch) seemed to think that hon. Gentlemen on his side would object to the Amendment because of the compulsion in it. I agree with him that as compulsion has been recognised in so many other Acts it is rather straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel for hon. Members on either side to object to the compulsion in the Amendment. The principal point, however, is rather that of enabling the County Council to take land on lease. If there is no risk in the County Council going into the market and becoming speculators in land, there can be no more risk in them leasing it for a term of years.

(5.52.) SIR J. KINLOCH (Perth, E.): If the Bill is going to be any use in Scotland, it is important that leasing power should be given to the County Council.

THE CHAIRMAN: The point to which the hon. Baronet is referring will be dealt with in a later portion of the Bill. Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 152; Noes 229.—(Div. List, No. 110.)

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Merionethshire is outside the scope of the Bill, and therefore it cannot be put, being out of Order.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): May I ask, on the point of Order, whether, during the passing of the Allotments Act, in which, so far as I recollect, no instruction was added, an Amendment similar to this, and almost identical in its words, was accepted in the course of the Debate on the Bill?

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not remember anything about that case. This Amendment is quite outside the scope of the Bill.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): As regards the Amendment referred to by the hon. Member in reference to the Allotments Bill, so far as my recollection goes the provision was originally in the Bill.

(6.8.) SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): On behalf of my hon. Friend (Mr. Channing) I beg to move in page 1, line 16, to leave out the word "agriculture," and insert—

"Agricultural or pastoral holdings or for market or allotment gardens."

The object of this Amendment is to bring in a number of pastoral holdings, which otherwise would be excluded from the operation of the Bill. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to accept it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 16, to leave out the word "agriculture," and insert the words "agricultural or pastoral holdings or for market or allotment gardens."—(Sir W. Foster.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'agriculture' stand part of the Clause."

*(6.9.) MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member will find by referring to the Bill that pastoral holdings are already included within its provisions. Subject to Clause 1 runs thus:—

it would be the expression 'small holding,' for the purpose of this Act shall mean land which is in the possession of a Council to be suitable for agriculture and in addition exceeds one acre, and either does not exceed 50 acres, or if exceeding 50 acres, the value of the land for the purposes of the Act shall not exceed £50."

Then, if the hon. Member turns to the definitions in Clause 13, he will find this:—

"The expressions 'agriculture' and 'cultivation' shall include horticulture, and the use of land for any purpose of husbandry, inclusive of the keeping or breeding of live stock, poultry, or bees, and the growth of fruit, vegetables, and the like."

I think it is, therefore, clear that the Bill already carries out what the hon. Member desires.

SIR W. FOSTER: After the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.10.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to move, in page 1, line 16, to leave out the words "and exceeds one acre." This Amendment would be rendered unnecessary if the provisions of the Allotments Act were extended to Scotland. I wish to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they are willing to extend the Allotments Act to Scotland? Hon. Members representing English constituencies will understand the effect of this Amendment is only necessary for Scotland. We have no Allotments Act, and, therefore, we have no means of obtaining so small a portion of land as under one acre. If Her Majesty's Government intend to extend the Allotments Act to Scotland, I should not press this Amendment to the Bill; but it is of the utmost importance to Scotland that power should be given to the County Councils to obtain land in smaller portions than one acre. I have before me the case of fishermen in large districts of Scotland. They do not require an acre of land, and still they want an allotment in connection with their cottages. I have also before me the case of a large number of agricultural labourers, who require land to build their houses upon, and very often require a bit of land for a garden, but who do not require what we call a "small croft" of two or three acres. I do not think that the excision of these words would do any harm as regards the application of the Bill to England. But I should like, before discussing the Amendment further, to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture whether Her Majesty's Government intend during this Session to extend the Allotments Act to Scotland? If not, I think the Scotch Members will agree with me that the striking out of these words would, to a large extent, meet our difficulties in Scotland.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 16, to leave out the words "and exceeds one acre."—(Mr. Esslemont.)

*(6.13.) MR. RITCHIE: My recollection in connection with the Allotments Act is that there was no serious desire expressed by the Scotch Members to extend the provisions of that Bill to Scotland. As regards obtaining small pieces of land for the purpose of building houses, we did not consider that a provision of this kind should be introduced into the Allotments Act. There were undoubtedly sympathetic views expressed by the Government as regards the extension of the Allotments Act to Scotland. There is no objection whatever on the part of the Government, I am sure, to extend the principle of the Allotments Act to Scotland. We would be very glad if we were in a position to do so; but I am afraid I would only be deceiving the House if I gave any assurance that we could by any possibility do it during the present Session. My right hon. Friend would be unable under any circumstances to accept the Amendment proposed by the hon. Gentleman. I am afraid, judging from the attitude assumed by the Scotch Members during the passing of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, when it was proposed to extend to Scotland the benefit of the provisions with regard to allotments already accorded to England, it would not be possible to pass a Bill extending the Allotments Act to Scotland this Session.

(6.17.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I have no fault to find with the right hon. Gentleman in so far as he has stated what has taken place in this House. But I may say that I was distinctly given to understand by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House that if the Scotch Members expressed a desire to have the Allotments Act extended to Scotland, Her Majesty's Government was willing to do so during the present Session. I only want the right hon. Gentleman to go a little further with regard to this matter. We have expressed repeatedly a desire to have this Act extended to Scotland, and the Scotch Members have from time to time been diverted by promises which have never been fulfilled. The right hon. Gentleman will recollect that I have repeatedly by question brought this matter forward. So far as I think will be essential, I am supported by very many hon. Members representing agricultural constituencies in Scotland as to the desirability of dealing with small allotments for the purposes I have mentioned. Therefore, Her Majesty's Government can be in no doubt as to the desire of the Scotch Members on this matter. I hope, therefore, the Scotch Members will have an opportunity of expressing their opinions upon this Amendment, unless Her Majesty's Government goes a good deal further than it has gone on this occasion. I am glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has returned to his place, and I hope he will give us some more satisfactory assurance than we have got from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board on this subject.

(6.18.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry I was not in the House when the hon. Gentleman raised this point. As I understand, he has said that I gave a pledge this Session that the Allotments Act should be extended to Scotland?

MR. ESSLEMONT: I understood so.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly right. I think, in answer to a question put by him, I stated that, so far as the Government were concerned, we were prepared to introduce a Bill for the purpose of extending to Scotland the provisions of the Allotments Act already passed for England if the discussion upon it would not be unduly prolonged. Of course, we could not promise that any lengthened time should be given for the discussion of the Bill; but I am prepared to introduce a Bill similar to that which has already been passed for England. I do not see that it will be necessary to introduce any special features into the Bill, except those rendered necessary by the different laws of the two countries. I hope it will be allowed to pass practically without prolonged discussion. The hon. Gentleman may rest assured that the Bill will be introduced during this present Session.

(6.22.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I think it would be better to move this Amendment in connection with Clauses 3 and 4, which only relate to Scotland—and then we should have the power given to one authority in Scotland—namely, the County Councils. As to the extension of the Allotments Act to Scotland, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was not quite accurate in the information which he gave the House, and which was very different from that just given by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. RITCHIE: What I said was that I was afraid, from the attitude taken up by the Scotch Members on the passing of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, that when we attempted to extend to Scotland the benefit of the provisions of the Allotment Act already accorded to England, it would not be possible to pass the Bill this Session.

DR. CLARK: When the Act was passing through the House I had an Amendment down extending it to Scotland; and I pointed out, as we are doing now, the desirability of its being extended to Scotland. I withdrew my Amendment in the Committee stage upon the distinct pledge which was given that the Government would consider between the Committee stage and the Report stage the phraseology necessary to apply it to Scotland. And then, when it came to the Report stage, I withdrew my Amendment on a distinct pledge being given that a Bill on the same lines would be introduced for Scotland. On several occasions I myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeenshire pressed the matter on the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, and he gave us to understand that he would introduce a Bill. But I think a vague Bill introduced conditionally will not be satisfactory. I think my hon. Friend should withdraw his Amendment now, and then move it when we come to Clause 3 or 4, the Scotch clauses, which are different from the English clauses. That power should be given to the County Councils in Scotland, because the conditions with regard to the Local Authorities are different in Scotland from what they are in England.

*(6.25.) MR. CHAPLIN: I am afraid the Amendment of the hon. Member, if adopted, would not carry out the object he has in view so effectively as the extension of the Allotments Act to Scotland, which we all desire to see accomplished. My right hon. Friend has stated in unqualified and definite terms, and not in a conditional manner, that a Bill for that purpose will be introduced during the present Session, and it will be carried, if possible, to its conclusion.

MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): I quite agree that the way proposed by the Government appears to be the best; but I should like to know when the Bill will be produced, as hon. Members would be naturally anxious to see it as soon as possible, with the view of ascertaining whether further Amendments may not be required. Scotch Members are usually practical, and I think if the Government were in a position to indicate the time when the Bill would be laid before the House for their consideration, my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen would probably withdraw his Amendment, and perhaps hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway would not press their Amendments.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I cannot fix a precise date, but I have no doubt that the Bill can be brought forward before the present Bill is disposed of. I hope this will satisfy the hon. Gentleman.

MR. ESSLEMONT: Under the circumstances I think the statements of the right hon. Gentleman are satisfactory, and I beg leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.28.) MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): I beg to move, in page 1, line 16, to leave out "one," and insert "half-an." I hope the right hon. Gentleman may see his way to accept this Amendment. I think it will come to be felt that it is unnecessary to create any tenure inferior to freehold. An agricultural labourer can acquire half-an-acre of land; but he cannot acquire one acre of land. Putting the land at £40 an acre, all he would have to furnish to get half-an-acre of land would be £5. I know that in Wiltshire agricultural labourers have no difficulty in paying their rates, which very often amount to £5, in one sum. To enable him to acquire one acre of land he would want £10, and he would want £10 more to stock that land. In the case of half-an-acre he would want nothing more than the £5; he would not require to stock it. And, even if he can save this £10 towards acquiring the stock, then he is unable to cultivate an acre of land, while he will be quite able to cultivate half-an-acre. I think it may be broadly stated that the half-acre marks the division between the spade and the plough. There is no middle to be created between this Bill and the Allotments Bill, because the Allotments Bill does not offer the facilities which are wanted. It does not give him security of tenure. In these allotments, land is very often let to labourers just when it is in a transition state. That is especially the case in my constituency, where building operations are often impending on a pretty extensive scale. I think this Amendment ought to be recommended by the fact that it would very largely extend the operations of the Bill. It would give the agricultural labourer that advantage which would enable him not to be entirely dependent upon wage-earning, and in that sense, perhaps, would do more than anything else to stop rural depopulation, which we all know is one of the objects of the Bill. I sincerely trust that the right hon. Gentleman will feel that this Amendment does not in any way touch the principle of his Bill, and I trust he will accept it.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 16, to leave out the word "one," and insert the words "half-an."—(Mr. Stephens.)

*(6.34.) MR. CHAPLIN: I would point out to my hon. Friend who has moved this Amendment that what he desires by it is already provided for under the Allotments Act. And even if it were not the case, I should find myself confronted with the same practical difficulty that I should have been met with in adopting the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Esslemont). I hope that my hon. Friend behind me will not press the Amendment, but that after the explanation I have given him that his object is already provided for he will withdraw it.

(6.36.) MR. STEPHENS: It does not, by any means, mean the same thing, because no one has contended that the process of turning land into gold is likely to take place under the Allotments Act. That is reserved for this Bill, and it is for the purpose of turning this half-acre of land into gold that I moved the Amendment; but if the right hon. Gentleman does not see his way to accept it, I will not put the House to any unnecessary trouble, but will withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.37.) MR. STEPHENS: I think the argument for my next Amendment is an exceedingly strong one. The House will see that under the Bill there are provided two bases of limit, one of 50 acres, or, if exceeding 50 acres, of the value of £50 a-year. I think it ought to be explained satisfactorily to the House why these two bases are put in. £50 value seems to be the intention of the Bill, but we know that with regard to 50 acres a £50 value will not be the limit of the Bill at all. It is very probable that pasture land in the neighbourhood of towns will be dear, and of a value far exceeding £50. Fifty acres of such land will probably be worth £150, and I submit that, in that case, you will be helping persons who must have a capital of something like £2,000. Persons with that amount of money are not persons to be so assisted out of the rates. Not only that, but under the present arrangement you throw across the path of the County Council a very undesirable temptation. I am quite sure a temptation of that kind would result in much undesirable speculation. If the County Council enter into the creation of farm holdings of that size and of that great value, the penny rate will do so very little that the creation of agricultural holdings will become quite a curiosity. No one has been able to suggest even an explanation for so very singular a provision as this. I do hope it has been a matter which has really been overlooked, and that the right hon. Gentleman may see his way to simplify the limit.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 16, to leave out from the word "acre," to end of Clause, and insert the words "and does not exceed an annual value, for the purposes of the income tax, of fifty pounds."—(Mr. Stephens.)

*(6.39.) MR. CHAPLIN: My hon. Friend asks me—and asks me very fairly—to state the reasons by which I was guided in selecting the 50 acres and the sum of £50 as an arbitrary limit—for it is an arbitrary limit—of what a small holding should consist of. The reason was this. It carries out the recommendation of the Select Committee. They came to the conclusion that that would be the most convenient definition of a small holding. I admit that it is open to the objection that the hon. Member has pointed out; but the cases to which he has referred would be more or less rare, and, on the whole, I thought it best to adopt the recommendation of the Committee, which I will read—

"Your Committee understand by 'small holdings' agricultural tenancies or cultivating ownerships not exceeding fifty acres in extent or £50 annual valuation. Owing to the varying quality of land it is impossible to fix any particular acreage as sufficient for the support of a family. But your Committee believe that land of from £30 to £50 valuation will generally be adequate for that purpose."

That is the reason why I put it into the Bill. I do not know that I need offer any further reason.

(6.41.) MR. BARCLAY: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will re-consider the necessity of having two limits. The real limit is the value, and I would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should leave out the question of 50 acres, and allow the limit to stand upon the value.

(6.42.) COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): The point is that if a man has less than 50 acres, the annual value may be anything at all; but if he happens to have more than 50 acres, the annual value must not be more than £50. Surely that is an anomaly, and I think my right hon. Friend will do well to see whether he cannot leave out the limitation to 50 acres.

*(6.43.) MR. WHITBREAD (Bedford): I hope the Government will not be induced to enlarge the scope of their Bill in the direction of giving larger holdings than the Bill already provides. I think if the Bill errs at all, it errs in the direction of having the holdings too large already. I quite understand the policy of giving large allotments or small holdings to the labouring population, because it would accomplish some very good objects. It would, first of all, increase the productiveness of the land; it would, in the second place, prevent the agricultural labourers flocking into the towns, and would fix them on the soil; and, in the third place, it would add greatly to their comfort. But when you go beyond that class, I do not know upon what principle we are called to establish a class of small capitalists. The two cases are totally different. Up to, say, ten acres—it depends, of course, upon the nature of the soil—a man can work an allotment himself; but when you get up to 50 acres, he must be an employer of labour, and you would have this absurdity—that the very labourers that he was employing would be taxed by the Council in order to get for him his holding. I think that will lead to anything but a pleasant feeling in our county districts. Let me refer to another point. Everybody who has travelled through the country districts must have been struck with the enormous increase of production from allotments as compared with large farms. That is due mainly to two causes. It is due to the abundant labour and care which the allotment holder is enabled to bestow upon his small plot, but there is another and a much more potent cause, and that is that the allotment holder only touches his land when it is fit to be touched—he only goes upon it at a time when the conditions of climate and soil are such that he can beneficially work it. The farmer is obliged to go on his soil at a time when it would not be advisable to touch it, because he cannot keep his men and horses idle. In my belief that is the great cause of the increased productiveness of the allotment over the large farm. But the moment you get a holding over ten acres, the moment a man becomes what he really would be with a holding of 50 acres, a small farmer, he has to work under the conditions under which the farmer now works, and the increased productiveness of the soil would disappear. For these reasons I protest against being called upon to tax the poorer labourers for the sake of establishing somebody on the land who is supposed to be a fine Conservative voter, and who is to remind us of the yeoman of the past. He is a capitalist, and he can establish himself now, if he has got the money. If he has not got the money, I object to lending him the funds of the County Council.

*(6.48.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I think, now that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill has read the words of the recommendation of the Committee, he will see that the Committee did not contemplate the words being put as they are in the Clause. I appeal to the hon. Member opposite (Sir John Dorington) whether there is any good land in the Vale of the Severn which is let under 40s. to 50s. an acre? A man, if he has under this Bill a holding of 40 acres there, might have to pay a rental of £120. But directly you get to the hill country, where the land is poor, if he has a holding one rood exceeding 50 acres, then he must be limited to a rental of £50. Surely the right hon. Gentleman does not contemplate an anomaly like that. I think the Amendment which limits the small holding to the annual value of £50, and leaves out the words "or if exceeding 50 acres," is the best way of meeting the question. I fully endorse what was said by the last speaker, that it would be found quite big enough for any small holdings to be established at the expense or guarantee of the ratepayers, at all events as a first experiment.

(6.50.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I thought, until I heard my hon. Friend just now, that we were preparing a Bill that would form a ladder for the labourer to enable him to become a yeoman farmer. This Bill, as it stands, enables him to hire ten acres; he is then allowed to buy more, and if he is successful, he will be allowed to get up to 50 acres. If I could make it a little more I should, instead of trying to curtail it. The Amendment seems to be that a man, no matter how energetic and saving he is, or how long he may have cultivated his little holding, is to be debarred from having more than £50 worth of land per annum.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM: From the ratepayers.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: It is not from the ratepayers, who will be subject to no loss. I do hope my hon. Friends around me will not curtail this Bill in any such way. I do not think the fears of my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), that these farmers will all be Conservatives, will be quite realised. I, for my part, do not care whether they are Conservatives or anything else. (Cheers.) Yes; but I do care very strongly about fixing any limitation to the prospects of the rural population; thus virtually telling them that no matter what their perseverance, labour, or savings, we shall impose a limit of £50 or £40, or, I think my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford said, 20 acres of land.

MR. WHITBREAD: No.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: At any rate, it is proposed to make it no higher than £50. If there is any alteration at all, I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should keep the 50 acres and limit the value to £75 or £80, so that a man should be able to get 50 acres, even although they cost a rent of 30s. an acre. That would be a fair limit.

(6.53.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I am quite sure we on this side of the House have no desire whatever to curtail the Bill against the interests of the agricultural labourer. On the contrary, we desire to make it as good as possible for him, but I am satisfied that he will, in the main, be interested in those ten acre holdings which he may hire and not buy. Not one labouring man in 50,000 will be able to buy his holding. This Bill does not merely propose a limit of £50 a year. There will be the possibility of a man holding 50 acres of land worth £3 or £4 an acre, involving thus about £150 a year. In the parish in which I live—a purely agricultural parish—all the land is worth between £100 and £150 an acre; and under this Bill, therefore, it will be possible to go up to 50 acres, involving a very large transaction on the part of the County Council, as well as a great outlay which would limit the operation of the Bill in other directions. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) that these large holdings, creating farmers of a substantial character, do really not come within the purview of the Bill; and that in order to restrict the Bill to the class requiring it the Amendment should be adopted. There might be some money limitation—such as that suggested by the hon. Member for Bordesley—so as to preclude large operations and the purchases of land of very great magnitude.

*(6.56.) SIR W. FOSTER: As a Member of the Select Committee responsible for the twofold limitation, I desire to explain to the Committee what was in the mind of the Select Committee on the matter. I think hon. Gentlemen who are discussing this Clause are forgetting that this Bill has, I hope, a future as well as a present application, and that it is desired that those who have now only small patches of 5, 10, or 15 acres, may, if they are prosperous, have an opportunity of obtaining a larger area to cultivate, and should keep that prospect before them. The Select Committee had two classes of land in view. First, those districts where the land is worth £4 or £5 an acre in rent. We limit the purchase of that land to £50 a year, and place the holders of it in the position of never having more than some twelve acres which, in the case of practically garden ground, is as much as they could personally cultivate. Then in Scotland, and, perhaps, Essex, where land is cheap, the limit of £50 would come in and give the holder a larger tract partly pasture. But in both cases the intention of the Committee was to try to keep the holding such as the holder and his family would be able to cultivate. I therefore hope the right hon. Gentleman will stick to the Clause with its double definition, as it meets a great number of cases.

(6.58.) MR. R. T. REID: While I have always been in favour of the limit of 50 acres, I should like to point out to the Committee the difference between the Report of the Select Committee and the use made of their recommendation in this Bill. The Committee recommended this as a maximum limit, because upon their recommendation the Local Authority was to derive a specific pecuniary benefit from the application of public money. But the very serious proposal of the Bill is to embark public money to the extent of £50 a year for the benefit of an individual. This is an almost novel proposal. I am not aware that in any previous legislation it has been proposed that you should authorise the application of public money to the extent of £2,000 or £1,000 on so large a scale for the benefit of people who have not been shown to require it for the public advantage. I desire to point out to the House what the consequence will be if the proposal of the Government is adopted. It will be less formidable to me and to some of my hon. Friends than it may be to hon. Gentlemen opposite. If you are prepared to advance public money before you set up in business a man who may be able to pay a rent of £50 a year, or more, without requiring from him any equivalent, I am sure that hereafter, and perhaps before long, we may use this as a very valuable precedent for the purpose of suggesting that there are other persons more in need of such assistance; and I would remind hon. Members that this is not the first valuable precedent that has been established for us by the present Government.

(7.2.) SIR J. DORINGTON (Gloucester, Tewkesbury): Looking at the clause as it stands, I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman would do wisely in accepting the Amendment. Then there would be no mistake as to the effect of the proposal, and we should avoid difficulties which may otherwise arise.

*(7.3.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): Speaking in the interest of Scottish small holders I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not take out the words proposed in the Amendment. I have consulted a large number of persons mostly interested in this question, and their opinion is that the fifty acre limit is too small. The limit of acreage they would have is that upon which they could fully employ a pair of horses. Now fifty acres is not enough for that purpose. It would be necessary to take sixty, or seventy, or even eighty acres in order to give sufficient work to a pair of horses. The Scotch agricultural labourer would like to have a holding of sixty to eighty acres; and anything less than that limit will diminish the advantages to be conferred by the Bill so far as Scotland is concerned.

(7.5.) MR. STEPHENS: I would point out that my Amendment does not limit the acreage of the land to be taken; but when you go up to £50 value I think it is time the ladder should stop. The point is whether you should go beyond the £50 or not. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment.

(7.6.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS: I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will not omit the words objected to by the hon. Member. I believe that the Bill may be made the means of removing a great deal of the injustice which now exists in connection with the disposal of farms. The majority of County Councils would no doubt adhere to the limit of £50, but it would be extremely hard if a tenant with sixty acres with a rent of £49 should have an advantage over his neighbour who happens to have a smaller acreage of average land at a little higher rental.

*(7.8.) MR. CHAPLIN: There is a good deal to be said upon both sides of the question, but I cannot accept the Amendment, and the Committee are now in a position to deal with it.

Question put, and agreed to.

(7.11.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS: I beg to move—

In page 1, line 17, after "acres," insert "exclusive of any common grazing or sheepwalk attached or appurtenant thereto."

I hope the right hon. Gentleman will agree to the inclusion of these words, so as to bring within the scope of the Bill those tenants who may have a comparatively small acreage but who may also have the use of an adjoining sheepwalk. I believe if the addition I propose were made, it would confer benefit on a considerable number of small tenants in Wales.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 17, after the word "acres," to insert the words "exclusive of any common grazing or sheepwalk attached or appurtenant thereto."—(Mr. Thomas Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(7.13.) MR. CHAPLIN: My objection to this Amendment is that it would increase the power of the County Council to provide land to an indefinite extent, and I am, therefore, unable to accept it.

(7.14.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS: I think it would be putting the tenants who have a comparatively small acreage to a great disadvantage to adopt the clause as it now stands.

(7.15.) SIR J. BAILEY (Hereford): I hope that my right hon. Friend will see his way to accept the Amendment, even if it is confined in its operation to Wales. All Welshmen will bear me out when I say that almost all the farmers in Wales have the right to a sheepwalk upon the adjoining hills, and that this sheepwalk is never measured with the farm.

(7.17.) MR. AINSLIE (Lancashire, N. Lonsdale): I hope that this Amendment will be made to apply not only to Wales, but to all parts of the kingdom; and that the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to accept it.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I cannot accept the Amendment, but I will undertake to consider it between now and the Report stage.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: Then I will ask permission to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.22.) MR. BARCLAY: I beg to move, in page 1, line 18, to leave out "fifty," and insert "seventy-five." It is the great ambition of the agricultural labourer in Scotland to have a small holding, and I hope we shall be able to make such arrangements under this Bill as will enable the Council to let small holdings on convenient tenure. The tenant could be asked to put down a certain amount of premium, or to pay so much in the first few years, so as to secure the County Council against loss. The Bill should not limit the powers of the County Council. I hope that the Government will allow the Councils to exercise a certain amount of discretion, so that the holder may have sufficient land upon which to employ two horses.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 18, to leave out the word "fifty," and insert the words "seventy-five."—(Mr. Barclay.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'fifty' stand part of the Clause."

(7.25.) SIR W. B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North West): I hope my right hon. Friend will not agree to go beyond the limit mentioned in the Bill. I believe it would be most unwise to do so.

(7.26.) MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider the Amendment. My hon. Friend the Member for Bordesley has said that the sole purpose of the Bill is to create a yeoman class.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I did not say that was its sole purpose. I said it would enable labourers to become yeomen.

MR. H. GARDNER: I think the hon. Member said the main purpose of the Bill was to create a yeoman class. Now I have had an opportunity of speaking to agricultural labourers during the past fortnight, and they have told me that they cannot see how they could ever hope to become yeomen in the sense referred to. They are, however, anxious to have small holdings, and I hope, therefore, the Amendment will be accepted.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I cannot accept the Amendment. The limit of £50 was adopted on the recommendation of the Select Committee, and I think we must adhere to it.

(7.28.) DR. CLARK: I do not see why we should limit the holding to the rent of £50. The desire is to have sufficient land upon which to employ two horses. If a man has less than that he can only keep one horse. A much better class of farming is done upon a holding upon which two horses are employed, and I therefore hope the Amendment will be accepted.

*SIR J. KINLOCH: The limit of fifty is quite unsuitable for Scotland. Indeed, this Bill will not do our agriculturists the least good, for they are not the men who take very small holdings. The only thing that will do in Scotland will be the one pair farms, which would necessitate raising the limit to £75, or even £100.

MR. STEPHENS: It appears that it is now desirable to drop the fifty and to increase it to one hundred. But if that be so, I must point out that, having this limit of a penny rate, you will restrict the operation of the Bill immensely. Indeed, I wonder how many men could face a constituency and say this was a Bill for the relief of the agricultural population.

MR. R. T. REID: I desire to say that the smaller holdings are looked for in that part of the country of which we have had experience. For my part, I must say that I am not prepared to spend public money for the purpose of setting up farmers.

*SIR W. FOSTER: I do feel in the interests of the passage of the Bill that we ought not to allow the amount to grow, and I would ask that the Amendment should not be pressed.

DR. CLARK: If the wording means that there might be forty acres, say at 30s. or £2 per acre—that if above fifty acres it is not to exceed £50, and if below may exceed that amount—then the clause in its present form will suit me, because I do not want to go beyond fifty acres for that class of land. If that is the construction the Government place upon the definition of small holdings in Clause 1, I think it will satisfy us.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: I beg to move—

In page 1, line 18, after "pounds," add,—
 "(3.) Where common or grazing land or sheepwalk shall attach or be appurtenant to or be held or enjoyed with any land acquired by the County Council under this Act, and the County Council shall divide the land so acquired for separate holdings, then a proportionate part of such common or grazing land or sheepwalk shall be set aside for each separate holding."

In many pastoral Welsh districts small farms have in years past been consolidated into one large farm, with the result that each farmer obtains not merely the small tenancies, but also the pasture among the mountains. Suppose, in the operation of this Bill, a County Council, on the application of a certain number of labourers or small farmers, acquired a large farm, and that this large farm had attached to it certain acreage of common grazing or sheepwalk, if the County Council were to take a certain amount of land in the valley without also taking what was attached to it—the common grazing or sheepwalk—the real object of this Bill would be defeated. The Amendment simply means that in case a large farm is cut up for small holdings, the mountain land attaching to that farm shall be set aside in proportion to the small holdings created.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 18, after "pounds," add,—
“(3.) Where common or grazing land or sheepwalk shall attach or be appurtenant to or be held or enjoyed with any land acquired by the County Council under this Act, and the County Council shall divide the land so acquired for separate holdings, then a proportionate part of such common or grazing land or sheepwalk shall be set aside for each separate holding.”—(Mr. Thomas Ellis.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

*MR. CHAPLIN: What I understand the hon. Member to propose is that where the County Council may require land for the purpose of small holdings in districts where there is common and grazing land, and, having acquired it have divided it into small holdings, they shall at the same time set apart a portion of the sheep grazing land for each of these particular holdings. I listened to the hon. Member with deference because of his close knowledge of Welsh affairs, but I have two points to submit to him. In the first place, if he makes it obligatory on the County Council to do this, is it not possible that on some occasions there may be a purchaser, or would-be purchaser, who may desire to have his holding without grazing land; and, in the second place, is it not sufficient to leave this matter to the discretion of the County Councils? These are points which I should like to submit to the hon. Member for his consideration. If, then, he desires to press the point, I shall ask him, in reference to this particular Amendment, to do what we agreed in a previous case—to let me consider the subject and make suggestions upon Report.

DR. CLARK: This will affect the Highlands of Scotland equally with Wales. Unless you have a change of the kind proposed, it will be almost impossible for the small holder to make a living. As it is necessary that the holder should have the grazing land during the summer, and the lowland during the winter—that the sheep may be fed while the snow is on the ground—there should be a concurrent division of the two classes of land. This, as was done by the Crofters' Commission, will be absolutely necessary for the Highlands. The North of England, too, will be affected. In view of these matters, I trust the right hon. Gentleman will either adopt the Amendment of my hon. Friend, or, when he draws up a modified clause, will insert a recognition of this proposition. In my opinion, it will be requisite that these large tracks should not be divided, as the cost of division will be great, and as there is a desire that the system of co-operation should be in operation.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Although it may be desirable that something should be done, I venture to suggest that we ought to accept the offer of the right hon. Gentleman, and allow him to consider the subject.

SIR J. BAILEY: I desire to disassociate myself from the hon. Member's propositions with regard to the commons.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: I did not submit my Motion at all in regard to commons in the ordinary acceptance of the word. I referred to the grazing land on the mountains, and to the sheepwalk which is commonly attached to the farm.

SIR J. BAILEY: But common land in Wales is common not to the particular farm which is divided, but common to the whole. If the hon. Member intends to devote a certain marked piece to each holder, I wish to say, in my judgment, that is impracticable. If, on the contrary, he means to divide and enclose it, then I say he is ousting the rights of the lord of the manor and owners, and making a very serious alteration in the law—an alteration going far beyond the motive of this Bill.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): My hon. Friend does not propose that the land shall be divided for each particular plot. He asks that provision should be made in favour of the purchaser of every small holding that he may have the right which had attached to the land up to that time, but only the common or grazing land on the mountain. I really wish to press home the fact that in Wales this is a very important matter indeed. Unless something of the kind is done the tenant of a small holding might be obliged to keep his cattle indoors during hay season; so that the loss of grazing rights would be serious. But if the clause were passed, it would then be obligatory on the County Council to meet that contingency. I do not know whether some alteration might not be made in order to make the matter optional; yet, so far as the Welsh tenants are concerned I do not think there would be a single one who would require a small holding without also requiring the grazing land. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will either now meet the views of my hon. Friend or will, on Report, bring up such a clause as will carry out our views on this matter.

*MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I think the matter had much better be left to the right hon. Gentleman to bring up in a clause on Report. I understand the hon. Member desires that where a County Council acquires any considerable quantity of land which carries with it the right of sheep pasture, the latter shall be distributed among those holders who shared in the purchase. I think that is very desirable indeed. As I understand the Amendment, there is no contemplation to rail or fence in any part of the common.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: In order that my meaning may not be misunderstood by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) I will give a case.

Sir J. Bailey

Suppose we had a farm of 200 acres in the low-lands. As a rule it would carry with it the right of pasture for 600 sheep over the mountains. Now, if the County Council should cut this farm up into four of 50 acres each, would it not be ridiculous to leave the former tenant, who is allowed to retain 50 acres, the right of the pasture whilst the three other tenants had none? No County Council would be able to let such a farm without this right of grazing, and unless some such Amendment as this is passed, I do not see how the Council can attach that right. I am quite willing that the right hon. Gentleman should consider this question and bring it up at a later stage, but I should like a promise that he will accept the spirit of the proposal.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I sympathise with the view of the hon. Member, and I will undertake to carefully consider the question.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to move, in line 1, after the word "sale" to add "or letting," so as to extend the scope of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I beg to move the following Amendment:—In page 2, line 11, to leave out from "holding" to end of sub-section. The words proposed to be left out are, "and cannot be made by the purchaser or tenant." I think these words contain a grave statement, because a purchaser or tenant might be able, at a great sacrifice, to put up these buildings. At the same time it might be far better if the work were done for him, or the necessary money advanced for the purpose, thus leaving him so much more capital to be employed in cultivating his land. At any rate, I would leave the matter to the discretion of the County Council. This is only an enabling clause, and therefore I would not hamper them with being obliged to determine whether the purchaser could or could not do this.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I take it that it is desirable the holders or tenants should put up these buildings themselves, but when that is not possible, and only in those cases, do I feel it wise to cast upon the County Council the performance of that duty.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I do not attach much importance to this Amendment except that it seemed to be necessary to prepare the way for another Amendment of mine which follows. After what the right hon. Gentleman has said, I will ask leave to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I now beg to move the following Amendment:—

In page 2, line 12, at the end of the Clause, to add the words: "(4.) 'The County Council may also make to any person acquiring from such Council under this Act any Small Holding, loans for buildings or other improvements on such holding.

(5.) Terms of repayment of such loans shall be so arranged that the loans and all interest thereon shall be paid off within a period not exceeding thirty-five years from the making of such loans.

(6.) Any such loans shall be a charge on the small holding in respect of which such loan is made, next in priority after any other sums due in respect thereof to the County Council."

I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept this Amendment, which, I think, is of the utmost importance. If hon. Members consider what took place before the Select Committee, they will find that the majority of witnesses pointed out the necessity for provision being made for the erection of buildings. Lord Wantage, in the course of his evidence, said that it would cost him, as a landowner, twice as much to put up buildings and make the necessary repairs as it would the man who had a small holding. No doubt the buildings on his Lordship's estate would be of a needlessly expensive character for a small man. I know if you leave a small holder to himself, and let him find out his wants, he will make buildings such as will fulfil his purposes at a cost, including his labour, so small that you can scarcely estimate it. What I propose is, not to forbid the County Councils to erect these buildings, but to leave it to their discretion. I think that, under certain circumstances, the Councils might advance a sum of money to the small holder to enable him to put up buildings such as would suit him. That might not be quite the case if the Councils do the work themselves. Such loans would be of quite a different character from the loans on the land because buildings wear out, and, therefore, the suggestion is that they shall be paid for by annual instalments during 35 years, and that the money so advanced shall be a charge on the small holding next in priority after any other sums due to the County Council by such owner. I am quite sure that the difficulty of erecting buildings for small holders will be a great drawback, unless the right hon. Gentleman will consent to some such proposal as this.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 12, at the end of the clause, to add the words,—“(4.) The County Council may also make to any person acquiring from such Council under this Act any small holding, loans for buildings or other improvements on such holding.

(5.) Terms of repayment of such loans shall be so arranged that the loans and all interest thereon shall be paid off within a period not exceeding thirty-five years from the making of such loans.

(6.) Any such loan shall be a charge on the small holding in respect of which such loan is made, next in priority after any other sums due in respect thereof to the County Council.”—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I wish to confirm what the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has said. From my own experience of small holdings in my own neighbourhood, I think the question of cheapening the provision of essential buildings is a very important one. It is within my knowledge that small holders can erect buildings quite adequate for their purpose much cheaper than is likely to be the case if the County Councils take the work in hand. This Amendment I consider to be a very wise one. I do not think the County Councils would be deterred from carrying the provisions of this Bill into effect, because of the introduction of this proposal. On the contrary, I think they will see that the security is ample, and that they are furthering their own interest in promoting the interest of the small holders.

(8.10.) Mr. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford) : I think the proposal contained in the Amendment will be, to a large extent, provided for by a subsequent clause, which enables the County Council to make allowances for the erection of buildings. This is Sub-section 6 of Clause 5, which reads as follows :—

"The Council may, if they think fit, agree to postpone for a term not exceeding five years the time for payment of all or any part of an instalment either of principal or interest, or of a terminable annuity in consideration of expenditure by the purchaser which, in the opinion of the Council, increases the value of the holding, but shall do so on such terms as will, in their opinion, prevent them from incurring any loss."

This surely goes a long way to meet the views of the hon. Gentleman. If a man who has a plot of land is unable to put up buildings, the County Council can postpone his payments for five years and allow him to use the money in the erection of buildings.

(8.11.) Mr. R. T. REID : I think the provisions pointed out by my hon. Friend opposite give everything that can in fairness be claimed. I do not know that I am very easily shocked, but I am beginning to ask myself what is to be the end of all this. What is really proposed is that a gentleman who has been favoured by public credit to the extent of acquiring property worth £100 a year or so is, in addition, to have loans for the purpose of erecting farm buildings. Contrast the position of that man with that of a struggling tradesman in the village who wants to increase the size of his shop. That is surely for the benefit of the inhabitants; but that man cannot obtain a loan from the County Council to assist him, and I should like to remind the House that there are small holders who have made their way without the assistance of this Bill. I am thoroughly in sympathy with this Bill, but I think we shall make a most unfair differentiation between two classes of small holders if we allow the man who is now the favourite of the Legislature to receive public money for the erection of his farm buildings, and withhold that advantage from the man who by his own industry and thrift has secured a small holding in the ordinary way, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman (Mr.

Chaplin) will not accept the Amendment.

•(8.13.) Mr. CHAPLIN : I am afraid I cannot accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend for reasons which I think must be apparent to the Committee. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire said that the security would be ample, but I do not think this would be the case. Assuming that the proportion of money to be paid down is one-fourth, that is not a very large amount to begin with; and when this subject was considered by the Members of the Select Committee, an entirely opposite view as to the risk involved on the ratepayers was taken from that of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I will read two sentences from the Report of that Committee—

"Some witnesses have argued that the Local Authorities should advance money on building improvements, and even on stock. Your Committee cannot adopt this suggestion, which they consider extravagant in the case of stock, and which they believe even in the case of buildings would be attended with great risk."

I am bound to say I share that view myself, and I cannot see that the hon. Gentleman has said anything to diminish the fears I entertain with regard to the risks which this will impose, or to diminish the force of our view. The majority of the Select Committee held the view that I have expressed, and I believe that view will also be shared by this Committee. I am sorry I cannot meet my hon. Friend by accepting his Amendment.

(8.15.) Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE : I think we have already gone a long way to benefit the small holder, but my own view is that when once the tenant purchaser has entered into possession he is not entitled to any more consideration than any other farmer. Many farmers would be glad to receive advances from the State to enable them to build houses and farm buildings, and there are many who have not had the advantage of having State money lent to them to purchase their holdings, and I do not see any reason for the proposal contained in the Amendment. I shall not support the Amendment, and I think the right hon. Gentleman has acted wisely in refusing to accept it.

(8.17.) COMMANDER BETHELL: Economically, the hon. Gentleman who has proposed this Amendment is quite right. It is better economy to lend the money to tenants, and allow them to put up the buildings than that the County Council should do the work. I question, however, whether it is advisable that the tenant purchaser should be assisted by public money further than is indicated in the 5th clause.

(8.18.) MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I shall vote for the Amendment, because I believe it is one of the most important and most valuable that has been moved in relation to this Bill. I have heard with some surprise the observations of the hon. Members for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) and Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid). I think it is a little late in the day to talk about alarm, and I think it comes with somewhat bad grace from us, who insisted on the Government introducing compulsory powers into their Bill, to complain of this somewhat innocent Amendment of the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Collings). We want to make the Bill as effective as possible, and we recognise the right of demand and the duty of the County Council to make provisions of an exceptional character for the class of tenants pointed out by the Mover of the Amendment. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Staveley Hill) spoke of Sub-section 6 of Clause 5; but if you look at the legislation of other countries upon this subject, particularly of Russia, you will see that the Government have been most careful to make provisions by public loans for the erection of buildings on the small holder's estate, to provide stock, and even to provide seed for the farm. I regret that the Bill does not go further in that direction; but the Mover has justified his Amendment on another ground, and that is, that the tenant himself can do the work at much less expense than it can be done by the Local Authority. We are not asking that the County Council shall have an indirect power in this manner, that they shall be able to make remissions extending over five years, but that they shall have the direct power to make an advance in money—a moderate advance for the purpose of enabling the tenant to erect the necessary buildings. I think the Amendment is a moderate and reasonable one, and I again ask the right hon. Gentleman to give it further consideration.

(8.23.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I am loth to detain the Committee, but I am so satisfied that the success of the Bill depends largely on this question of buildings that I would ask the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) to re-consider his decision. I was astonished to hear the remarks of the Member for Bradford, and I think he can scarcely have read the Amendment. He said that the small holder, having had his buildings put up for him, could not expect any more. It is the man who has not had the buildings that this Amendment is endeavouring to assist. If the County Council think it better to erect the buildings themselves they can do so under this Bill. But they might be disposed to let a small holder, who had sons perhaps to assist him, have a small loan to enable him to put up the buildings that he requires, and he could do it very much cheaper than they could. Perhaps the tenant could not put up all the buildings, but could put up some with a little assistance, and I want to give the County Councils in their judgment and prudence, in which I have the greatest confidence, the power to advance these small sums. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that there is less security, but I think the security is the same. Suppose the County Council erected £100 worth of buildings, they would charge, I suppose, £4 per annum. If the man put up the buildings himself, he would probably only borrow £50, which would reduce the interest to £2, and the buildings would be there all the same. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he thinks the sub-section of Clause 5 meets the case that I put forward, and I must say I have not yet heard a good and sufficient reason why the County Councils should not be allowed to advance the money. All the economic arguments are in favour of the proposal, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see that there is nothing new in my proposal. There is, I maintain, the same security and increased economy, and I do beg the right hon. Gentleman to take the matter into further consideration.

(8.28.) MR. STEPHENS: I should like to point out that the tenant might put up buildings which would not have the effect of increasing the value of the holding, and it is supposed that a County Council would put up buildings which would improve the permanent value. I think the sub-section of Clause 5 is a preferable way of dealing with this matter, because under that there is time for the tenant to have given some proof of his fitness and reliability, and it will not involve the risk that is contained in the Amendment. Hon. Members must remember that we are not dealing with an unlimited fund, and that, on the contrary, we are dealing with a fund which is extremely limited.

(8.29.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I would suggest to the Member for Bordesley words which at the beginning of his Amendment would make it clear that what is suggested is an alternative. If he were to preface to his Amendment "Where the County Council do not think fit to provide buildings" these words, or words to this effect, would make it perfectly clear that these loans are not to be in addition to money spent on the erection of buildings. I contend that this will be a more economical manner of doing the work, and I think these words will make it clear what is the real intention of the Amendment.

(8.30.) Question put.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3.

(9.12.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS: Mr. Chairman, I am very much afraid it is no use explaining this Amendment to the Minister of Agriculture, as the Minister of Agriculture is not present in his place.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. Jesse Collings

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: The Committee has previously discussed at considerable length the question of giving to the County Council various methods of acquiring land. I am sorry to say the Committee has refused to accept many of the Amendments which were moved from this side of the House to give powers to County Councils to take land on lease, as well as to take it in feu. The Amendment I have to propose, in page 2, line 16, which is to insert the words "occupation or" after "holdings for," raises the question of giving County Councils the right not only to sell land to the labourers or others, but to give them the power to give land on occupation—either to lease it or to hire it—from year to year, or upon any terms the County Council may see fit, under rules to be incorporated in this Bill. I think the right hon. Gentleman must admit the strength of the arguments which have been advanced by, I think, the vast majority of Members on this side of the House, by two or three Members on the other side of the House who are very well acquainted with agricultural districts, and also from the members of the various Congresses and Conferences which the right hon. Gentleman has himself attended and addressed during the last two or three months. Naturally I read the reports of these Conferences with very great interest, because one was able to see there the opinions of those who were Conservatives, and also of those who are very anxious to obtain easy access for the labourers to the land. As far as I can remember, many of those who spoke at those Conferences were very anxious that the County Councils should have power under this Bill not only to sell land, but to let it as well; and I think that the arguments which have been brought forward by several on this side of the House, more especially by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, must have carried conviction to a large number of Members on the other side, that under this Act it will be for a long time impossible for a large number of labourers to buy land out and out. They have not the capital, and even if they had the capital to buy the land, they would not then have enough capital to stock it and to pay the first few instalments of the purchase money. So that if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to carry out the real purport, as it seems to me, of all such Bills as this—namely, the bringing of the labourers into nearer contact with, and the giving them an easier access to, the land, he must give the County Councils some other power than that of selling out and out to the tenant. The right hon. Gentleman, when I moved a previous Amendment, was willing to make a certain concession with regard to this clause. We appreciate very much the concession he made, but, as I read his concession, it simply enables the County Council to let land under ten acres to those who are unable to buy it out and out. What I desire the right hon. Gentleman to do is, not to set up this artificial limit of ten acres, but to give the County Council as wide and general a discretion as possible in the matter. The County Council is not likely to embark on all sorts of risky land speculations. They will be very chary indeed of letting or selling land, except upon good security and with something like a reasonable prospect of repayment, but what I venture to urge upon the right hon. Gentleman is that it is unwise to set up this artificial limit. In some parts of the country ten acres would be quite as much as a labourer could deal with, but in other parts of the country, where the soil is very thin, the labourer could not possibly obtain a decent subsistence out of ten acres. Twenty or thirty acres let to him, especially if it were let in connection with certain grazing land on the mountain side, would enable the labourer to start as a peasant farmer, and to get enough money gradually to become the owner of the land, or of some other land, at the disposal of the County Council. Such a process as that is the process for which we have been looking for many years, and a process which the right hon. Gentleman desires to give by means of this Bill. I am sure he cannot give it, unless he accepts an Amendment enabling the County Council not only to sell land, but also to let land up to fifty acres. Now, it may be said it is a very risky experiment for the County Council to become landowners, but it seems to me that a certain element of risk is contained in any transaction whatever with regard to land on the part of the County Council. But once you do away with this fear of risk, I think we could very well trust the County Council to draw up such rules as will make the risk as small as possible. The County Council may, by means of these rules, enable the labourer to lease land for thirty or forty or fifty years at what he might consider thoroughly fair and reasonable terms; or, on the other hand, it might give a shorter lease, or even an ordinary year to year tenancy. What I wish by this Amendment is to give the County Council as large a discretion, and as large a liberty as possible to carry out what I consider to be the main purpose of the Bill—namely, to make it easier for the labourers to obtain access to the land of this country.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, after the words "holdings for," to insert the words "occupation or."—(Mr. Thomas Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(9.23.) MR. CHAPLIN: I listened with great attention to everything the hon. Gentleman said, and I do not think upon this point there is any wide difference of opinion between us, although we desire to arrive at the same end, I acknowledge, by somewhat different means. The discussion which the hon. Gentleman invites us to enter upon in this Amendment is really a repetition of the discussion which was conducted at very considerable length upon Clause 1 of the Bill. The hon. Member refers to the numerous Conferences which have been held in different parts of the country, at some of which I have been present myself, to meet a number of people of all classes interested in this question. Then he says, so far as he can judge from the reports, he has gathered that the great majority of these people were unanimously in favour of hiring rather than of purchasing land.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: I did not say the majority, but a large number of them.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I beg pardon. The hon. Gentleman said a large number of them were in favour of hiring rather than purchasing.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: As well as purchasing.

*MR. CHAPLIN: Within certain limits I acknowledge that is perfectly true. There are, and there always will be, a certain number—probably a large number—of agricultural labourers and others in the country districts whose means will not enable them to buy land, however desirous they may be of doing so. Consequently, being perfectly alive to that fact myself, it was one of my first duties, in considering the framing of this Bill, to devise some means by which that difficulty might be overcome. I think I shall be able to show the Committee that the difficulty has been clearly and substantially dealt with; and when the mode in which it is dealt with was explained to the various classes at these Conferences I do not recollect a single occasion upon which the methods proposed in the Bill of the Government did not give complete and entire satisfaction. I will not repeat what I said on the introduction of the Bill with regard to the desire of the Government that in the first instance it should, if possible, create owners, rather than tenants of land. There are numerous good reasons why I think that object is desirable which will commend themselves to the Committee—reasons which, had I been in order, I should have stated at some length to the Committee on the first clause, and which were dealt with at no inconsiderable length by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) to-night. But as I have the charge of this measure, perhaps it is desirable that I should point out to the Committee some of these reasons. In the first place, if the Local Authorities are to let the land instead of selling it to purchasers, they begin by losing what, after all, is the chief security against loss to the ratepayers—namely, the proportion of the purchase money which the Bill requires shall be paid upon the completion of the purchase; and you will, to that extent, undoubtedly increase the risks which have been frequently referred to in the course of the debate this afternoon as being imposed upon the ratepayers.

Mr. Chaplin

The next difficulty I find is this—a difficulty which also has been constantly referred to to-night—the provision of the buildings. How are the buildings to be provided if the land is to be let? It must be obvious that if the land is let it must be upon either a yearly tenancy or a lease. If it is to be let upon yearly tenancy it is perfectly clear that the tenants cannot erect the buildings, and that that duty undoubtedly must fall upon the Local Authority. If, on the other hand, it is let upon lease, I admit that it would be perfectly possible for the tenants themselves to provide the buildings, but, if they did, would it not be infinitely preferable, in their own interests, that instead of being leaseholders they should purchase the land, because the difference between what they would have to pay as rent and what they would have to pay as instalment upon the purchase money would be very inconsiderable? They might possibly pay something less as rent, but if they bought the land and paid a trifling addition in the form of instalments, every year would be bringing them nearer to the time when not only the land but the buildings upon it became their own. I think I have shown two good reasons upon the point of buildings alone. Surely it is more desirable that the new holders should be owners instead of tenants. I now come to the consideration of the next question, and that is whether the Local Authorities in this country are well calculated to occupy the position of landlords. Everyone knows how numerous, important, and difficult the duties of a landlord are—and it must be seen that they would be enormously increased for a Local Authority—and what an army of agents, bailiffs, and surveyors would be required for the management of their estates, which would perhaps be situated in all parts of the county. Not a gate would require to be hung, not a drain to be made, or any other trifling matter to be attended to without the Local Authority being called upon to deal with it; and I submit that they would not be able to undertake this responsibility with anything like the economy and advantage with which it could be done by the landlord. Then, again, everybody knows what happens to a landlord when his tenants suffer from bad times. He is called upon to make reductions in the rents; and he generally does so. He is able to do so, because he is dealing with his own property; but the Local Authority would be placed in a totally different position, because they would be dealing with the property of the ratepayers, for which they would be only trustees. Moreover, the Local Authority would be elected by the very people who are pecuniarily interested in the management of the estates, and enormous pressure would therefore be brought to bear upon them. If the Local Authority gave way, the trust of the ratepayers would be betrayed; whilst if the Local Authority resisted, they would become the most unpopular landlords in the world. I cannot think there will be in the minds of anyone who has carefully and impartially considered this question any difference of opinion as to its being preferable that the land should be sold, and not let. At the same time, we were disposed to make some provision for that class of persons whom it is desirable to put upon the land, but who cannot afford to purchase. The Bill provides that the Local Authority should be empowered to let the land in holdings of ten acres to such persons. The limit of ten acres does not, however, represent any fixed principle; and if good reasons can be advanced for altering it, we shall be prepared to make the alteration. I will now venture to refer to some observations I have frequently heard advanced during the course of these Debates. Many hon. Gentlemen have declared that, as far as the agricultural labourers are concerned, there is not one in 50,000 who would ever be able to purchase a small holding. Now, I believe that statement to be entirely unfounded, or, at all events, to be a very great exaggeration of the facts of the case. It has been my duty to make inquiries into this question during the last few months, and I have been astonished to find what a large number of farmers there are in a prosperous condition who have been agricultural labourers themselves, or the sons of agricultural labourers. Surely that is a most encouraging thing to learn, and it supplies a very decisive answer to the declarations of hon. Gentlemen that not one in 50,000 would ever be able to purchase a small holding. I believe that, with the provisions in the Bill which I have mentioned, a large number of labourers will be able by their own industry to purchase small holdings, and that they will thus be in a position to mount the ladder, to which the hon. Member for Bordesley has referred. I think I have now given reasons for the decision we have arrived at in regard to the Bill, and I will only further say that I shall be unable to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member.

*(9.40.) MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): While I agree with the intentions of the hon. Member, I do not think his Amendment expresses his meaning, or that it is one we can embody in the Bill. The Bill in itself is not inconsistent with occupation; indeed, it distinctly contemplates that the purchaser should occupy. There is no reason why the power to let the land should be restricted to those who cannot purchase. There may be many cases in which people may be well able to purchase, but who prefer to rent; and I see no reason why such persons, whom it would be very desirable to get upon the land, should not benefit by this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman contended that Local Authorities could not perform the duties of landlords, but I would point out that there are already a large number of public corporations throughout England who possess land and who lease and let it. I admit that there are some cases in which they have not been good and satisfactory landlords; but the right hon. Gentleman must bear in mind that there are many corporate bodies, large and small, which have managed their estates in a very satisfactory manner. I cannot see why the right hon. Gentleman should be so tenacious in opposing a merely enabling clause to give the County Councils the power of letting as well as selling the land, and I hope he will reconsider the matter. We would agree to any reasonable condition the right hon. Gentleman might wish to impose in regard to it. I speak now as a friend of the Bill. I think that altogether it is an exceedingly good Bill, reflecting credit both on the right hon. Gentleman and the Government, and I wish to do nothing to impair its usefulness. The Amendments I have put on the Paper are more in the nature of suggestions than anything else. My object in making them is to improve the drafting in two or three places and to give the Bill a wider scope, and to enable it to reach a class of people it would otherwise not reach. I agree that this Amendment cannot be accepted in its present form, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider it if it is so altered, and thus give the County Councils the power of letting as well as re-selling.

(9.45.) MR. HALDANE: I wish to support the appeal of my hon. Friend, and in doing so I will read some words which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford himself. I find in Hansard of 26th January, 1886, this passage in his speech—

“With regard to a large creation of small holdings by the action of the Legislature I hold a totally different opinion altogether. I am satisfied that not only would it do nothing to mitigate, but, in my opinion, it would have precisely the opposite effect, and it would only tend to aggravate and increase the agriculture depression, of which we all so much complain. Something, no doubt, may be said in favour of small tenancies, but I have yet to learn whether by means of small holdings, as a general rule, small tenancies or small freeholds are meant by the author of this Amendment. I admit that in many cases a tenant of a small farm, holding his farm under favourable occupation, has probably been able to weather the storm of depression as well as, and possibly better than, some of his neighbours in larger occupations; but the small tenancy is one thing, and the small freehold is another.”

If these words of the right hon. Gentleman were true then, are they not also true to-day? So far as the present Bill is concerned it compels the purchaser to pay down a quarter of the purchase money. Now, I should like to know how many of the class to whom this clause would apply would be in a position to do what is required of them. Not only would they have to be in a position to put down a quarter of the purchase money, but they would also require money with which to stock the land. The small holder is placed in a sufficiently difficult position without the additional difficulties which the right hon. Gentleman would place in the way of the purchase of the freehold. If this Bill had been analagous to the Irish arrangement for the purchase of the freehold, there would have been little need for the Amendment; but I do feel that but a very small class of those whom we wish to benefit will be reached unless the principle of this Amendment is accepted. I do not care in what form it is put so long as the ten acre restriction is taken off. I would, therefore, appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to act up to the sentiments which actuated him when he made the speech from which I have quoted on the 26th January, 1886.

COMMANDER BETHELL: In the present discussion there is no question of principle involved—that has already been conceded. My right hon. Friend has mentioned several reasons why he thinks the substance of this Amendment ought not to be admitted in the Bill. He observed that if the Local Authority is allowed to let land without restriction as to the amount or persons who may be allowed to hire it, the Local Authorities lose security by reason of not having a certain amount of money left in their hands. If that is true, it is also true that the Local Authority can get rid of a bad tenant; while under the other conditions the bad tenant may go out of the land after he has ruined it, the land ultimately coming into the hands of the County Council in such a condition as to require considerable expenditure before it is again brought to its proper value. I would point out here that this Amendment, as does the Amendment I should have moved, really gives greater elasticity to the County Council. As to the question of buildings, I do not suppose that the County Council would let land in such sizes as would necessitate the erection of buildings. As has been pointed out, you cannot let land on a yearly tenancy and expect the tenants to put up buildings, and in a great many cases where small holdings are not far from villages buildings of the nature contemplated would not be required. In that respect I would remark that the elasticity which this Amendment proposes is really desirable. Wherever buildings are concerned, I take it that the land will be sold. Then he further mentioned the case of the Local Authority as landlord, and in this connection there would, no doubt, be some difficulty; but I do not think it is of such a nature that we should trouble ourselves much about it. With reference to the case he submitted, where a County Council, possessed of a considerable quantity of land, might have pressure put upon it order to lower rents, I think the right hon. Gentleman has forgotten the number of people with whom the County Council is concerned, and also the vastness of the area. While you might possibly bring pressure upon the parish Vestry, you could not bring influence of that nature to bear on the County Councils. What we ask is that those who do not wish to buy may hire land. If the hon. Member goes to a Division I shall feel it my duty to support him, seeing that I have an Amendment of the same nature on the Paper.

MR. BARCLAY: I sympathise very much with the desire to give the agricultural labourers a footing upon the land; but I think the system of hiring land for a limited period is so unsatisfactory that I cannot give it my support. It is necessary for the proper cultivation of the land that the men who hold it should hold it in perpetuity of tenure on certain known terms; and I think that object might be accomplished if we induced the Government to adopt the principle of the Irish Land Act by taking payments for the land by instalments extending over a period of years. He would then have the ownership of the land so long as he paid the instalments every year, and, at the same time, the security of the County Council would increase. I think you will find that a man taking land on a lease for 20 years will deem that period not sufficient to justify the expenditure of money on the land. I think the hon. Member, instead of pressing the Amendment, should take the alternative of pressing for the acceptance of the proposal to take payment for the land by instalments.

VOL. IV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

MR. CHANNING: This discussion, if I may say so, has been somewhat disorderly. The real question will come on in the next sub-section, and then the discussion can properly take place. I would suggest to my hon. Friend that, as his Amendment is open to serious objection, he would be wise in withdrawing it, and leaving the Amendment of the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton) in its place.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North West): I venture to say that the ten acres which my right hon. Friend proposes the County Council should be allowed to let is amply sufficient for all purposes at present. My right hon. Friend has stated that this is an experimental measure. Surely, when we find that everybody wants to rent land, then will be the time to consider the subject. There are at this moment many landlords who are anxious, ready, and willing, to let to any small tenant land of the kind in question. I myself should be exceedingly glad to find small tenants wanting to rent land. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not go one inch further than he has done in the direction of leasing, because I am certain it would be a step in the wrong direction.

MR. H. GARDNER: I rise to meet one argument which has been used by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin). He pointed out that one reason why this Bill should pass is because there are many agricultural labourers who have now become by industry and thrift occupiers of land. Yes, they are occupiers of land, but they are not owners, and the whole point is that by this Bill they are to become owners. The fact that there are men who have risen from the position of agricultural labourers in this country to be farmers is in no way an argument why we should not lease land. On the other hand, it is the strongest reason why we should lease land. Therefore, the argument that the right hon. Gentleman has advanced tells more against himself.

*MR. CHAPLIN: What I said was this. I referred to gentlemen now farming on their own account who have risen from the position of agricultural labourers, to prove, not that it is necessary they should become owners of land, but that they would have sufficient money to pay down, under the provisions of this Act, to purchase small holdings.

MR. H. GARDNER: That explanation seems to tend still further in our direction, because it is obvious that agricultural labourers must be assisted to farm more than ten acres in order that they may save sufficient money to purchase land for themselves and become the yeoman class which we desire to see. It seems to me that leasing should be put on an equality with purchase in this Act, and it is in this direction I shall vote. I venture to think that some of the Amendments which follow more completely raise the issue than this one does. At the same time, if my hon. Friend goes to a Division I shall support him.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS: I venture to join in the appeal which has been made from every quarter of the House to extend the operation of the Bill in the direction now sought. As has been already said, this proposal of my hon. Friend is only a question of degree, and not one of principle. Not only is the principle conceded by the right hon. Gentleman himself in Sub-section 2, but it is also conceded in Section 8, where the County Council are authorised not only to sell lands in accordance with the rules and terms of the Act, but to sell lands, if they happen to be superfluous, upon any terms they please. Therefore there is no question of principle involved. Now, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he thinks it is safe to pass the 2nd sub-section if he adheres to the opinion that it is unsafe to adopt my hon. Friend's Amendment? The right hon. Gentleman has referred to Local Authorities as bodies not very well qualified to manage estates. Well, I do not think the management of estates by Local Authorities would come into operation very much. Once they had leased or let the land for occupation they would not have to manage the estates as if they kept the land in their own hands. In the interest of the Bill, in order to carry out the objects of the promoters, that of bringing the labourers step by step, if necessary, into actual ownership of the land, and inasmuch as the question of principle has been conceded, I venture to hope that the right hon. Gentleman will help to make the Bill much more thorough and comprehensive and satisfactory by accepting the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

*MR. CHAPLIN: Hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to be of opinion that the Local Authorities should have as much power to let land as they have to sell it. The Government, on the other hand, is still of opinion that it is desirable in the first instance, if possible, that they should sell it. That opinion is founded on reasons which I have submitted to the Committee, and to which no sufficient answer has been given to induce me to change my view. The reasons are that it is desirable, where possible, that the land shall be sold instead of let, so that the Local Authorities shall not be placed in the position of landowners. I have recognised from the first that it is inevitable some land will have to be let by them, but I do not think it is desirable to extend that provision more largely than is necessary. I am obliged, therefore, to adhere to the proposition which I have made, which really comes to this, that land is to be offered for sale in the first instance. If it is not sold, and cannot be sold, then the Local Authorities are empowered to let. I hope the Committee are now sufficiently well acquainted with the point under discussion to allow them to come to a decision.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: There is one point I must mention. The success of this Bill depends upon the goodwill of the ratepayers, of whom there will be twenty or thirty to every tenant or owner of land. I can quite understand that the ratepayers will allow the County Councils to buy land for the purpose of creating peasant proprietors, and that they will allow a certain amount of letting of land. But if, under the proposals of my hon. Friend, the County Councils are to enter into gigantic land speculations with all the possible financial dangers, I say that the ratepayers will not allow this Act to be adopted.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 112; Noes 164.—(Div. List, No. 112.)

(10.32.) MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON: I have three Amendments on the Paper. The first is in page 2, line 18, to leave out from "where" to "tenants" in line 22 inclusive. The second, which is merely consequential, is in line 22, after "the," to insert "county," and the third in line 22 leave out from "which" to "extent" in line 23. The effect of this Amendment will be to make that part of the clause read—

"The County Council may in the case of any small holding, instead of offering it for sale, offer to let it in accordance with the Rules under this Act."

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Amendment is inconsistent with the action of the Committee on previous Amendments.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON: I submit, Sir, that the first part of the Amendment would be in order, and I trust that this Amendment will be accepted by the Government, because the sub-section as it now stands deals only with abnormal conditions, whereas this Amendment is intended to meet cases which are not abnormal, but normal. The first words in the section appear to be more or less unnecessary, and I think they might very well be omitted. Accepting this Amendment will not interfere with the subsequent Amendment of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre).

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 18, to leave out from the word "where" to the word "tenants," in line 22.—(Mr. Francis Stevenson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Gentleman said there would be no difficulty if I accepted this Amendment; but there is this difficulty, that it raises practically the question we have been discussing the last hour and a half, and on which we have already voted.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The object of my hon. Friend's Amendment is that in the case of holdings under ten acres the Local Authority should have absolute freedom to either sell or let.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I do not care to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, who has made no concession yet; but I want to recall what he promised. He said he would carefully consider the question, and try to meet us when we got to Sub-section 2 of Clause 3.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I am going to make a concession directly, by accepting the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre).

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: We already have that in black and white; but it was after you had accepted the Amendment that you promised to further consider the matter. A long discussion was finished up with these words by the right hon. Gentleman—

"I take it to be a general understanding that leasing powers should be included in the Bill in respect of all holdings where no buildings are necessary. I should be perfectly willing to fairly and fully consider that point, though without absolutely pledging myself upon it."

I want to know what the result of this "full and fair consideration" is. When the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Bradford is accepted the County Council will have to be of opinion that persons desirous of buying and themselves cultivating small holdings are unable to buy. How unfair that is to the agricultural labourer! There might be many labourers to whom the County Council might say, "You have £20 in your pocket and you can buy." But the man might have a large family, and therefore prefer to rent, or he might have views as to his future, and, therefore, not wish to tie himself to one spot of land or one parish. Why should you prevent him being a tenant for the first few years, and then buying if it proves to be to his interest and if he likes? We want to make it clear by this Clause that the County Council shall have absolute power to let up to ten acres, where no buildings are required, to persons desirous of cultivating without any other condition.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): The right hon. Gentleman is going to accept the Amendment of my right hon. Friend, and I cannot see why, if he is going to admit that some of the small holders shall be tenants, he should keep in the words "buying and." The right hon. Gentleman has already conceded the point, and if he will not drop all the words of the Amendment, he might drop out the words "buying and."

*MR. CHAPLIN: The words "buying and" are in reference to Clause 1, but I am prepared to leave out those words.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON: If the right hon. Gentleman will drop those words, I withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "buying and."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 20, to leave out all after "Act," to "the," in line 22.—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Question put, and negatived.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I beg to move the omission of the word, "In the case of any holding which does not exceed ten acres in extent," my object being that the County Council shall have power to let holdings of larger extent than ten acres. Ten acres is an arbitrary limit, and I do not see why if they can let ten acres they should not be able to let eleven or twelve or any other number of acres. I hope the Amendment, which is a fair and moderate one, will be accepted.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 22, to leave out all after "may," to "extent," in line 23.—(Mr. Esslemont.)

*MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Gentleman is quite right in saying that this is an arbitrary limit, but I have taken it because it was recommended in the Report of the Select Committee, and that appears to me a good reason in a case of this sort, as opposed to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman, which fixes no limit whatever. I cannot accept the Amendment, as I think it very undesirable that land should be let to any extent.

*SIR W. FOSTER: A great many of us think that the ten acre limit is much too low, and I think the discussion might be much simplified if the right hon. Gentleman would extend the limit to 20 acres. I am sure that this would be a concession on the part of the right hon. Gentleman which would be very acceptable on this side of the House, and very acceptable in the country generally, to the agricultural labourers, and other people concerned.

(10.51.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The claim is made on behalf of the agricultural labourer, of whom we have heard a good deal in the course of this Debate; and we are told that the agricultural labourer is a person who, by no conceivable circumstances, can be expected to have saved any considerable amount of money. We are, therefore, told that this Bill for the creation of small owners is perfectly useless, because the agricultural labourer who has not saved any money would not be able to pay the small sum which would be required as a deposit in order to reap the advantages conferred by the Act. And then comes the hon. Member who has just sat down, and other hon. Members, who claim that this same pauper agricultural labourer—"No, no!"—for that is their own statement—

SIR W. FOSTER: No, no; not pauper.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Pauper in the sense of being poor. That this poor agricultural labourer, who has no capital whatever, should be put in possession of a tenancy of 20 acres. Very well, how much capital is required to work a farm of 20 acres? In order to work a farm of 20 acres, so that it may pay, a man must have at least a capital of £200. If he has a capital of £200, I say it would be very much better for him and very much better for the country that he should become a small owner under this Bill.

(10.52.) SIR W. FOSTER: My point is this—the right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to misrepresent what I said.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I submit to you, Sir, if that is in order? The hon. Member says that I have endeavoured to misrepresent what he said.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have called the hon. Member to order, and I must ask him to withdraw.

*SIR W. FOSTER: The point I wish to raise—"Order, order!"—I withdraw at once to satisfy the Chair. What I wish to say is that my point was not put in the way in which I intended it to be put. I would add that I hope the agricultural labourer will not be limited to ten acres; and I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman opposite to allow him to have an opportunity of getting beyond that limit. A man may be poor at the commencement, and yet he may in time, by his industry, be capable of adding on five acres, and later on he may be able to take ten acres. We want him to have the opportunity of going on beyond ten acres up to twenty acres. Surely those who profess to be the friends of the agricultural labourer ought to sympathise with us in this. We have heard something about the ladder this evening. I want to make the ladder have one or two rungs more, so that the agricultural labourer can raise himself higher; and I think I ought to have the sympathy of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division, as well as of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham in this matter. I assure the right hon. Gentleman opposite that this is a concession which will be very useful and very popular in the country. The amount of money which the agricultural labourer requires to stock his land has been over-stated. He does not want £10 an acre, nor half of it. If an agricultural labourer has £40 or £50, it would be much better spent in the position of a tenant than in purchasing land in order to become the owner. It is to give him an opportunity of using his money to the best possible purpose that I ask the right hon. Gentleman for the small concession of extending the letting of it from ten acres to twenty acres.

(10.54.) MR. H. GARDNER: I venture to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I do so with some hope and confidence, because the right hon. Gentleman who is passing this Bill through the House, even in the last words he has used, seems to have more sympathy for the agricultural labourer than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, because he has given us some hope that he will extend the limit of ten acres as I understand him only just now. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has very much over-stated the amount of capital which would be necessary for an agricultural labourer to work a holding of 20 acres; and I speak of that with some experience. But if you take it at £200, as the right hon. Gentleman said, it is quite obvious that to work 100 acres he would require £100; and my experience of the agricultural labourer is that it would be as difficult for him to produce £100 as £200. Therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman's idea of the amount of capital is a correct one, and that we must adopt the limit of ten acres which he prefers, it would be equally difficult for the agricultural labourer to work that quantity as it would be to work 20 acres.

*(10.56.) COLONEL EYRE: In considering the letting value of land, the hon. Gentleman entirely forgot the value of the tenant right, which, in all probability, taking an average clay farm and the four-course system, would range from £7 to £1 or £2 an acre. He omitted that altogether from his calculation, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is perfectly right.

(10.57.) MR. ESSLEMONT: Why, we were told not long ago by many right hon. Gentlemen that it was quite possible for an agricultural labourer, a saving man, to work his way to a farm which would employ a pair of horses, and the hon. Member for Forfarshire, who ought to know something about these matters, said that was a very proper limit for him to go to, namely, a farm that he could work with a pair of horses. But now we have the dictum laid down that we are not going a step beyond ten acres for the agricultural labourer. If that be so, what use is the right hon. Gentleman's Bill? I admit that some limit should be fixed; but what I fail to see is that the right hon. Gentleman has given any reason whatever why we should have the limit of ten acres, and why it should not be left to the discretion of the County Council either to let or sell according to the circumstances of the case. There is no reason that I can see for this limit except the Report of this Committee, but the Report of this Committee is not like the law of the Medes and Persians which could not be changed.

*(11.0.) MR. CHAPLIN: I am inclined to doubt very much if this concession would be anything like so very acceptable to the agricultural labourers as hon. Gentlemen seem to imagine. I dare say I have had as many opportunities of meeting the agricultural labourers and of obtaining their views, especially on the merits of this Bill, as any Gentleman in this House. I can say without exaggeration that I have met some hundreds, I might say thousands, of agricultural labourers, and explained the Bill to them precisely as it stands now; and from all the agricultural labourers that I have met, both in public and in private, I never heard one single suggestion made to me that the limit of ten acres should be exceeded. The agricultural labourers are exceedingly practical men; they know perfectly well what they can do, and what they cannot do. They thoroughly understand the land and its management quite as well as any farmer in the country. I am perfectly confident of this, that if there had been any general desire, such as is supposed to exist among hon. Gentlemen opposite for an increase of the limit of ten acres to twenty acres, on the part of the agricultural labourers themselves, I should have been one of the very first to have heard of it. I must say that I agree altogether with my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. He was instrumental in forwarding through the Committee the Bill which is now before the House; and I do not think that anybody deserves more credit for this Bill than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham.

(11.1.) MR. BARCLAY: I would be disposed to support this Amendment in the interest of the County Councils. If the County Councils were unable to let all their land, the Amendment would have this effect, that it would enable them to let the surplus to some person to whom land had been already let, and who might want more. The clause, as it stands, would, as I understand it, prevent them from doing this.

(11.2.) MR. HALDANE: This is a matter of some importance, and as it is now after eleven o'clock, I beg to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Haldane.)

(11.3.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I entirely understand the wish of hon. Gentlemen opposite to get to the other important business.

before the House, and I desire to meet their views by proceeding as rapidly with the discussion as possible. But I think we might without difficulty dispose of this clause before the other important business is taken, as I believe, and my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) says, there is nothing controversial in the rest of the clause.

(11.3.) MR. CHANNING: In supporting the Motion to Report Progress I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that he said he did not attach much importance to the number, ten acres. I think the discussion has not gone sufficiently into the merits of the case whether or not we should enlarge the ten acres to twenty acres, unless the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to accept some limit which would meet the views of other hon. Members. I think it is only quite reasonable that you should report Progress in order to afford time to consider the question, and I beg to support the Motion.

*(11.4.) MR. CHAPLIN: It is true that I made that statement to which the hon. Gentleman refers. But the reason why I have not accepted the Amendment is because, with great respect to hon. Gentlemen, I have not heard any reason advanced in support of the Amendment, contrary to my own knowledge, which would induce me to do so. I admit that this is a matter of very extreme importance, and if I can see my way to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen I shall be willing to accept 15 acres. I also wish to point out that I made one error in the observations which I made just now as to the character of this clause. There is, I observe, an Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Devon which is an important Amendment.

SIR W. FOSTER: If "fifteen acres" were inserted that would meet our views.

(11.5.) MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will bring this clause into harmony with the 2nd sub-section of Clause 1 by fixing a money limit as well. The sub-section would then read—

"Which either does not exceed fifteen acres, or if exceeding fifteen acres, is of the annual value, for the purposes of the income-tax, not exceeding £15."

(11.7.) DR. CLARK: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will now agree to report Progress, in order that this question may be considered by the Minister for Agriculture, and because the understanding was that at eleven o'clock we would begin to discuss the very important question raised by the motion of my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not think my hon. Friend has heard what the right hon. Gentleman has said. He has undertaken, in order to close the discussion, to make it fifteen acres.

MR. HALDANE: I do not think fifteen acres is what we should like in Scotland, but in order to shorten discussion I shall ask leave to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I am wishful that the Committee should recognise that we are willing to meet concessions as far as possible, and although I can see no harm in removing the limit altogether, I shall in the interests of business withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 22, after the word "which," to insert the word "either." — (Mr. Halley Stewart.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 23, to leave out the word "ten," and insert the word "fifteen." — (Mr. Chaplin.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 23, after the word "extent," to insert the words, "or if exceeding fifteen acres, is of the annual value, for the purposes of the income-tax, not exceeding £15." — (Mr. Halley Stewart.)

Amendment agreed to.

(11.10.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: My Amendment is a very simple Amendment, and one which the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee will, I think, be able to accept without any difficulty.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, after the word "Act," in line 24, to insert the words,—"The County Council shall have power to let one or more small holdings of not more than fifteen acres each to a number of persons working on a co-operative system, provided the same be approved by the County Council."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(11.12.) MR. CHAPLIN: There is no necessity for this Amendment as far as I understand it. There is nothing to prevent the County Council doing the very thing which the hon. Member proposes in his Amendment.

(11.13.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: It is quite true that they can let 15 acres to A, 15 acres to B, and 15 acres to C; but according to the Bill, as I read it, they cannot let three or four 15 acres conjointly to a number of people. The Amendment cannot do any harm.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I accept it.

DR. CLARK: I beg again to move that you report Progress. A quarter of an hour has already passed since the hour agreed upon by the right hon. Gentleman for the discussion of the Scotch Universities Commission, and I trust he will give us the time agreed upon, and not keep us here till three or four o'clock.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I trust that, as there is no objection to this Amendment, it will be allowed to pass. That will not cost any time, whereas if we are to discuss the question a considerable time will be wasted. The hon. Gentleman below me will not find that there will be any delay if he allows the Amendment to be carried to which there is no objection.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): Will the hon. Member for Bordesley explain what he means by the words "the same" in his Amendment?

DR. CLARK: I beg to move that the Chairman do report Progress. It was a clear understanding that we should commence the Scotch Universities Commission at eleven o'clock.

Mr. Jesse Collings

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Dr. Clark.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must remind the hon. Member that what I said was that, if we made good progress with the Bill, at eleven o'clock or soon after I would report Progress. I hope the hon. Gentleman will not persist in his proposal.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that something else has happened. We were engaged in discussing a knotty point whether the Committee should accept ten acres or fifteen acres. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill said, "If you bring this discussion to an end, in order that we may pass to the other Bill, I will accept the Amendment." It was understood both on the part of the Government and the Members on this side of the House that when that matter was disposed of we should pass to other business. If we are to go on and finish the clause, we do not know how long the other Amendments may take, and in the end nothing substantial will have been done.

*MR. CHAPLIN: The right hon. Gentleman has misunderstood what I said. What I said was that we should finish the clause, there being only five Amendments on the Paper, some of which I had already agreed to accept. I propose to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bordesley.

Question put.

(11.18.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 117; Noes 192.—(Div. List, No. 113.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(11.28.) DR. FARQUHARSON: As a pledge was given that the discussion on the Scotch Universities question should come on at 11 o'clock, and it is now half-past eleven, I shall move that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Dr. Farquharson.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I would point out that the hon. Member cannot make the Motion in that form, and that of the 30 minutes since 11 o'clock, 25 of them were occupied in the preliminary discussion of the Motion which has just been rejected. For that reason I cannot agree to the proposition, and I hope the hon. Member will withdraw it.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member withdraw his Motion?

*DR. FARQUHARSON: I will withdraw it and move to report Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Dr. Farquharson.)

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MOTIONS.

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND), ORDINANCES.—RESOLUTION.

*(11.33.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): In rising to propose the Motion which stands in my name, I wish to explain the spirit in which I bring it forward. The last thing I desire to do is to cast any reflection on the distinguished men who have given their services and devoted so much trouble to the work of this Commission. It would be impossible for the House to undertake the task of tinkering the Ordinances. It can only consider general principles in connection with them, and it is in that spirit that this Motion is brought forward. Now, the Commissioners have issued certain Ordinances, and have left aside other Ordinances which deal with the Universities and their machinery, and I submit that until we have them all before us we cannot come to a judgment with regard to the whole scheme. The points of substance on which I rely are points which were raised in the discussion on the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889. There were certain points then raised upon which the Scotch Members were practically unanimous. One of them was that there should be a very large extension of the teaching power of the Universities. I do not mean necessarily in extra-mural teaching, but in real organisation of the professoriate to enable professors to cover more topics, and with a view to increasing the number of professors. The Scotch Universities stand in a peculiar position. They have relatively large funds; but they pay, or did pay, under the old system some very high salaries, and we felt that in the future we ought to use the funds more widely and economically in reorganising the teaching staff not only in relation to extra-mural teaching, but in reorganising and multiplying Chairs. There was another point we were all agreed upon. We desired to see the examination system of the Universities improved. We all remember the Debate on the recent occasion in reference to a teaching University for London, and there were two points of view. The one sought to provide a purely teaching body, the other an examining body, the teaching machinery to be altogether subordinate. But in regard to the Scotch Universities, teaching is a very important part of the question. We want to see teaching reorganised and improved, and the addition of a stronger examining body not entirely independent, but standing in a sort of reciprocal connection. Then we desire to see a chest established into which all fees of students should go, and that the contents should be used in apportioning the salaries of professors and lecturers in a way which does not obtain under the present system, where fees are received by individual professors. These are the three main points upon which I think we were all agreed, and we expected to see that carried out in the Ordinances of the Commission. But when we come to these Ordinances we find ourselves in a great difficulty. It may be that the Commissioners intend to appoint a University chest. I have heard that this is so, but the Ordinance for the purpose is not before us, and we have no opportunity of saying what the position will be in regard to lectureships, or if professtudy to pathology and physiology, and had attended some course of medicine. But after the Ordinance had been before the professors, a distinct change was introduced and I do not know on what grounds. Pharmacy has been reduced to 25 courses, which I say is wholly insufficient for proper study. Then the examinations in Materia Medica and therapeutics are transferred from the end of the fourth winter session to the end of the third winter session, and before the student knows anything of pathology. It is impossible to expect a student to have any intelligent or coherent apprehension of the action of drugs on diseases when he has no notion of the diseases these drugs are supposed to affect. As well expect to find professors in astronomical science without knowledge of mathematics, or a student to pass an examination in surgery without knowledge of anatomy. It is hopeless to expect any efficiency in the examining under such conditions; it is against the experience of those who know anything of the subject. The professors of Glasgow, Edinburgh and Aberdeen have petitioned in favour of the status quo that examinations shall be held at the end of the fourth year, and in the same sense there has been a petition from all the provincial lecturers on Materia Medica, as well as from all except one in London. I can say from my own experience as a lecturer that it is hopeless to expect a student to know therapeutics intelligently before he has attended a course of pathology and medicine. I shall be curious to hear what the objections are to restoring Materia Medica to its old position. I do not want to express any want of confidence in the Commissioners, who, I believe, left the consideration of the subject to the two medical members of the Commission. They are gentlemen of the highest ability and professional standing. Sir Arthur Mitchell is an acknowledged expert in lunacy matters, and as such I with great pleasure admit he stands at the top of the profession. Dr. P. H. Watson is equally eminent as a surgeon. Should I require a limb removed with celerity and safety there is no man I would rather trust myself to than Dr. Watson. But neither of these gentlemen carry authority in reference to the teaching of Materia Medica which should out-balance the opinion of all the professors of the Scotch Universities, and the almost unanimous opinion of lecturers in favour of the old plan. I may be told I am making too much of Materia Medica, but I say it is quite impossible to make too much of it. The treatment of diseases by drugs is the culminating point, the apex in the medical student's career. All the study culminates in the making of prescriptions. It is all very well for a man to say he has no faith in drugs. I do not say that, and no man of experience will deny the benefit of a judicious use of remedial drugs. The public demand drugs, and medical men fulfil their expectations. It is not always sufficient to cut off a man's leg or his liquor, drugs must be used to cope with diseases, and so I say the study of the medical student culminates in his written prescription for his patient; and this is a question of the highest importance not only to the student but to the general community, or that portion medical men have under their charge. I do not ask for anything revolutionary; I only ask for the replacement of the old status quo. I second the proposal of my hon. and learned Friend, with whose remarks I generally though not absolutely agree, to refer these Ordinances back to the Commissioners for reconsideration. To adopt this Ordinance (15) will be to take a retrograde step—it will injure medical teaching and practice; and I strongly urge upon hon. Members that the House will incur a serious responsibility if it backs up the Commissioners against the united opinion of those experts best qualified to form an opinion on the subject.

*(12.1.) MR. JEBB (Cambridge University): I should scarcely have presumed to intervene in this discussion were it not for the circumstance that during several years, and until a recent date, I had the honour of holding a professorship in the University of Glasgow, and so have had the opportunity of forming a judgment upon some at least of the matters now under discussion. I shall not attempt to cover the whole field presented by these Ordinances. I will deal with only a few definite points, and with these as concisely as possible. Some of the points mentioned by the hon. Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane), whose speech I listened to with great interest, I will notice; but on the other hand I will not attempt to follow the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire into the medical department of the subject. Nor shall I confine myself to the points noticed in the speeches of those two hon. Members, because we know that the grounds upon which these Ordinances are exposed to criticism within and without the House extend over a still larger area. At the outset I would pray for that indulgence which the generous usage of the House extends to one who addresses it for the first time, and I appeal to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to dismiss from their minds any prepossession they may be disposed to entertain towards one who as a former professor in a Scotch University might be supposed to hold a brief for academic privilege. Like hon. Gentlemen opposite, I approach the subject with no thought or aim but that of discovering what is for the true interests of the Scotch Universities, and though I am not so sanguine as to hope that I shall convince hon. Members opposite, I am sure they will bear with me while I try to state clearly some of the reasons which weigh with me in supporting the Ordinances and declining to assent to the Motion now before the House. Now, there can be no doubt that one of the broadest grounds on which exception has been taken to the Ordinances as a whole is the ground which was indicated, if I am not mistaken, in the vigorous speech of the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) on Thursday afternoon, namely, that the Ordinances as a whole do not recognise the principle of extra-mural teaching. Before touching on the question of the lecturers and assistants to which the hon. Member for Haddington has referred, I think it is indispensable to indicate the particular reasons which have weighed with thoughtful men like the Commissioners against admitting the principle of extra-mural teaching into their proposals for legislation. It will be within the memory of many that the principle of extra-mural teaching, or rather the question of extending that principle from the Faculty of Medicine to the Faculty of Arts, was one of the questions before the Commission of 1878. They dealt with some of the arguments for and against the principle of extra-mural teaching in their Report, Section 9. The first argument in favour of the proposal was an argument from analogy. No one questions that the principle of extra-mural teaching has worked well in the Faculty of Medicine; and so it is argued by friends of the principle, "Why should it not work well in the Faculty of Arts?" Then the second argument is that competition would be a good thing for the professors themselves, and would afford an incentive to exertion where such might be needed. Then, thirdly, it has been pointed out with great force that if a particular professor happens to be inefficient it is hard that the student should have no alternative teaching. Now, with reference to the first and second arguments, counter-arguments were brought before the Commission of 1878. As to the alleged analogy between Medicine and Arts, it was pointed out the analogy was not a real one. The study of medicine is a professional study. The medical student, when he goes in for his examination, has his information tested, and it is of little moment where the information was acquired provided he has it. Beyond the examination is the ordeal of medical practice. The medical student has lost his time if his study, besides enabling him to pass his examination, does not suffice to render him an efficient practitioner. But the Faculty of Arts is in a different position—its aim is a liberal education, and there is no such test as there is for the Medical Faculty. It is true the examination in Arts can, to a certain point, test the knowledge of the student, and to a certain point enable the examiners to judge of the degree of his mental cultivation; but still it is of extreme importance that there should be a guarantee that the quality of the teaching is such as not only to enable a student to pass an examination, but to educate him. We must inquire, then, what would be the real effect of such competition as extra-mural teaching in Arts would introduce? What would be the effect on the extra-mural teacher on the one hand and the intra-mural professor on the other? Those who know Scotch and English Universities will agree with me—I am sure my hon. Friend opposite, the Member for South Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce), will do so—that it is of the greatest importance to the efficiency of a University that its teaching should not be cramped and fettered by habitual regard to examinations. That has hitherto been one of the best features of the Scotch Universities. The professors have taught a certain proportion of work required for examinations, but they have taught a great deal more besides; and, moreover, the standard of their teaching, both in regard to the ordinary degree and with a view to honours, has been higher than the standard required in the respective examinations. Now, suppose extra-mural teaching was instituted, what will be the quality of the teaching given as a general rule by the extra-mural teacher? Let me at once meet a possible objection. I am not assuming that among the extra-mural teachers there will not be a considerable number of men whose aims in teaching are as high as those of any professor, and whose capacity is adequate to such aims; but I wish to point out that by force of circumstances, by stress of competition with other extra-mural teachers and with professors, they will be practically compelled in almost all cases to teach with a view to examinations. What will be the effect of that on the professors? The professor who finds his class dwindling under stress of such competition will inevitably be tempted to meet his extra-mural rivals by lowering his standard. I hope and believe that in most cases this temptation will be resisted; but the fact that the proposal will expose professors to that temptation is in itself an argument against the proposal. It was on the consideration of these arguments that the Commission of 1878

came to the conclusion that it was not, on the whole, expedient to introduce extra-mural teaching into the Faculty of Arts. But they did allow full weight to one argument in its favour, namely, that if a professor is inefficient the student should have an alternative resource. Ordinance 17 destroys that argument, because by Section 9 the University Court is enabled to appoint a lecturer in a subject already taught—

“When, from the number of students, or any other cause, it appears to be necessary that provision should be made for increasing the teaching power in any of the said subjects (subjects which are already taught) within the University.”

Therefore, if the professor of a particular subject happens to be inefficient, it will be in the power of the University Court to appoint a lecturer in his subject. But there is a still larger question to be considered. What would be the probable effect on the general character of the Scotch Universities? If the lectures of the extra-mural teachers are to count for graduation, there can be no reason to restrict the privilege to such extra-mural teachers who reside in the University towns or their immediate neighbourhood. It was observed on Thursday by the hon. Member for Caithness that many a schoolmaster in Scotland is capable of teaching for a University degree. I entirely agree with him, and I am sure he would not confine that statement to schoolmasters living at St. Andrew's, Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Glasgow. But if extra-mural teachers living anywhere were to teach for a University degree, then students need no longer resort to the University for teaching, and the University would tend, so far, to become a mere centre for purposes of examination. The Universities of Scotland have hitherto been teaching as well as examining bodies, and I am sure that the great majority of their friends desire that they should preserve that character. I sympathise with the reasonable wish which is at the basis of the demand for extra-mural teaching, though I do not believe that extra-mural teaching is the best way to carry out that wish. There is nothing, I think, more desirable, more urgently needed, than that the Scotch Universities should open an academic career to such of their own graduates as have proved pre-eminent capacity for such a career; and one of the grounds upon which I most cordially welcome the Ordinances—though I do not say they are perfect—is that they take a long and most important step in that most desirable, I might say necessary, direction. Now, I invite the House to consider briefly what will be the effect of Ordinance 17 in so far as it relates to lecturers and assistants. A lecturer can be appointed by the University Court either in subjects not already taught within the University or in subjects which are already taught. Objections have been made to these regulations on several grounds, and I will mention the chief of these, so far as I am aware of them. First, it is urged that there will be no competition between the lecturer and the professor, and that, therefore, the competitive principle on which the friends of extra-muralism insist is not recognised. Now, that is not the case. When the subject of the lectureship is one not already taught in the University, the lecturer will have the field to himself; but when it is a subject already taught, then the lecturer will compete with the professor in one of two ways. If the lecturer takes a special branch of the subject, which has not been usually or fully covered by the professor, such special branch will be an alternative which the candidate for a degree may take, instead of the branch or branches taught by the professor. Here, then, there will be indirect competition, since the student may choose between the part taught by the lecturer and that taught by the professor. If, on the other hand, the lecturer traverses the same ground as the professor, then there is, of course, direct competition. It is true that, under Section 10, the University Court may determine that the teaching of a lecturer shall not count for graduation; but the case thus contemplated is an exceptional one—namely, when the subject is too narrow to be fairly allowed as an option in graduation. The whole spirit of the Ordinances shows clearly that, as a rule, the lectures of the lecturer are intended to count for graduation just as much as those given by the professor. The second objection raised is that the lecturers will have no independence—that the lecturers will be dependent on the Senatus—that is, the professors. The 12th section of Ordinance 17 provides—

“They (the lecturers) shall be bound to conform to all regulations with respect to their teaching arrangements which may be made from time to time by the Senatus, after consultation with the Board of Studies or the Faculty concerned, and any questions between them and the professors shall be determined by the Senatus, with appeal to the University Court.”

This regulation merely expresses the fact that the lecturers are to hold a definite place as members of an organised academic body. Each individual professor is similarly subject, in respect of teaching arrangements, to his Board of Studies, and so ultimately to the Senatus. (Ordinance 11, Sect. 18.) Without such an arrangement the work of a large University staff could not be carried on; and I venture to think that the so-called “independence” would in practice be another name for academic anarchy. Again, it has been argued that the lecturers will be reduced to the status of assistants to the professors; but that is really an inversion of the fact. Under Section 13 an assistant can be made also a lecturer; but in such a case it will be the status of the person who is an assistant which will be raised, not the office of the lecturer that will be lowered. It is further objected that, when a lecturer is also an assistant, his tenure of his lectureship will be insecure, because, if the professor does not recommend his assistantship to be continued at the end of the year, it will be difficult for him to retain his lectureship. But in Ordinance 17, Section 11, it is provided that the University Court shall be the “sole and final judges” of any question of culpa in a lecturer. The Court would not dismiss a lecturer merely because he had proved unsuited to an assistantship. A man might be unsatisfactory as an assistant, and yet be a very good lecturer. Further, the University Court will have entire financial control, and could compensate a lecturer whom it held to have been unjustly deprived of his assistantship. A most important feature of these proposals is the improved status given to the assistants; they are made officers of the University, and the University Court can grade them in regard to emoluments. It is true that the University Court appoint assistants on the recommendation of the professors; but it is necessary that the professor should be satisfied as to the competence of the assistant, and should be able to work harmoniously with him. Then as to the new Boards of Studies. It is objected that these are intended to give to the Senatus a stricter control over the students and non-professorial teachers. It is enough to observe that the object of these Boards of Studies is to insure a higher organisation of studies. The lecturers are represented upon them, and they give a better position to the lecturers by associating them on a footing of equality with the professors. It is the reverse of the fact to say that these Boards are in the interest of the professors as distinguished from the lecturers. Exception has been taken to the complex restrictions imposed for degrees in Arts; but I ask the House to remember that these restrictions are necessary, because of the numerous options as to subjects which the new Ordinances offer to students. They are necessary in order that the student may not pick out easy subjects, or parts of subjects, and form for himself too easy a road to a degree. The restrictions are to insure that the various courses shall be fairly equivalent in point of difficulty, and that each course shall have a certain unity. Lastly, it is objected that too much power is given to the Senatus or professorial body, and too little to the University Court; but that is contrary to the fact. The University Court is the supreme administrative body, and it is representative in the most comprehensive sense. In Edinburgh and Glasgow it consists of 14 members, and represents the General Council, that is the whole body of graduates; it represents the students, through their Lord Rector and his assessor, usually appointed after consultation with the students; it represents the Municipal Authority in the person of the Provost or Lord Provost and a member elected by the Town Council; and it represents the Senatus or teaching body. This Court, thus thoroughly representative, has absolute control of the finances. The Senatus is given the functions of teaching and discipline; but on any point within the competence of the Senatus there is an appeal to the University Court. The Ordinances simply follow this general demarcation of provinces, as laid down in the Act of 1889. Viewed as a whole, these Ordinances represent an attempt to promote the natural growth and expansion of the Scotch Universities from within. They represent an attempt to bring about a higher, larger, and more effective organisation; one in which a place shall be found for some, at least, of the ablest and most qualified teachers who can be found among the graduates of the Universities; an organisation, too, in which a place shall be given to every branch of study which ought to be included in an academic system. In contrast with such an organisation, the extra-mural system would surround the Universities with an indefinitely large fringe of teachers not related to any system, but each following the impulse of individual enterprise, each selecting his subject at will, less with a view to the interest of the academic commonwealth than to the prospect of successful competition. Speaking from personal knowledge of at least one Scotch University, I do not hesitate to say that these Ordinances as a whole are a large and important measure of reform. I respectfully thank the House for the indulgence shown to me; and, in conclusion, I earnestly appeal to hon. Members opposite to consider whether the good contained in these Ordinances does not far outweigh such defects as they may find there. I ask them to reflect whether the object which they and I have in view—the welfare of the Scotch Universities—will not be better promoted by now accepting these large benefits, than by a course of action which, if successful, might possibly defer the prospect of all academic reform in Scotland to an uncertain future.

*SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.) : I must congratulate the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down upon the admirable and lucid speech to which I am sure everyone in the House must have listened with the greatest pleasure. Also I have to thank the two hon. Gentlemen who have spoken from this side of the House for the kind way in which they have alluded to the efforts which the Commissioners made to bring about a really lasting and useful reform in Scotch Universities. As to the special point, to which the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson) drew attention, I must say I think the House of Commons is not the proper body to discuss the intricate and difficult questions in relation to materia medica, whether it should have a course of 50 or 25 lectures, or whether the examination should be taken at the end of the third or of the fourth year of study. But I may assure my hon. Friend that the subject has received the most deliberate attention of the Commissioners, and that it was not without consultation that the change was made in this matter after the draft was passed. The Commissioners received both oral and written communications, and it was on the balance of evidence, after careful consideration, that the Commissioners decided to place materia medica in the position it now occupies in the Ordinance. But the particular points raised will, doubtless, be discussed—they ought to be—before the Privy Council, and parties will have the opportunity of bringing the subject forward, and of being heard by counsel—the right and proper course to take. With regard to the Medical Ordinance generally, I should like to say that the object of the Commissioners has been to lighten the burden which has hitherto pressed heavily upon medical students. We all know the complaints made, that the students are overburdened with lectures and work, and our object has been to put forward a curriculum by which a sound medical education can be given without overburdening the students with too heavy a mass of lectures and medical work. Passing from this to a subject mentioned by the hon. and learned Member for Hadding-ton (Mr. Haldane), who complained, and justly complained, that the Ordinances are not complete, I may say that no one can regret more than the Commissioners that this is so. But it was impossible for the Commissioners to report fully and wholly until the financial position was made clear to them, and it was but a few days since that this was made clear. Until the sum of £30,000 was voted, the total amount the Commissioners had in hand for any improvements which they might make was £14,000. With this sum they had to make the alterations, and the number of new professorships my hon. Friend referred to could not be created. For this and no other reason it was necessary either to wait until the whole matter was finished, or to issue the Ordinances one by one. I think we took the right course in issuing the Ordinances as we did. The hon. Member (Mr. Haldane) has urged the case of the German Universities. Now, we all know what the German Universities are. We know that they are supported entirely by the State, and that the whole system is one which in Scotland it is absolutely impossible at the present moment to endeavour to imitate. The number of professors in German Universities is, as my hon. Friend has stated, very large, and it is obvious that it was perfectly impossible for the Commission to attempt to apply the German system to Scotland. The question of extramural teaching has been so ably handled by the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Jebb) that I think I need say nothing on that point. In regard to the teaching of women, the hon. Member (Mr. Haldane) complains that women are not placed on exactly the same footing with men. I must say that is not the case. We have given them certain retrospective privileges which are not allowed to men, and we have endeavoured to do all we can to place them on exactly the same footing as men in the future. We have had no objection raised by women themselves, and we believe that from what we learn they are perfectly satisfied with the Ordinances as they stand. I trust the House will support the Commissioners. Let me add that the Commissioners have endeavoured to make an arrangement by which the professors shall not be directly dependent on the fees of their own classes. There will be a fee fund, into which the fees of the different Faculties will be thrown, and a minimum fixed salary will be apportioned out of the revenues of the University for each professor. A maximum salary will also be recognised, but this will depend upon the total fee fund. In all these matters I believe we have the support of public opinion, and meet a real desire, that while upholding the dignity of the professorship—a matter we consider of great importance—we should take care that the emoluments should not depend on the fees of the class, but be a fixed sum, determined by the welfare and success of the University as a whole.

(12.50.) MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): With admiration I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Cambridge University in regard to conception, argument, and style, and I should have hesitated to rise in opposition to his line of argument but that I recognise in the hon. Gentleman himself a living refutation of his own argument. Is he not a brilliant example of the triumph of that extra-mural teaching identified with the two great English Universities? Are not the colleges in relation to the University of Cambridge a collection of separate houses for extra-mural teaching? Do not the colleges compete in those examinations which the hon. Member deprecates as the ruin of the highest culture? In my opinion, the Commissioners have erred in rejecting extra-mural teaching, and in that they have not carried out the spirit of the Statute, which mentions extra-mural teaching as, I think, to encourage it. I think in closing the door against extra-mural teaching the Commissioners are introducing the principle of protection into our scholastic institutions in Scotland. All the Scottish Universities are not equally provided with professors and teachers. They may, and some have, a larger number of teachers suitable to the different options given in Arts. The consequence will be that students desirous of degrees will flock to the better equipped Universities, still further impoverishing the poor and weakening the weak. It is important to have a choice of teachers, and I do not allow that the extra-mural teachers would be susceptible to those temptations the hon. Member has indicated. It is also foreign to the traditional character of the youth of Scotland that, ambitious of distinction, they should resort to the mere "grinder" or "crammer." I do not fear honourable competition in these matters; I refuse to believe that the competition will be degrading. Much may be said in favour of training your future supply of professors. To get the best men you must have the means of wide selection. It is unwise and foreign to our idea of a University to shut the teacher up in cloistered seclusion in the University, and I may suggest the importance of the diffusion of learning among the community. I know there are a great many people who owe a deal to the old curriculum. I think most of us think that the old curriculum has had a good effect on, and has done a great deal of good for, many of the present holders of it, and I think many may be under the impression that some of these new-fangled options perhaps promise more than they are able to perform. If I may quote the words of a distinguished holder I would say that they are more prominent in prospectus than they are likely to be in dividend. That preliminary examination is an actual discouragement, it is a positive discouragement to the degree that has been proposed for literature and language. This is certainly a most excellent option, but aspirants are compelled to go through the highest preliminary examination in five or six subjects as contrasted with the fact that some other degrees require only two subjects. And then the position in which these Ordinances leave the Greek language is a matter which fills me with melancholy. I am not one of those who insist upon compulsory Greek for all people and for all purposes. There are certain persons whom Nature has made incapable of appreciating Greek, whether compulsory or voluntary, and to insist upon forcing it upon such unfortunates is a cruelty and is unworthy of the end of the nineteenth century. But there are other people whose highest possible usefulness in this world is bound up with a thorough knowledge and possession of the Greek language, and of all that is implied in the possession of that key to an immense repository of knowledge. I say people who insist upon compulsory Greek for all are not more foolish than those who refuse to have compulsory Greek for anybody. I hope there never will come a time in the history of this country when there shall not be under the ægis of our educational legislation a class of scholars suited to Greek, and to whom Greek is suited in order to keep alive—and here I am sure I shall carry with me the consent of every intellectual and thoroughly educated person in this Assembly, which of course means the whole Assembly which I am allowed to address—this great language. I hope there never will be such an evil day when one of the most important chapters in the history of man and in the history of human thought shall be a sealed book to any of the intelligent persons in such a country as this, but that they will, either through first hand or through the secondary evidence of friends whom they can approach—though they cannot obtain it as clearly and directly from this source as can be done from the original fountains of thought and beauty—obtain a knowledge of what the Greek community were enabled to bestow upon mankind for their everlasting instruction and delight.

(1.5.) MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I think the main ground of complaint in the Debate to-night has been directed against the failure of the Commissioners to introduce extra-mural teaching. I would like, first of all, before touching upon that point, to acknowledge the assistance which the Commissioners have received from the eloquent remarks of my hon. Friend who has just sat down, on the subject of Greek. I think we all agree with what he said. We should have been glad to do more for Greek if we could, and I am glad he has answered by anticipation the objections of some hon. Friends of mine who consider that we have already done too much for Greek. With regard to extra-mural teaching,

I think I may test the weight of the arguments against it by the remarks which my Friend who has just sat down made with regard to the English Universities. He said with reference to the speech of the hon. Member for Cambridge University that he himself, his career and his speech, furnished the best argument that could be made in favour of extra-mural teaching. That is an argument which, I think, can hardly have been seriously advanced—certainly it could not be seriously advanced by anyone who was acquainted with the working of the English Universities. It is absurd to compare the college system of Oxford and Cambridge with the extra-mural teaching which is demanded now for the Scotch Universities. In the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge the students are in statu pupillari. They are under the care of the University, and they form members of a large and important corporation. We have no objection to see that system introduced into the Scotch Universities. We should welcome the establishment of more colleges in the University. There have not been in previous time more colleges than one in the Scotch Universities, and we have the amplest powers—and we shall be glad to see them exercised—of affiliating several colleges; but that has nothing in common with the licensing of individual men of whose qualifications very little may be known, and recognising their lectures for graduation. The point we start from is this: The Scotch Universities are teaching Universities. They have been teaching Universities, and, in our opinion, they ought to remain teaching Universities. We do not desire that they should be, or that they should approximate to be, mere examining bodies. If I am not mistaken, my hon. Friend who has just sat down, in the Debates when this Bill was passing through the House of Commons, boldly took up the view that Universities ought to be examining bodies. He took the view that we had no right to inquire where the knowledge was obtained so long as the knowledge was there. We respectfully and unanimously join issue with those who attack our Ordinances on this ground. We think that the Universities ought to be primarily teaching bodies. Let me examine for a moment or two the observations against the Commissioners in this respect which were made by the hon. Member for East Lothian. He advocated, so far as I understood him, the system of the German Universities. He said, in the course of his remarks, that in the German Universities you find a large number of professors; that while in Scotland you might have twelve professors, in Germany you might have three times that number, and consequently that there were larger numbers of students. I have two observations to make upon that argument of the hon. Member for East Lothian. In the first place the Commissioners have no funds to establish professorships to that extent. If we had the funds, of course we should be very glad to do so. But I can go a great deal further than that. I would almost have said—if I had not thought it impossible in his case—that my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian had framed his objections and drafted, mentally, his speech before he had read the Ordinances which he intended to attack, because he says that the Universities ought to have the power of selecting teachers for eminence in their particular subjects, and give the students the opportunity of attending those lectures. Why, that is exactly what we say, and that is one of the main features, and it is one of the new features, of the Ordinances we have introduced. We have taken advantage of the power given by the Act to invite the University Court to appoint several lecturers whose position will be such that their lectures will qualify for graduation. What we do not do, and what we decline to do, is to recognise his calling as a teacher for graduation, which may be said at first sight is now the case in medicine, and that it works tolerably well. Why does it work tolerably well in medicine? The reason is this, that the medical lecturers are invariably certified, chosen, selected, and appointed by various medical corporations outside the University, such as the College of Physicians and the College of Surgeons. So that in that way, indirectly, the process of selection which we have explained is already done in medicine. But in Arts it cannot be done. That is where we join issue with those who attack us. It is to that point, the point of extra-mural teaching, that I confine my observations. I do not think it would be reasonable that the House should listen to other details of the Ordinances. These are the principles we stand by. We think the Universities should be teaching Universities, and while we feel bound to appoint as many more teachers as possible, we maintain that that must be done by selection and not by the recognition of the first course.

*(1.15.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I recognise that it is extremely late, and I think I have given the very strongest earnest on former occasions that I am very unwilling to keep the House after twelve o'clock, for I think I may say that I am perhaps as responsible as any other Member of the House for the twelve o'clock rule. I am, therefore, going to give my reasons for supporting my hon. Friend the Member for Haddington most briefly and in the shortest time possible. There has been one point which has been left out of sight during the whole of this Debate; there was no allusion to it, as far as I remember, in that speech which most gratified the House at large—the speech of the hon. Member for Cambridge University. And I hope my hon. Friend opposite will allow me at once here, and for the old friendship I have had with him since we sat side by side in examination, in which the only honour I or any other of his competitors had any chance of winning was that of having entered into the same lists, to express the pleasure I feel as a personal friend, as one of his constituents, and as a Parliamentary Colleague, in such an exhibition of cultured talents as he has given to the House which he honours and which I hope he will frequently address. But in his speech, and in all the speeches which have followed and preceded him, no mention was made of the important fact that both of the great bodies of graduates of the two great Scottish Universities, the General Council of the Glasgow University and the General Council of the Edinburgh University, have taken very grave exception to these Ordinances. Thus the representative educated opinion of these Universities outside what may be called the official circle is opposed to these Ordinances as they at present stand. That is a body of opinion to which we ought to give great weight, for I will venture to say that if it had not been for the General Councils of Edinburgh and Glasgow we should never have had this University Act and this University Commission. They were called for by these two bodies on account of their dissatisfaction with the then existing system, and they now complain that that system has not been changed. They complain, in terms of great respect towards the Commission, two members of which have addressed us to-night, in the first place that the main object for which this Act was brought before the House of Commons three years ago was in their opinion laid down in the words that provision was to be made for increasing the teaching power of the University, whether by extra-mural teaching or otherwise. They say, and I think they say rightly, that absolutely nothing whatever has been done in these Ordinances for extra-mural teaching. In the case of medicine the number of courses which may be pursued in extra-mural teaching has been doubled, and the number of courses in order to get the medical degree has been doubled likewise. The extra-mural teachers of Glasgow and Edinburgh in medicine lie under this very grave disadvantage, that whereas twelve out of the sixteen courses may be pursued under extra-mural teachers if the student is being educated at Leeds, at Newcastle, at Manchester, or at Durham; on the other hand, only eight can be pursued under extra-mural teachers if the teacher resides in Edinburgh or Glasgow. Extra-mural teaching has not been increased in science and in arts—it does not exist at all. My hon. Friend behind me says it was not their business to give facilities for studying under eminent men of whose qualifications very little might have been known. There is only one way of determining whether a teacher is distinguished or not, and that is to give him fair play; and I entirely agree with the hon. Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. Wallace) that the real teaching in our English Universities is extra-mural teaching. The highest honours are got not by attendance at lectures, but by private studies directed by able men who can give special and careful attention to the pupil. My hon. Friend opposite says that in his opinion the personal supervision of the teacher was of all importance, and that he does not want a mere examining University. But what is the use of talking of personal supervision of professors who teach these enormous classes; who draw these fees of £2,000 and £3,000 a year, representing some 600 or 700, or 300 or 400 pupils? What is the use of talking of personal supervision in a case like that? You refuse the personal supervision of the teacher who relies on his own merits outside, and what is given instead? This Ordinance, No. 17, appoints assistants and lecturers; but, in the first place, the appointment of assistants appears to the General Councils of these Universities to be far too much in the hands of professors. It is entirely in the hands of the professors, and the power of the lecturers, whose appointment is in the hands of the Court, in conducting the education, will be largely determined by the professors. They will be responsible to the Senatus, with only an appeal to the University Court; and no one who knows the practical working of any educational body will believe that this appeal will be of any serious avail except in case of very gross scandal and spiteful conduct on the part of the superiors; but it will be of no real avail, as against the steady daily supervision of the nearer body. And when we find on the top of that that the apparatus for instruction and the material belonging to any particular Chair shall be under the exclusive control of the professors, what will be the lecturers except the mere puppets of the collective body of professors in the Senatus? The four objections which the Council take are these: First of all, that the educational policy is made over to the Senatus, who practically are the professors; secondly the failure to provide an effective remedy for the evils of the large classes, by which the assistants and others do the work, while the professors get the fees; thirdly, the failure to provide new Chairs; and, fourthly, the refusal to extend to the Faculty of Arts and to other Faculties extra-mural teaching. Those are the objections taken by the great bodies of graduates of Edinburgh and Glasgow, and I do not think they have been answered in this Debate. But my hon. Friend behind me has taken an objection of his own, which I think is a thoroughly House of Commons objection, and that is that he ought not to have had the administrative and teaching Ordinances without the financial conditions. Putting extra-mural teaching aside, and the other great reason for this delay, that the monstrous scandal of these overgrown classes is not dealt with, I should like to know whether these lecturers are to be practically the rivals of the professors, co-equal with the professors, getting the share of fees which represents the number of students who come to their class, that being one system; or whether the other system is to be rigorously adopted, namely, where all the fees are to be put into the public Chest, and where salaries are then to be paid to the professors without respect of persons? It is because that subject is not embodied in these Ordinances, though we can find other great objections, many of which I have not mentioned, but which have been mentioned by hon. Friends who sit behind me—such objections as that the junior classes are still kept up, to the great disappointment of the advocates of secondary education in Scotland, and, as we think, to the great disadvantage of the Universities, and that the compulsory preliminary examination is not extended to all students—it is because of these objections to the Ordinances as they exist, united with the cardinal objection to their being separated from that which is the basis of the Bill, the financial scheme, that I think we should do very well to vote for my hon. Friend's Amendment.

(Lanark, Partick): I do not desire to keep the House very long, but I wish to say one or two words with regard to the speech to which we have just listened from the right hon. Baronet the Member for Bridgeton. In the first place, I wish to say something with regard to these junior classes to which he referred. The junior classes do not consist of boys. In reality they consist of men. The age, I think, is much higher than the age in the other classes. They are not boys who ought to be at school. They are, nearly all of them, more than twenty years of age— young men whose education has been backward; men, some of whom would be better away from the University, but men to whom it has been the honour of the Scotch Universities that the opportunity of learning has been, no doubt, offered them. I do not want to go into other points, except this: that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton put forward the action of the University Councils of Edinburgh and Glasgow as his main reason for his action in the matter. I should like to say a few words as to what the history of the action of the University Council of Glasgow has been. That Council consists of the whole body of over 5,000 Parliamentary electors of the University. It has had this question before it, not only recently, but for the last ten years, and repeatedly, again and again, and it has decided against the principle of extra-mural teaching. In the present year—on the 16th of March last—a Motion in favour of extra mural teaching was carried by a majority of 21 to 11, out of a total constituency of a good deal over 5,000. It was that Motion which came up again for approval at a second meeting, and the whole of that meeting apparently consisted of less than forty persons. I venture to think that that does not show any feeling that you can speak of in the University at large. The only previous occasion on which such a Motion has been passed was in the previous October. That Motion, as it stands, sounds a strong one. As it stands it is this—

Sir G. Trevelyan

“The University Court shall have power to recognise for purposes of graduation in arts duly qualified teachers who are not professors in the University.”

That sounds as though it went some way; but it is to be taken with this explanation. Immediately after that Motion came on, there came on the election of assessor to the University Court. Two sets of men were standing against each other—one set consisting of the gentlemen who had proposed the Motion I have just read; the other set consisting of gentlemen who were opposed to the Motion. A supporter of the Motion boasted of having passed a week before in the University Council a Motion which he described thus—

“Providing for distinguished graduates having the opportunity of teaching in the University under the appointment and supervision of the Court.”

He limited the scope of his Motion by describing it in these words, and it was quite true that in his speech in proposing that Motion in the Council he did limit it in the extreme, and only carried it by the fact that he so limited it as to take away all its meaning as a defence of extra-mural teaching, and to make it merely the expression of a desire for additional power in the University—a desire in which everyone is agreed. The opponent of this gentleman pointed out that he did not understand this Resolution in its limited sense, or it would never have been opposed at all, but would have been passed unanimously, and certainly would not have been opposed by any anxious for the expansion of the Universities and the increase of the teaching staff. The Mover replied that while the terms of the Motion had been quoted the terms of the speech explaining the Motion had not been quoted, and gave a reference to the speech in which he had supported it, and in that speech he says that he had laid down—

“That the proposed teaching was to be under the sanction and control in every respect of the University Court, and that the students receiving such teaching should be matriculated students of the University subject to academic discipline in all respects. The issue before the meeting was clear—extension or no extension of University teaching. The recognition given was to be entirely at the discretion of the Court who would consider how much extra teaching was required, and every point connected with the man who asked it. He desired that the Court should be supreme in giving recognition, and supreme also over the man after he had got the recognition.”

Such a scheme is not at all what has been advocated as extra-mural teaching. That is the extreme of what has been accepted by the University Court, and that is something totally different to the views which have been put forward by the hon. Member for East Edinburgh to-night and by the right hon. Baronet who has just sat down. These are all the views for which the right hon. Gentleman can claim the support of the University Council; and it seems to me that these views, not as put in the Resolution but as embodied in the speech that explained the Resolution, that moved the Resolution, and to which afterwards, when challenged as to the meaning of the Resolution, the mover appealed, as a necessary accompaniment and explanation of it—these views are embodied sufficiently in the Ordinance dealing with lecturers and assistants to give no cause whatever for such a strong step as to throw back on the Commissioners these Ordinances. It seems to me, in the first place, that we should be throwing very great discredit on the Commissioners if we did that; and, in the second place, that we should be doing very great harm to the Universities by delaying a reasonable settlement.

(1.30.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I do not propose to trouble the House with the subject which has just been before it. The question of extra-mural teaching and other matters that have been referred to are all questions which principally concern the Universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow; but there are one or two questions, not of great magnitude, but of considerable importance, which affect the University of Aberdeen. One of these I am happy to say has already been disposed of by the action which has been taken in another place—I refer to the mistake which occurred in the Ordinance regarding arts, with respect to the subject of mathematics. And there remains one and only one matter in which the University of Aberdeen is greatly concerned, and upon which the University Council have raised strong objection, and that is the two lines in Section 12, Sub-section 2, of Ordinance 11, which provide that Greek shall be compulsory for candidates for honours in mental philosophy. Now, Sir, there is one part of these Ordinances which I cordially approve of, and that is the introduction of options. The old and narrow groove in which we were all compelled to travel in times past has been very widely opened up, and, undoubtedly, I entirely agree with the remarks of the hon. Member for Cambridge, in so far as he gave general approval to that portion of the Ordinance. Now, Sir, the effect of that Ordinance is that henceforth a person will be able to take his degree in Arts—his pass degree—and he will be able also to take his honour degree in seven out of eight groups, and for some incomprehensible reason this privilege, which is conferred upon the pass man in all subjects and upon all the other honours, is denied to those who seek for honours in mental philosophy. What would be the result of that prohibition if it should be maintained? We shall suppose that a man goes in for the honours examination in mental philosophy. We shall suppose he is a first prize man in logic, and is first prize man in moral philosophy; that he is an extremely distinguished student, and would be fully entitled to first-class honours; but, under this unhappy provision, he will not get his degree, and he will not get honours, unless, contrary to the spirit of the Ordinance, he has denied himself the choice and the option of omitting Greek in the early part of his career. Suppose he fails in his Greek examination. You would then have this extraordinary result: that the man who will have taken every prize in Scotland will be debarred from honours in the subject because he has not passed through Greek. Surely anything more inconceivably absurd was never suggested to the mind of man! The next matter is this. The Greek option operates at the entrance examination. It is not necessary, in order to pass the entrance examination, that you should take up Greek. What will be the effect of that regulation? The young man who from the first intends to become a clergyman will undoubtedly adopt Greek as one of the subjects. I doubt very much whether anyone else will adopt Greek at the first stage. The labour which is required for passing in Greek absorbs valuable time which is essentially required for more useful and remunerative subjects. In a few years no one will take up Greek for a pass examination who does not intend to be a clergyman. The subject of mental philosophy is one which is not taken up until three or four years after a man's College life has begun. It is not an elementary subject. It is one that naturally follows after a man has attained a certain degree of maturity. Consequently, many boys will discover, when they have arrived at that stage when they desire to take up mental philosophy, that they will be debarred from honours in that subject because they did not, when they were at school, take up Greek. This is a most unsatisfactory and most deplorable restriction. I am told that the reason why no one is to get honours in philosophy unless he knows Greek is because Plato and Aristotle wrote on the subject of philosophy, and that they wrote in the Greek language. If it were absolutely essential to the modern student, to a man of business, to know either Aristotle or Plato, it would not be necessary that he should know Greek for the purpose. Professor Jowett has translated the whole of the Dialogues of Plato, and I think there are very few graduates in Scotland or England who, if they were to apply their united skill in the translation of these works, could accomplish it so well as Professor Jowett has done. But because there were two gentlemen who wrote in Greek and treated of the subject of philosophy, therefore Greek must be made absolute! You must go on further than that. Take Art and Language. Descartes and Leibnitz wrote in French, and certainly, if it is necessary to read Plato and Aristotle in Greek, it should be none the less necessary for the student to read Descartes and Leibnitz in French before they can take honours. But you cannot stop there. You must also make German compulsory, because Hegel wrote in German. You cannot stop even there. You must also say that if the student is going in for a degree in mental philosophy he must know Sanscrit, because if he does not know Sanscrit, how is he to understand Hindoo metaphysics? I want to know why this extraordinary condition is to be imposed upon the English student of mental philosophy? I should like to know why the students of history are going to escape? You may get your honours in history without knowing anything of Greek, and yet there was a man whose name was Thucydides who wrote in Greek, and I shall be told that no one appreciates Thucydides who does not know Greek. There is no conceivable propriety, but there is the greatest impropriety, in connecting two such subjects as Greek and philosophy. Philosophy deals with ideas; Greek deals with words, and it seldom happens that a man displays equal aptitude in the practice of arts and also in the region of thought. Nothing could be more violently opposed. It would be quite as reasonable to say that no man should get honours in mathematics unless he added to that a knowledge of Greek, of Sanscrit, or any other language. And it is so particularly absurd for this reason: that the quantity of Greek acquired is absolutely useless for philosophical purposes—a mere knowledge of Greek is not sufficient to elucidate the mysteries of Plato. The amount of Greek which is provided by a pass degree is of no value whatever even for Plato or Aristotle. Well, then, I want to know why the Commissioners, the champions of Greek, who have been defeated all along the line, who have not been allowed to interfere with the mathematicians, who have left the man of natural science in peace, who have even allowed the Eastern languages and the English language to escape—I want to know why they should come down and impose this unhappy embargo upon mental philosophy? The University Council of Aberdeen have stated their views, which I have endeavoured to translate to the House. I shall now move, in order to give effect to that contention, that after the word “eleven,” these words be inserted,

“So far as it makes Greek compulsory for honours in mental philosophy.”

I think this question of the future of our Universities, might very well be left to ourselves, and that hon. Members on the other side should not overrule the wishes of the Scotch Members on this subject by their larger numbers.

Amendment proposed,

After the word “eleven,” to insert the words “so far as it makes Greek compulsory for Honours in Mental Philosophy.”—(Mr. Hunter.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Main Question again proposed.

(1.54.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I should like to know whether the Government intend to say anything in reference to the matter? I think they ought to say something—either through the First Lord of the Treasury or the Solicitor General for Scotland. If they do not, we shall take some other opportunity of bringing the matter forward again.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We are quite prepared, either I myself or my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Scotland, to deal at length with the various points raised; but, as a matter of fact, I think the House will feel that the subject has been thoroughly threshed out, and little or nothing requires to be added from this or from any other Bench. For this reason, and in mercy to the Members who have now sat for three hours discussing this matter, I hope hon. Gentlemen will be content if I venture to rest my case upon the admirable and eloquent speech which my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Jebb) addressed to the House at an earlier hour of the evening.

CONSIDERATION.

As amended, considered.

Schedule.

*(2.15.) MR. FURNESS (Hartlepool): I have taken the unusual course of moving an Amendment to a Bill which has undergone the consideration of a Committee upstairs, because, as I think I can show, the Bill will probably have a very prejudicial effect upon the timber trade of this country. It will probably so affect my own constituency. A very extensive trade has rapidly grown up at the Hartlepoons with the Baltic ports and with Sweden and Norway. It will probably be claimed that consignors of the timber will have the option of declaring whether the timber shall be conveyed by machine weight or measurement weight, and it is true that the forwarder will have such an option, but at the best the change means an advance on the present rate of something like 20 per cent. The growth of the trade at the Hartlepoons has been most rapid in the last few years—from 531 tons in 1852 to 85,724 tons in 1862; in 1872, 271,533 tons; in 1882, 332,258 tons, and in 1889, the last year for which I have a return, the total of the Hartlepool timber trade reached 406,992 tons. The whole of this trade has hitherto been carried on by computed measurement, the timber being purchased in this manner in Sweden or elsewhere, being so conveyed by steamer or sailing vessel, and the whole of the labour and conveyance at and from the port of arrival being so calculated. Now the Bill proposes practically that the carriage in the future, in order that the timber may have the benefit of the lower rate, shall be by machine weight. But when I inform the House that the foreign timber trade to the Hartlepoons is a season trade carried on in the five months from the time the Baltic ports open in May until early in October, during which period from eight hundred to one thousand trucks are daily loaded at the Hartlepoons, it will be seen that it is utterly impossible to have the whole of this timber weighed, and when it is said that the merchant may have the timber forwarded by measurement weight under Clause 1, still that can only be done at an increased cost, equal, as I find from Returns supplied me, in some cases to 21½ per cent. I am sure hon. Members conversant with commercial life will know that an increase of even 2 or 3 per cent. in freight may, in these days of keen competition, be sufficient to divert a trade into other channels. This is what is feared in the case of the foreign timber trade, and hence it is I move the Amendment of which I have given notice. To this I have been urged not only by the timber trade of the port and of various parts of the country, but also by the Chamber of Commerce and the Town Council of Hartlepool. I feel a reluctance to move such an Amendment to a Bill which has received the attention of a Committee, and the points of which have received the attention of eminent counsel; but I am afraid this particular part of the Measure has escaped that careful attention bestowed by the Committee on the Bill generally. I cannot think that it is intended to so seriously interfere with a trade carried on so successfully in the past. The North-Eastern Railway Company have never shown any opposition to the system of carrying timber by computed measurement weight, and it would be a very serious matter indeed for the timber trade if the Bill passes in its present form. It is relevant to the point to mention that the French Government some time ago imposed a duty on timber to be levied by machine weight, but after a very short experience they found that there were so many difficulties and so much delay accompanying this method of levy that after an examination by experts they decided in favour of computed measurement weight. That is what I propose by my Amendment—that the trade should be carried on as hitherto by computed measurement, to which I believe there is no objection.

VOL. IV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

MR. JOHN WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I beg leave to second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in Class C, after the words "timber actual machine weight," to insert the words "or measurement weight."—(Mr. Furness.)

(2.20.) MR. HANBURY (Preston): I had supposed from the papers which have been distributed that the fight would have been between the home timber trade and the foreign timber trade, because we are told how very much the home trade will suffer and the foreign trade gain under the proposals in the Bill; but I find to my surprise an Amendment introduced by the hon. Member, who tells us plainly that it is in the interest of the foreign trade. With regard to the whole question, I am bound to say that having sat on the Committee for nearly 90 days I think, whatever our views may be on the merits of the question, that the timber merchants certainly are the most enterprising and persevering body of traders of any that came before us, because while they admit that all other trades have come out rather well from the discussion which took place before the Committee, they maintain that they alone have been badly treated. But the true state of the case is exactly opposite. The Committee, so far from knowing nothing about the matter, broke their rule not to hear a case twice over, and heard the case of the timber merchants last year and this year. It cannot be said they did not go into the case thoroughly. Not only so, but the whole thing was threshed out by debate in Parliament last Session. One of two things will happen if this Amendment is carried. The hon. Member ask that a totally different system of carrying timber shall be adopted on this line from the system adopted last year by Parliament. For one line only is this change proposed as opposed to the rest of the lines. On the other hand, if this Amendment is to be adopted, then we must repeal everything that Parliament did in the matter last year. From that point of view alone the position is absurd. So far as I understand the matter, the timber merchants object that the rates are raised, and that the alternative method of carriage they do not like, and they state that the home timber trade is threatened. The latter point has not been raised to-day, and I need not refer to it. But I must contradict the hon. Member when he says the Bill raises the rates upon timber as compared with the rates at which it is now carried. It is a remarkable fact that in all these papers circulated among Members nothing is adduced to show that foreign timber has suffered in any respect whatever. Nor is there any attempt to show that home:

timber, as a whole, has suffered in any important respect. What the merchants do say amounts to an admission that the rates have been very largely decreased over long distances, but for short distances the rates for home timber have been increased. Now, how is that statement arrived at? Take the figures as they appear in these circulated papers. It is curious that, although they are dealing with the rates in the North-Eastern Railway Bill, these rates are not mentioned in these papers. Whether the North-Eastern rates are higher than the rates of any other line in the Kingdom for timber they carefully avoid mentioning, and all these illustrative instances are taken from the London and North-Western, and Great Western, and other lines. They even go further, because they take special rates to special stations, they pick out short distances and stations where there is competition, and where the maximum rates cannot be charged because of competition, and because there are special rates under these special circumstances it is said these should be the rates generally for the whole of the timber-trade of the country. The proposition is monstrous. They go even further, and in the comparison of maximum rates they are not correct. They say that the rate for timber at the moment is 2d., but no terminal rate is charged. But exactly the opposite is the case.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): We are not raising that point.

MR. FURNESS: To what papers is the hon. Gentleman referring?

MR. HANBURY: To these papers circulated freely among Members, some five or six of them signed by the Secretaries of the Home and Foreign Timber Associations. I am surprised that the hon. Member has not seen them. The figures, I say, are wholly misleading. They do not give the actual rates at present charged, and they ignore the fact that while they put in station and service terminals to the new rates proposed by the Bill the railway companies have the right to charge terminals at present. The comparison is therefore wholly misleading. Now I come to another point raised by the hon. Gentleman. Objection is not so much to the rate as to the option of sending timber by computed measurement weight or actual machine weight. The Railway Companies have no option; they must carry at whichever rate the timber is sent by the traders with whom the option lies. They object to the alternative system, and on what grounds? The hon. Member's Amendment is that timber, whether it is carried by measurement weight or machine weight shall go in the same class and pay the same rate. That supposes that in either case the same weight is carried by the Railway Company. That is assumed; why then the objection to the distinction allowed of sending by machine weight or measurement weight if the machine rate is 25 per cent. more than the measurement weight? We have it from evidence given by timber merchants that there is an enormous difference between the actual weight and the computed measurement weight. We were told by a witness that on 165 cubic feet of deals there was the enormous difference as between 2½ tons computed measurement weight and an actual weight of 3 tons 6 cwt. We had other and similar evidence. No wonder the timber merchants wish to adhere to the tape measurement, and do not like the alternative, for they are actually sending twice as much as the weight they pay for. We are met by the argument that it would be perfectly true in certain cases that the weight varies, and that is the very reason why the Committee and Parliament last year, and the Board of Trade previously, introduced the double system of sending, either by weight or by measurement. For this reason: I will take home timber. We had before us facts to show most conclusively that English elm when cut down weighs nearly one-third as much again as when the sap has gone out; and we introduced this double system for this reason: that the seasoned timber and the older English timber being, of course, a great deal lighter per cubic foot than the green timber, the trader, if he wished, might have the benefit of the lightness in a cheaper rate of carriage than for heavier timber. And I think it is a wise provision that the man who sends light timber should not have to pay exactly the same rate as the man who sends green stuff. I say, therefore, why deny that man the option? We are told that it is the general wish of the whole timber trade that timber should be carried by weight only. Is that the case? ("No!") It is by no means the case.

MR. STOREY: We do not say so.

MR. HANBURY: Then your case becomes very weak indeed, because you are then in this position: The Amendment which the timber merchants desire to introduce, if the hon. Member rightly represents his friends, would undoubtedly force the Railway Companies to carry everything at measurement weight, and nothing by machine weight.

MR. STOREY: No, we do not want that.

MR. HANBURY: I am glad that has been dropped. What is the argument against this? In Scotland at the present moment timber is carried by machine weight, and that is the case also in Ireland and South Wales. Indeed, on this North Eastern Railway itself 43 per cent. of the timber—namely, pit props—is carried by machine weight. The hon. Member said that machine weight was found to be impracticable; that it was tried in France, and did not succeed; but there is no need to go to France. I have quoted instances in our own country where it has succeeded, and is being carried out, and we had witnesses before the Committee who said they had not experienced the slightest difficulty whatever, and that it was giving them great assistance. Those were timber merchants. I hope, therefore, I have shown to the House that the whole of the facts upon which the hon. Member has based his contention will not stand examination for one single moment. When he says the Committee has hardly done its duty to this foreign timber trade, I must again remind him that this timber trade has had exceptional opportunities given to it of appearing before the Committee. We twice heard them patiently—a favour granted to no other trade in the Kingdom. Therefore, I ask the House to support the Committee, the Board of Trade, and the House itself in its action of last year, by not listening to the Amendment.

MR. STOREY: The speech of the hon. Member seems rather to have been directed to arguments which have not been uttered and to Motions which have not been made than to the modest Amendment which has been submitted. I beg the House to realise that this Motion has no relation whatever to the home timber trade. It has relation to the foreign timber trade, inasmuch as this Company deals with foreign timber, mainly from the Baltic. I desire the House to recognise that in connection with this Baltic trade, which consists principally of deal and battens, the custom for untold years has been to transact business by measurement, that mode being founded upon the common consent of all parties concerned, and upon the average established by a succession of weights. The transactions are ruled by the St. Petersburg standard of measurement, and that method has for years been found the most convenient. There has been no complaint from the persons abroad, nor from the merchants in the North-Eastern ports, nor from the people in the Midlands and in the South with whom we deal, nor from the Railway Companies or the shippers. The point my hon. Friend puts to the House—and I hope it will be considered in the interests of the trade—is that such a widely-ranged, convenient, and practical system of carrying on business ought not to be lightly interfered with by the House. Consider what our position in the North will be if you make this change. We must buy at the St. Petersburg standard, and sell at the same standard. Our merchants have their tables based accordingly, and by reference can immediately tell whether the nature of an offer is satisfactory. I hope the Committee possessed more knowledge than the hon. Member has displayed this afternoon with reference to the matter. If they did not, I do not wonder that they made this one mistake in their multifarious labours. That Committee has, of course, done much that is good. It has introduced advantageous and convenient changes; but it has also made this one alteration, of which all the parties concerned complain. There are Directors of the North Eastern Com any here. I should like to invite my hon. Friend the Member for Barnard Castle (Sir J. Pease), the hon. Member for Chester-le-Street Division (Mr. Joicey), and the hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Wharton), to say whether, in practice, the North Eastern Company has ever had reason to complain, and whether it ever has complained of the present system. I come now to the change which has been made. The hon. Member opposite asked, Why should the traders object to having the option? We never did object, and we do not now object to having the option. What we object to is this: the Committee say, "You may forward by the Railway Company either by machine weight or by calculated measurement weight. We estimate the machine weight at so-and-so; but if you exercise your option and send by the old calculated measurement weight, then we will put that weight at 21½ per cent."

MR. HANBURY: Because you send twice as much.

MR. STOREY: The hon. Member talked about some difference between 2 tons 10 cwt. and 3 tons 6 cwt.; but the whole thing has been calculated for 200 years, and the average is known. The hon. Member may verify that fact by coming to Hartlepool or Sunderland, and taking from stock any number of battens and deals, and he will find that month in month out on different cargoes the average is 2 tons 8 cwt. The traders pay on 2 tons 8 cwt. in order to allow for the little variation which they know to exist. As I have said, we do not object to the option. If, however, you establish the machine weight, the North Eastern Railway Company will be the first to complain. My hon. Friend was quite right in saying that this is a season's trade. It happens during a few weeks in the year the ships pour into the North Eastern ports, and the North Eastern Company is pressed in order to get trucks ready for the conveyance of the timber to the South. If, then, that Company were put to the necessity of weighing each truck, the only effect would be to retard the delivery and to cause a restraint of trade. The point of the Amendment is this: We do not object to option, but we ask that with the option the rate should be the same. I see the hon. Member shakes his head, and I will address a final argument in the hope that it will convince him. The rate the Committee proposed for machine weight was a fair rate. That is admitted, I suppose. If that be so, why, if I take the option of sending by measurement weight for the mutual convenience of my customers and myself, should there be added to the weight an additional 21½ per cent.?

MR. HANBURY: Because there is 21½ per cent. more carriage.

MR. STOREY: The answer proves the utter ignorance—if I may be permitted to use the word—of the hon. Member as to the facts of the trade. I am certain if he went to Sunderland—and if he would not make a political speech we should be glad to see him there—I could convince him in an afternoon that he had been misinformed upon that particular point. There is no variation beyond what I have indicated. As I saw an expression of dissent on the part of one or two hon. Members when the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Furness) said there was this difference, may I read one sentence from what I believe to be a trustworthy letter. The writer, who has inquired into the matter, says:

"The rates at ten stations from West Hartlepool amount in Class I. to £6 2s. 7d., the maximum rates; as compared with £4 16s. 4d. in Class VI."

My hon. Friend asks that we may have the option of sending either by measurement or by machine weight, and, if we exercise the option, that we shall pay at the machine rate which the Committee fixed and which they must have thought was a fair one. Under these circumstances, I sincerely hope that the House, in the interests of the North-East part of the country, will modify the decision of the Committee upon this very trifling point, and so maintain our trade on the basis upon which it is already established.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): My hon. Friend (Mr. Storey) has, speaking on behalf of the timber trade, told the House that there is no objection to the option. That, however, is not the case put before the Committee. The case submitted to the Committee was essentially one of objection to the option; and the case the hon. Member raises is a different one. He says there ought to be no distinction between actual weight and measurement weight. I do not myself know anything whatever about the timber trade except the information conveyed to the Committee by the evidence not only of the timber merchants, but also by the Railway Companies; and, however much I might be disposed to accept the evidence of my hon. Friend below me, I cannot divest myself of the facts which were brought to our attention by the Railway Companies. And I believe every Member of the Committee will agree that the evidence conclusively disclosed a considerable difference between actual weight and measurement weight, and showed that measurement weight involved a larger actual weight than that ascertained by the machine. I will put a question to my hon. Friend. The object he desires can be obtained in two ways—either by lowering the measurement weight in Class VI., or by raising the actual machine weight in Class I. I should like to ask my hon. Friend whether he is prepared to accept an Amendment to raise the actual machine weight in Class I., and thereby put the machine weight and the measurement weight on a footing of equality?

MR. STOREY: The effect of that would be to increase the present maximum rates of the North Eastern, and inasmuch as we think those rates are high enough for the purpose, we should not agree to it.

MR. HUNTER: That brings the House to the real question. This Motion really relies upon the suggestion that the Committee have allowed too heavy maximum rates. Now, Sir, what is the fact? At the present time the maximum rate on the North Eastern for timber, for the initial distances—I will not trouble the House with long distances—is 2½d. per ton per mile. In Class 1, about which the complaints are made, we have reduced the maximum rates from 2.75 to 2.2, or more than ½d. per ton per mile. If anyone has a right to object to that reduction, surely it is not the trader, but the Railway Company. Taking into account what appears to be proved by the evidence as to the difference between the measurement weight and the actual machine weight, we have reduced the maximum rate on the actual weight from 2½d. to 2d. a ton per mile, and the question is, ought we to have made any further reduction? I would point out that this is a question upon which the House can only form an opinion after hearing the evidence on both sides. In re-adjusting these rates the Board of Trade has proceeded upon this distinction. If the article was not enumerated in one of the old Acts, and was therefore chargeable at the highest maximum rate, generally 4d. a ton per mile, the Board of Trade paid very little respect to what may be called the vested interests in that maximum rate. When, however, an article had been specifically named in all the Acts, like timber, and a specific maximum rate had been assigned to it, the Board of Trade, properly I think, held the view that the burden was cast on the traders to show whether that maximum rate should be reduced. Well, the Board of Trade have reduced the rates to the extent I have mentioned, and I can only express my own opinion, after hearing all the evidence, that we should not have been justified in inflicting upon the North Eastern Company a larger reduction than that which has been made.

*COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.): Speaking on behalf of timber merchants, whose trade is an important one in my constituency, I may say that they do not consider they have had an opportunity of sufficiently stating their case, and they strongly protest against the Bill in its present form. They think their interests are so greatly affected by it as to render it necessary to bring in an amending Bill. I will not go into the merits of the question, and I will merely say that it seems to me there should not be much difficulty in so adjusting a table of specific gravities as to make measurement weights practically the same as the actual weights.

(2.55.) MR. P. STANHOPE (Wednesbury): I want to enter into the general question of the effect of this Bill, but before doing so I should like to point out that we are in a peculiar position. As far as I know it has not been circulated, and we are discussing a Bill that is not in the hands of any Member.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): There was scarcely any Amendment made in the Bill, and none of any importance.

MR. P. STANHOPE: I am afraid I cannot regard that as a sufficient reason for not presenting Members with a copy of a Bill which they are called upon to discuss. At any rate it is open to the right hon. Gentleman to lay the Report of the Committee upon the Table.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Committee decide what to do with their Report. I have nothing to do with it.

MR. P. STANHOPE: Then the responsibility is cast upon the Committee. I only call attention to this particular point in order to remind the House what a little time is given hon. Members to discuss the large questions raised by these Provisional Orders in connection with the rates of railway companies. I do not wish to deny that the Committee upstairs have performed an arduous and valuable duty, but the questions which arise out of these Provisional Orders—and this is a type of the whole—are of such importance and of such general interest to the commerce of the country, that I think the House itself should have a better opportunity of discussing them, and that we should not have them brought forward at the commencement of public business in this House and be almost smuggled through without any comment. Now, Sir, with regard to the Amendment, I think it has been fairly explained by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey). I attach great importance, and I am sure hon. Members generally will also, to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter), who is an expert in railway matters, and who has shown such great interest in the labours of the Committee upstairs. Nevertheless, I do think a substantial case has been made out by my two hon. Friends, which should induce the House to leave alone this particular branch of the timber trade, which at the present time is, at all events, a very large and important section, and affects not only the ports of entry but also consumers in the Midland districts, who are the purchasers from these large and important firms at Sunderland and Hartlepool. I really would ask the Government and press upon the House to accept this moderate Amendment of my hon. Friend. I have only one word more to say, and that is that many Members of this House believe these various Provisional Orders have seriously injured numerous commercial interests in this country. That being so, we shall in future Parliaments, if not in this one, raise this and other questions with a view to the amendment of the whole law regulating rates and fares.

*(3.3.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): Two points have been referred to by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) on which I should like to say a word. Last Session I had charge of the Amendment on behalf of the timber trade, and I have to say that throughout this matter, in my opinion, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks Beach), under difficult circumstances, did his very best to meet the wishes and requirements of the trade, and I may say just the same of the Department over which he presides. But although that Amendment was accepted under the pressure of circumstances, it was well known that it was not satisfactory, and it is equally unsatisfactory now. During this Session the parties interested in this great question have offered to meet the Railway Companies in friendly conference on this subject, and it has been urged that if that meeting had taken place even the Railway Companies might have been convinced that the dislocation to trade and the advantage given to competitors will in the end be injurious to the Railway Companies themselves. That meeting was refused, and I cannot help thinking that it indicates a by no means strong belief, even on the part of the Railway Companies themselves, in the validity of their position. The other point to which I wish to refer is with regard to the opinion of the trading community on this matter. Now, Sir, I can at least express the feeling of the Chambers of Commerce. The London Chamber practically unanimously entertains the strongest feeling against the Bill as it stands. The same observation applies to the Hull Chamber, and I do not know any part of the country which, as an importing centre, has so large an interest in this question as Hull has. Well, Sir, there is another body whose opinions are always regarded favourably in this House. I refer to the large body of shipowners. They are distinctly opposed to the present proposals, and object in the strongest terms to a change in a custom which has proved beneficial in relation to the conduct of trade. The carriage rate will undoubtedly be affected, and a great change will be made between existing rates and the possible maximum rates in the future; but the chief objection, at any rate a very strong objection, on the part of the commercial community is owing to the vast inconvenience and interference with trade which would take place as the result of this change. In the first place, we believe it will result in very great delay, which must tend to diminish profits. It will require a large expenditure by way of additional service in order to check the measurement by weight, and we believe it will lead to considerable fraud, which is practically impossible under the existing system, based as it is on averages; and we also believe it will facilitate those preferences which it is one of the chief objects of this Bill to put an end to. The timber trade does not object to the option, but they want a real option. The option now offered is distinctly penalised by higher rates if the system of computed measurement is adopted. If, then, the interference with the timber trade is going to be great under this Bill, I ask the right hon. Gentleman to show the same spirit as he has done previously, and bring in a remedial Bill to assimilate the legislation of last Session to the change in this Bill which we propose to make. We believe the interests of the trade demand this. The Chambers of Commerce and the shipping trade are practically unanimous on the subject, and the timber trade nearly so, and I trust that the opinion which has been so well expressed by the hon. Member opposite will also be endorsed by the vote of the House.

*(3.8.) SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I feel sure that the

Sir A. Rollit

Duke of Richmond's Committee were anxious to do their best for the timber trade; but it seems to me that this Amendment, while it certainly affects parts of the country represented by my hon. Friends the Members for Sunderland and Hartlepool, actually operates adversely upon the rates and fares of the North Eastern Railway Company. The hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) has shown that the old system of charges is to be done away with, and that a new system is introduced in order to assimilate—I think on very right and proper grounds—the railway charges of the United Kingdom, so that traders may know the scale of rates under which they are charged on every railway. My hon. Friend says he accepts the  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a ton per mile reduction which the hon. Member for Aberdeen says will be taken off the charges upon the standard weights of timber. Then my hon. Friend says the timber trade wants an option. It appears that they want a one-sided option, the option to send timber by measurement weight, as by that means a great deal more could be sent for the same charge, than if it were sent by actual machine weight. ("No, no!") It is all very well to say "No, no." I am speaking of the evidence which was given before the Rates and Fares Committee, and it is a notorious fact, and known in the trade generally. If there is nothing in it, why raise the question? What the Rates and Fares Committee say is that this timber which is charged by measurement weight contains so much greater actual weight than machine weighed timber that it goes into another and higher Schedule. My hon. Friend says, "Give us the option to put it all into the lower Schedule," a sort of heads I win, tails you lose proceeding, which, I believe, he would be one of the last men to urge. These goods were brought into review like goods of every other class. The Board of Trade, in one of the cleverest inquiries I have ever had anything to do with, which reflected infinite credit upon the painstaking care of those two men who conducted it, Mr. Courtenay Boyle and Lord Balfour of Burleigh, passed with a wonderful amount of painstaking and care these Schedules which are now before the House. In addition, the Duke of Richmond's Committee—a conglomeration of talent to which Parliament did perfectly right to refer these Schedules instead of dealing with the details itself—last year had this question before them, and they passed these same Schedules in the cases of nine railways. And this year, again, these Schedules have been before the Duke's Committee, who listened to the cleverest counsel at the Parliamentary Bar on behalf of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway and the North Eastern Railway, and heard the evidence of witnesses in the timber trade, and passed these Schedules again. I ask the House whether it is going to place the North Eastern Railway in a different position with regard to the timber trade from every other of those nine Railway Companies? An hon. Member suggested that all these railway rates which have been the source of so much painstaking and care should be revised again. I can understand that, and if you include all the railways again in another revision, I wish those joy and long life who are engaged upon it. But it is altogether unfair to attempt to apply conditions to one railway that you have not applied to nine others. I think the discussion to-day has shown how difficult and how dangerous it is for the House itself to go into these details, and how wisely they acted in placing the matter in the hands of a competent tribunal. Surely it would be far better to take these Schedules as they came to us from this tribunal than to endeavour to begin and mend them.

*(3.13.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am anxious to put before the House my view of this question. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey), who always puts his points with great clearness, has stated his case on this occasion in a very lucid manner. What is that case? It is that there is some terrible proposal in this Bill by which the whole custom of the timber trade in the North Eastern ports will be interfered with to the great injury of that trade, which is now carried on satisfactorily, and consequent injury to the North Eastern ports and the whole of the district. How does he prove that? He has absolutely failed to show that there is any real ground for that fear. He has not attempted to show that the Bill now before the House proposes to increase the existing powers of the North Eastern Railway with regard to timber carried by measurement weight. The hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter), speaking as a member of the Committee, with a complete knowledge of this subject, was, if I may venture to say so, absolutely correct when he said that this Provisional Order proposed to lower the maximum rates which the North Eastern Railway have at present power to charge for conveying timber by measurement weight. Therefore it is absolutely impossible that the North Eastern ports or the timber merchants in those ports should lose by the provisions of this Bill. What is the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Hartlepool? It is not a mere alteration in rates, which, as the House is probably aware, vary with regard to the different railway companies. The alteration is one in the classification of goods, and that classification has, with very great care and labour, been so arranged by the Board of Trade as to be absolutely identical over the whole of the United Kingdom; and what the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Furness) really proposes is to alter the classification in the case of the North Eastern Railway, so as to give the North Eastern Railway a classification of goods, differing from the classification of goods for every other railway in the United Kingdom. Let me suggest to the House that there is great advantage to traders in the uniformity which this system of Provisional Orders for railway rates and charges is intended to establish, and in its simplicity as compared with the present system. But it will be found in practice that there will be a very serious diminution of these advantages if you do not make the classification of goods uniform throughout the United Kingdom. Why should you make this alteration on the North Eastern Railway? What is asked—and the hon. Member for Sunderland characterised it as a modest request—is that the maximum charge for timber carried by measurement weight should be the same as that for timber carried by machine weight. If the hon. Member will refer to the Report of the proceedings before the Committee or before the Board of Trade, he will find ample evidence to show the truth of what has been said by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, and by the hon. Baronet who has just sat down, that timber carried by measurement weight is pretty regularly carried, so as to give a larger amount of timber to the same nominal tonnage than timber carried by machine weight, and that therefore it is fair that the rate per ton for measurement weight should be higher than that for machine weight.

MR. STOREY: I do not dispute that. But what I say is that this is a special trade in a special sort of timber, and consequently the right hon. Gentleman has not yet touched the main part of the argument, or made it apply.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Amendment of the hon. Member for Hartlepool does not only refer to that special sort of timber—I mean to deals, battens, and boards—it deals with all classes of timber alike. But I will take the question of deals, battens, and boards, and I will say that the Provisional Order gives a very great advantage to them in providing that, instead of being classed as “light timber” at 50 feet to the ton, they will in future be calculated at 66 feet to the ton. That is a very material advantage to the particular class of trade to which the hon. Member for Sunderland has referred; and, therefore, it is an additional reason for believing that the proposal of this Provisional Order will really put the timber trade of the North Eastern ports in a better position than it occupies now. I must confess I am surprised that this proposal has been supported by the hon. Member for South Bristol (Colonel Hill) on behalf of the merchants of Bristol, and by the hon. Member for South Islington (Sir A. Rollit) on behalf of the merchants of London. What would be the effect of it, if carried? It would give the traders of the North Eastern ports a preferential rate for timber carried by measurement over the North Eastern system as compared with the rates which this House has sanctioned for every other railway, and would therefore give advantages to the traders in the North Eastern ports over the traders of Bristol and London. I must say that, though this Amendment has been characterised as a modest proposal, it appears to me scarcely to deserve that appellation. But I would venture to remind the House that three years ago this matter was thoroughly investigated by those two gentlemen whose names have been mentioned with no greater praise than they fully deserve. Last year the whole question was again investigated by a Joint Committee of both Houses, and this year it has been once more so investigated. An uniform classification of goods extending to hundreds of articles has been adopted throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. Rates have been fixed for the whole of the railways in the United Kingdom, and the only trade which appeals to this House against the decision of the Committee is the timber trade, and the only article in all that classification with respect to which any objection is made is the article of timber. It seems to me that this fact alone is sufficient to warrant a presumption that the timber merchants are unreasonable in their proposals. The House has left this matter in the hands of the Committee, and by such a tribunal alone could it have been properly decided, because no other tribunal could properly and fully hear all sides. I entreat the House, having taken the course it has, not to upset the decision which has been arrived at after labours extending over eighty days—a decision which has satisfied every trade and every community in the United Kingdom, except a portion of those who are engaged in the timber trade.

*(3.25.) MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The President of the Board of Trade has made the statement that under the old system deals, battens, and boards were carried by measurement at 50 feet to the ton.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The hon. Member has misunderstood me. The old legal classification was 50 feet, because they were classed as light timber. Under the new system the legal calculation is 66 feet to the ton. But, of course, under the old system the Railway Companies could, if they chose, carry at 66 feet to the ton.

Sir M. Hicks Beach

\*MR. CRAIG: That is the point I wish to bring out. I have been connected with the timber trade for more years than I care to recollect—though I am not connected with it now, and am largely interested in the North Eastern Railway Company—and I say emphatically that as long as I can remember deals, battens, and boards have been carried at a measurement of 66 feet to the ton, and  $2\frac{1}{2}$  tons to the standard. But I go further, and corroborate all my hon. Friend (Mr. Storey) has said. Again, the timber we deal in comes exclusively from the North of Europe, from Sweden, from Norway, from Finland, and from North Russia. This timber trade must come in by our ports, for hon. Gentlemen may take it for granted that the ships will not go round by the Pentland Firth to get, say, to Liverpool or Bristol. The trade must come to Hull, or to the Wear, the Tees, or the Tyne. The traders of the North Eastern ports do not object to the carriage by machine weight as such; but the position they would be placed in is this—that if the timber were carried by machine weight the traffic would be so interfered with that it would be absolutely impossible in the summer and autumn to get waggons down and weighed and dispatched in time to carry on the business. Is it worth while to put the North Eastern timber trade to all this inconvenience for the sake of a little trifling uniformity? I have no objection to the system of uniformity, but it is possible that one practice may be convenient in one district or to one trade, which is not convenient in any other trade. It has been said over and over again that timber is taken at 50, but we have had it carried at 66. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) made a point about elm; but he forgot entirely that elm is carried at 40 cubic feet to the ton, because it is calculated that deals and boards are 65 per cent. lighter in weight.

MR. HANBURY: I took my figures from the official calculations.

*MR. CRAIG: We have put our case, and I assert that if you drive us to machine weight you will stop the traffic; you will stop the loading and the unloading of great steamers; you will increase the cost of everything, and will do nobody any good.

*MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I have myself put down notice of Motion for the rejection of the Bill, but shall not move it after the discussion which has taken place. I desire to say, however, that I consider several of the provisions of the Bill extremely inimical to English trade, and that I shall vote for the Amendment.

Question put.

(3.30.) The House divided:—Ayes 135; Noes 148.—(Div. List, No. 116.)

Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUESTIONS.

MILITIAMEN AND SUNDAY DUTY.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether militiamen are bound to perform work on Sundays not obligatory in the regular Army, such as practice in forming sections, kit inspection, &c.?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The Militia when under training are subject to exactly the same regulations as men in the regular Army.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: If I bring some particulars of the case before the hon. Gentleman will he inquire into it?

MR. BRODRICK: No, Sir, it is impossible to make any different reply, because what a militiaman is called upon to do he must do the same as a regular soldier. The hon. Member is probably aware that soldiers are not, as a rule, required to perform unnecessary work on Sunday.

THE COTTARS IN SOUTH UIST.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Secretary for Scotland has been informed that such distress prevails among the cottar class in South Uist as to render it necessary to appeal to the public; whether he has received memorials from the people of South Uist and Barra, craving that roads be formed to townships where none exist; and whether some means could be devised to relieve the distress by useful employment, such as road making?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): The Secretary for Scotland has made inquiry, but has obtained no information to show that exceptional distress prevails among the cottars of South Uist. The answer to the second paragraph of the hon. Member's question is in the affirmative. With regard to the last part of the question, the duty of making new roads, where new roads are necessary, belongs to the Local Authorities rather than to the Imperial Government, but Her Majesty's Government are now considering whether, in certain special districts of Scotland, the deficiency in means of communication is so great that it cannot be adequately supplied unless assistance be afforded from Imperial funds to Local Authorities in order to help them to discharge this duty. The Government are not yet in a position to come to a final decision on the subject; and, in the particular case of South Uist, I am quite unable at present to say whether the construction of the roads referred to in the memorials mentioned by the hon. Member is of such urgent necessity as to require exceptional treatment. In any case, the hon. Member may be assured that the Secretary for Scotland is fully alive to the necessity of carefully watching the condition of districts like South Uist, though he trusts that nothing is likely to occur to render the intervention of the Government necessary for the purpose of coping with distress.

POSTAL SERVICE TO BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the inefficiency of the mail service between the United Kingdom and East British Central Africa; whether he is aware that a period of 33 days sometimes elapses without a mail arriving, although the Castle and Union Steamship Companies' steamers call at the ports of East British Central Africa; whether he has received complaints of the great inconvenience caused to the Europeans of the Shiré

Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh

Highlands in consequence of such irregular delivery of the mails; and whether he will take steps to remedy the grievance complained of?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I am well aware that the postal service to the remote regions of Central Africa is very imperfect. Correspondence for the Lake Nyassa region is in ordinary course sent to Zanzibar, to be forwarded as opportunities occur. The Castle Company's steamers do not appear to go to the ports of East British Central Africa, but the Union Company's go to Mozambique once in six weeks, and letters for the interior are sent by them when superscribed accordingly. The establishment of a regular packet service to the Chindé mouth of the Zambesi would involve a much greater expense than the postal interests concerned would justify.

THE CHARGES AGAINST SERGEANT DOWNEY.

MR. McCARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, notwithstanding the charges made and sustained against Sergeant Downey, of Dromara, County Down, at a Constabulary Court of Inquiry, in February last, he has still been retained in charge of the Police Station at Dromara; whether, notwithstanding that the charges which he made against Constables Corvin and Wallace were not proven, both constables have been removed from the Station; whether he is aware of the strong feeling of indignation which the punishment of the constables and the retention of Sergeant Downey has caused in the district; and whether he will in the interests of the peace and order of the district, suggest to the Inspector General the desirability of reconsidering the continuance of Sergeant Downey in charge of this Station?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University) (who replied): Five charges were made against the sergeant in question, but only one was sustained. As regards the other four he was acquitted by the Court. The two constables were not punished, but in the interests of the service they were transferred to another district. My right hon. Friend has no information as regards the statement in the third paragraph of the question, but he is making inquiries on the subject.

ENLISTMENT OF BOYS IN THE ARMY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office what is the minimum age fixed by the Army Regulations for the enlistment of boys; if a boy gets enlisted under age, can he or his parents claim discharge on proof being given that he was under age at the time of enlistment; whether he is aware that a boy named P. Bradley, No. 346, P.C., joined the 8th Hussars in Dublin last April, being then only 17 years and six months; whether his father, with his consent, has claimed his discharge on the ground that he is under age, and supplied certificate of birth in proof; whether his discharge has been refused; and, if so, on what grounds; and will he see that Bradley is at once discharged?

MR. BRODRICK: There is no minimum age fixed by law, but under the Army Regulations recruits are not enlisted before the age of 18 years unless they possess the physical equivalents of that age. If through false pretences a boy under that age enlists, his parents cannot claim his discharge, although occasionally it is allowed as an act of grace. P. Bradley did enlist last April, and his father has since supplied a certificate showing that he was then only 17½ years old. He gave his age on enlisting as over 18 years, and as the medical officer who examined him found him to be physically equivalent to 18½ years of age his discharge has been refused. Under the circumstances the Secretary of State sees no reason for overruling the recommendation of the General Officer commanding the district by ordering Bradley's discharge.

THE CASE OF THOMAS O'LEARY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can say if a prisoner, Thomas O'Leary, confined in Mountjoy Prison is now employed out-of-doors, or how is he employed; and is it intended to employ him outside?

MR. MADDEN (who replied): The General Prisons Board have reported that the convict O'Leary is not employed out-of-doors, but that he is engaged in shoemaking. His application for outdoor work was made on the 21st March, and was granted; but he declined to avail himself of the permission, as it was not to be made permanent. The promise of permanent outdoor work is made in the case of no convict.

GALLOWS HILLS, CARRICKMACROSS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has received memorials from the inhabitants of Carrickmacross, County Monaghan, with reference to certain lands known as "Gallows Hills," situate in the immediate vicinity of that town, in which they claim that this land is common, and has been used as a public park by the people from time immemorial, and complain that certain persons have recently appropriated certain portions of it and erected buildings thereon; and whether he intends to take any, and what, steps in this matter?

MR. MADDEN (who replied): No memorials have been received by the Irish Government from the inhabitants of Carrickmacross regarding the land referred to; but a communication has been received on the subject from an individual resident. If any private or public right has been invaded by the action complained of, the parties aggrieved have a legal remedy.

RIGHT OF WAY IN THE CURRAGH OF KILDARE.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he is aware that a site for the erection of a labourer's cottage, on a farm adjoining the Curragh of Kildare, has been selected and approved of by the Naas Board of Guardians, and that the contractor employed by the Guardians for the building of the cottage has been unable to undertake the work, in consequence of the refusal of the Deputy Ranger of the Curragh to allow him access to the site; and whether, inasmuch as the only means of access is across a strip of waste land about nine yards in width between the public road and the farm, over which a right of way has always existed, he will state under what authority the Deputy Ranger is acting in closing up a right of way?

MR. BRODRICK: The War Department has no information on this subject, as the Deputy Ranger of the Curragh is under the jurisdiction of the Irish Board of Works.

THE DELAGOA BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the award of the jurists assembled at Berne, Switzerland, in August, 1891, to decide the amount the Portuguese Government are to pay to the Delagoa Bay Railway Company for the forcible seizure of the above line has yet been promulgated; and, if not, when the award may be expected, seeing that nine months have already elapsed?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): I think the hon. Member is under a misapprehension. The jurists have not yet assembled to hear the parties, nor has the case yet been before them on its merits. The cases of the Delagoa Bay Railway Company and of the American claimants were forwarded for presentation to the Arbitration Tribunal on the 2nd April last. The Arbitration Tribunal has ordered that the case of the Portuguese Government shall be presented to them not later than the 22nd July. A further period of three months is assigned for the reply and for the rejoinder. When the documentary evidence shall have been presented, the parties will be at liberty to plead by counsel. It is, therefore, impossible to say when the award may be expected.

THE USE OF REVOLVERS.

SIR J. BAIN (Whitehaven): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the numerous accidents and cases of murder and suicide caused by revolvers; and whether there is any intention, by licensing the use of such weapons or otherwise, to lessen the dangers arising from their use?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): My attention has on several occasions been called to this question. A licence for a revolver is already required by law, as in the case of a gun. But any alteration in the present system of licensing is a matter involving restrictive legislation, which is found to be attended by considerable difficulty, and I do not think that the question can be dealt with by the Government during the present Session.

IMPROVEMENT WORKS IN THE HIGHLANDS.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate how many applications have been made to the Secretary for Scotland by County Councils in the Highlands for grants in aid of constructing and improving small harbours, piers, and boat slips, under Section 2 of The Western Highlands and Islands (Scotland) Act, 1891; what is the gross amount applied for, and what is the amount the Government proposes to ask Parliament for this Session, under the said Section?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I have to inform the hon. Member in answer to the first part of the question that 33 applications have been received up to the present; but I am unable to state the gross amount applied for, as the estimates of cost are not completed. The hon. Member will find in the current Estimates that the Government ask Parliament for a sum of £8,000 for the minor works under the Act.

RAILWAY COMMUNICATION IN SCOTLAND.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government have considered the Report of the Special Committee appointed last Session to inquire into certain schemes for the improvement of railway communication on the western coast of Scotland; what are the intentions of the Government with regard to the recommendations of the Committee in respect of the construction of a railway to Lochinver, on the west coast of Sutherland; and whether the Highland Railway Company have agreed to expend a sum of £200,000 in the construction, maintenance, and working of such line, on condition of obtaining assistance from the Government?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am sorry I cannot give a definite answer to these two questions which the hon. Gentleman has put to me. It was only yesterday I had a discussion with the Secretary for Scotland and the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to what steps should be taken in both these matters; and I hope something will be done with regard to both of them in a very brief space of time. But I cannot at present give any definite information on the subject.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Will the right hon. Gentleman be able to give a specific answer to the deputation to-morrow on this point?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that I can give more definite information on the subject; but before to-morrow I hope to have an opportunity of consulting with my colleagues.

THE COLLOONEY AND CLAREMORRIS LINE.

MR. COLLERY (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any final arrangement has been come to between the Treasury and the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company for the completion of the Collooney and Claremorris line; if any hitch, as reported, has arisen in the matter; and whether, in the event of the Waterford and Limerick Company not proceeding with the work, the Government have in view any further arrangement by which the line may be completed?

MR. MADDEN (who replied): I am not in a position to make any definite and conclusive statement in answer to the question. If the hon. Member would put it to the right hon.

Gentleman the Chief Secretary on Thursday he may be able to give him the information.

THE CONVICT P. W. NALLY.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state by whom the information was given that the late P. W. Nally was engaged in a plot to escape, which led to his transfer from Mountjoy to Downpatrick Prison in 1886; and was the Governor of Mountjoy Prison aware of the matter before it was communicated to him by the Castle authorities?

MR. MADDEN (who replied): The information sought for by the hon. Member in the question is of such a character that it is never divulged by the Government, and would not be by any Government.

DR. TANNER: Am I to understand from the right hon. Gentleman that he cannot say where this information was obtained, whether inside or outside the gaol? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is a certain stigma attaching to poor innocent people in connection with this subject?

MR. MADDEN: I have already stated that, whatever the hon. Member's motives may be in connection with the matter, any information of this kind no Government can divulge.

DR. TANNER: I will raise this subject on the Estimates.

LONDON COMPANIES' IRISH ESTATES.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what is the cause of the delay in printing the evidence taken by the Committee on the London Companies' Irish Estates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am unfortunately not able to give very full information on this subject. I gather from a communication which I have received that the Committee only took evidence during part of the years 1889-90, and that that evidence has been printed. I shall make further inquiry, and may be able to give the hon. and learned Gentleman additional information on the subject.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I thank the right hon. Gentleman. I was informed in the proper office that the evidence was not printed.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the very inferior quality of the paper on which Parliamentary Papers are now printed, the pages being so thin that the type on the other side shows through; to whom the contract for the supply of this paper has been given, and at what price; and whether he will see that in future the paper is of ordinarily good quality?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): No complaints on the subject, except that of the hon. Member, have reached me. I have inquired, and I am informed that there is no running contract for the supply of the paper in question. It is purchased by open tender as it is required, and the prices paid vary considerably. Steps have been taken by the Controller of the Stationery Office which, it is believed, will have the effect of materially improving the quality of future supplies.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA ORDERS.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been called to the difficulty which was experienced in Lancashire on the day when the pleuro-pneumonia restrictions were removed, by the fact that the railway companies had no notice of their removal, and refused to transport cattle on that day; and whether he will direct in future that just as notice of the restrictions is sent to the railway companies, so also shall notice of their removal?

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would also answer a question which I wish to put to him in connection with this subject. It is whether he is aware of the great complaints that have been made in Essex and elsewhere as to the manner in which notices from the Board of Agriculture have been circulated in rural districts, and whether he will impress upon the authorities the desirability of giving better publicity to them?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): No, I am not aware of what the hon. Member has stated, but I will make inquiries about it, and see that proper publicity is given to these notices. I have no knowledge of the difficulty to which the noble Lord refers. The Order removing the pleuro-pneumonia restrictions in Lancashire was passed on 18th June, 1891, and took effect from 23rd June. Copies of it were sent on the day on which it was passed to all the principal Railway Companies in Lancashire, and on 20th June a copy was sent to every Railway Company in Great Britain. Speaking generally, I may say that the same measures are taken to notify the removal of restrictions as are taken when restrictions are imposed.

BALLINCOLLIG GUNPOWDER COMPANY.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether the Ballincollig Gunpowder Company have recently tendered for the supply of barrels; and, if so, for how many, with what conditions, and with what result; whether, in connection with the recent contract for gunpowder with the Ballincollig Powder Company, County Cork, it is a fact the contract was for 500 barrels; that the Government supplied 200 of these barrels, and asked the Company to supply the remaining 300; and whether these 300 will be supplied by the Government, or left to be rendered by local labour?

MR. BRODRICK: The contract with the Ballincollig Powder Company was for 500 gunpowder barrels, of which 200 had been previously ordered. The Company preferred to use the Government barrels for packing the gunpowder, and they have been invited by the Government to send barrels on future occasions of their own manufacture.

DR. TANNER: Am I to understand that the Government have left an option to the Company to supply these 300 barrels?

MR. BRODRICK: Certainly.

Mr. Timothy Healy

VESTRYMEN AND VOTING PENALTIES.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, having regard to the large number of vestrymen in London affected by the recent decision of Mr. Justice Denman in the case of "Gordon v. Williamson," the Government will bring in at once a short Bill of idemnity to protect such vestrymen from the penalties to which that decision appears to render them liable?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The step which the hon. Member has suggested to the Government to take is a very serious one; and I am not aware of any circumstances which would justify the Government in proceeding as he proposes.

EXAMINATIONS FOR CUSTOMS OFFICIALS.

MR. BAUMANN: On behalf of my hon. and learned Friend Mr. Forrest Fulton (West Ham, N.), I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Board of Customs to hold an examination for the position of first class examining officer within the next twelve months; and whether it is the intention of the Board to add any names to the original list of 61 candidates at the recent examination, seeing that almost every one of the 61 officers have now been promoted?

SIR J. GORST: It is not at present possible to fix the date for the next examination for vacancies of examining officer of the first class, but any further vacancies beyond the 61 provided for, which it may be thought necessary to fill, will be filled by a fresh examination, of which due notice will be given.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

DR. TANNER: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury when he proposes to take the Vote on Account, and if there is any truth in the statement which is now being circulated that the right hon. Gentleman proposes taking a Vote on Account just before Whitsuntide so as to enable the business of the country to be carried on up to next October, after the General Election?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot state absolutely, without consulting the Secretary to the Treasury, when the Vote on Account will be taken; but it certainly will be before Whitsuntide, and I do not believe it will be necessary to take a Vote for more than a few weeks.

DR. TANNER: Is Supply not going to be dealt with?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Oh, yes.

DR. TANNER: When?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot tell the date.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SMALL AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.—(No. 183.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 9th May.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 24, after the word "Act," to insert the words—"The County Council shall have power to let one or more small holdings of not more than 15 acres each to a number of persons working on a co-operative system, provided the same be approved by the County Council."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Amendment agreed to.

(4.5.) MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I beg to move—

In page 2, line 24, after "Act," to insert,—
"Provided that a tenant of any small holding may, before the expiration of his tenancy, remove any fruit and other trees and bushes planted or acquired by him for which he has no claim for compensation.

"Provided also, that any tenant of a small holding may, before the expiration of his tenancy, remove any toolhouse, shed, greenhouse, fowlhouse, or pigstye built or acquired by him for which he has no claim for compensation."

This is precisely the same Amendment which was agreed to by the Government in the Allotments Act, and it is copied from that Amendment. I understood from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) last night that he was prepared to accept it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 24, after the word "Act," to insert the words "Provided that a tenant of any small holding may, before the expiration of his tenancy, remove any fruit and other trees and bushes planted or acquired by him for which he has no claim for compensation."

"Provided also, that any tenant of a small holding may, before the expiration of his tenancy, remove any toolhouse, shed, greenhouse, fowlhouse, or pigstye built or acquired by him for which he has no claim for compensation."—(Mr. Seale-Hayne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(4.6.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The object sought to be attained by this Amendment is, I think, already provided for. It seems to me to be covered by the Agricultural Holdings Act.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE: I think the right hon. Gentleman will see that, at all events, that portion of the Amendment relating to the removal of "Any toolhouse, shed, greenhouse, fowl house, or pigstye, built or acquired by him for which he has no claim for compensation" is not covered by the Agricultural Holdings Act.

Question put, and agreed to.

*(4.7.) MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to move—

In page 2, line 24, after the words last inserted, to insert the words, "Provided also that the County Council shall not in any case require the payment from any tenant of his rent, or any part thereof, in advance."

I should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment?

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 24, after the words last inserted, to insert the words, "Provided also that the County Council shall not in any case require the payment from any tenant of his rent, or any part thereof, in advance." (Mr. Cobb.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(4.8.) MR. CHAPLIN: My own view is that matters of this kind ought to be left to the County Councils, as the popular representative body; and I am sure that they may be very properly left in their hands. I imagine that the County Councils are very unlikely to abuse their powers in this direction.

But if they ever do so, the remedy will be in the hands of the electors themselves.

*MR. COBB: I have some experience as regards the Allotments Act. In the Allotments Act we know that the Rural Sanitary Authorities have power to demand one quarter's rent in advance; and I do not know anything in the Act that has produced more dissatisfaction amongst the tenants of allotments than this power which has been given to the Rural Sanitary Authorities or Boards of Guardians. I do not say they have exercised it in a great number of cases. I do not think they have; but the tenants of allotments feel it as a slur upon them that they should be the only class that should be called upon to pay their rents in advance. I may mention that when the Allotments Bill was under consideration I moved an exactly similar Amendment. Then the Members of the Government and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division voted against that Amendment. But I am happy to say that the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) and other hon. Members on the other side of the House repented of that course, because the next Session a Bill was introduced by them, one of the provisions of which was that the Sanitary Authorities in the rural districts should not have power to demand rents from allotment tenants in advance. If it was unnecessary to demand rents in advance in that case, I think it is still more unnecessary in this case. The point is a simple one, and I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman does not agree to my proposal. At all events, I consider the matter of sufficient importance to be decided by the Committee, and I shall certainly divide upon it.

(4.11.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): There is a difference between allotments and these small holdings. I was in hopes that the Allotments Act would be largely adopted by populous boroughs. In that case there would be a large number of applications coming before the Treasurer or Borough Surveyor for allotments, and it would not be the same as in the country where the administrative body would know each applicant. The authorities in a large city would have no guarantee whatever as to the character of the applicants, except in demanding, or in having the power to demand, that the rent should be paid down. But it is quite a different matter with small holdings, which are not likely to be taken up by men in towns. This Bill will be operative only in the country districts, where the County Council will know the personal character of all the applicants. In that case, I do not see any reason why these applicants, any more than any other tenants who apply for land, should be required to submit to terms which other tenants are not required to submit to.

*SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I should like to support the Amendment, because I know that in many instances, under the Allotments Act, this payment of rent in advance has been felt to be a very great hardship. At the time he gets his allotment a man wants every penny he has in his possession in order to enable him to do justice to the land, and what is true of agricultural labourers obtaining allotments would, à fortiori, be true of agricultural labourers obtaining small holdings, and I am sure the chances of success of many a poor man in the rural districts would be very much enhanced if the right hon. Gentleman would allow this Amendment to be carried. I do not think the reasons given by the hon. Member for Bordesley are sufficient or adequate for his course of conduct on a former occasion. He admits that he sacrificed the rural labourers for the sake of the authorities of the large towns. He allowed the Allotments Act to pass in a form, which permitted authorities to take rent in advance, because he was afraid some people of not very good character might obtain allotments. I think that is a very inadequate reason, and I am glad the hon. Member is now in another frame of mind.

(4.14.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): This seems to me to be a practical question. I understand that the County Council will not have the right or option of selecting their tenants. They are a public body offering land to all comers, and I think it would be injudicious and improper for the County Council to prefer one tenant to another. Of course, a private landlord would take care that a tenant would have some reasonable means to enable him to pay a fair rent; but here the only security of the County Council, if they are in doubt, will be to ask an applicant to pay the rent beforehand. I do not see how any County Council can refuse land to any ratepayer or any person in the land if he asks for it, although they may have very great doubts as to his ability to pay rent, and County Councils would have no security, for the crops would be removed and there would be nothing left for them. I think, in the interests of the poor man who has very little credit, it would be an advantage to him to pay his rent in advance in order to get the land.

(4.16.) MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I hope my right hon. Friend will be firm in resisting the Amendment. It seems to me an unwise attempt to fetter the County Council. Hon. Gentlemen opposite do not seem to have much faith in a County Council if they cannot trust it to do justice between man and man in a matter of this kind.

Question put.

(4.20.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 138; Noes 205.—(Div. List, No. 117.)

(4.33.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to move, in page 2, line 27, to leave out the word "inclusive," and insert the word "exclusive." I propose this Amendment in order that the County Council may have a larger sum available for the purchase of obtaining land, and that the allowance to officers of the Council for work connected with the acquisition and adaptation of the land should not be included in it.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 27, to leave out the word "inclusive," and insert the word "exclusive."—(Mr. Thomas Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'inclusive' stand part of the Clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: I cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Member, because it would throw the expense of the operation of the Act upon the rates.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 4.

*(4.39.) MR. COBB: It is desirable that the inquiry should be made by those who know something about the locality concerned. Therefore, I propose that the Committee should not necessarily be the same in every case, but that it should vary according to the part of the country in which it is alleged in the petition that there is a demand for small holdings. If the right hon. Gentleman can assure me that it is his intention to carry out some such arrangement, I will withdraw this Amendment at once. I should be quite satisfied as long as steps are taken to meet local requirements.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 32, after the word "Act," to insert the words "and the constitution of such Committee shall vary according to the part or parts of the county in which it is alleged, in any petition presented under Sub-section 2 of this section, that there is a demand for small holdings. Such Committee shall include the Councillor or Councillors representing such part or parts, and every Councillor and Alderman residing therein, and also the chairman of every District and Parish Council that may be established by any Act of Parliament which may be passed in this or any succeeding Session of Parliament which comprises such part or parts in its area."—(Mr. Cobb.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHAPLIN: I cannot accept the Amendment as it stands, but I recognise the force of the hon. Member's suggestion, and I am prepared to meet him by amending the clause so that Councillors of the district in which there is a demand for small holdings shall in all cases be added to the Committee.

*MR. COBB: Is there any reason why the right hon. Gentleman should not put in Aldermen as well?

MR. CHAPLIN: I will take the Aldermen too.

(4.40.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I understand that the Committee appointed under Sub-section 4 is to be a permanent body, and, judging by the work to be carried out, it would be necessary that it should be a continuing body. In this case I hope it will be a very important body—in fact, a sort of Land Court for the county—and that, in accepting the Amendment, the right hon. Gentleman will not do anything to destroy its permanent character.

*MR. COBB: The object of the Amendment is to vary the Committee according to the different districts, so that when an inquiry is made those who are on the Committee may know something about it. It appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman is inclined to go much farther towards satisfying us than the hon. Member for Bordesley.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON (Devon, Tavistock): I think it would improve the machinery of the Bill if the Amendment were adopted.

(4.48.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): There is another important matter to be considered. The County Councils are to assume the management of the farms and holdings within the boroughs, but the Town Councils are to have nothing to do with them. Now I suggest that that is a great defect in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman should remember that all the counties are not agricultural counties. There are, for instance, 700,000 people in the county of Durham; 60,000 of them are particularly interested in this Bill, while all the rest are manufacturers, miners, and shipbuilders, and the right hon. Gentleman is going to take the rates of the towns in order to place a certain number of persons in possession of land. I submit that in the case of such counties as Durham the Town Councils should not be ignored. There should be an addition to the clause which would enable Borough Councils to have some voice in the settlement of their own affairs.

THE CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. Member that that question will arise particularly on another clause. Is it the pleasure of the Committee that the Amendment be withdrawn?

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*SIR W. B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North-West): I wish to move in page 2, line 33, to leave out the words, "one or more," and insert "six." Six electors would then be able to present.

a Petition to the Council of their county alleging that there is a demand for small holdings in the county, and praying that the Act shall be put in force.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 33, to leave out the words "one or more," and insert the word "six."
—(Sir W. B. Barttelot.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: If the hon. Member will look a little lower down the clause he will find that I have endeavoured to avoid the difficulty indicated by him. It is there stated that—

"The petition shall be referred to a Committee appointed under this section, who, on being satisfied that the petition is presented in good faith and on reasonable grounds, shall forthwith cause an inquiry into the circumstances to be made, and shall report the result to the Council."

After the discussion we had on this particular question on the Allotments Bill, I should prefer to keep the clause as it is at present.

Question put, and agreed to.

(4.57.) MR. CHAPLIN: I will now move an addition to the third subsection, which may meet the views of the hon. Member for Rugby (Mr. Cobb)—

"In the event of the Councillor or Councillors representing part or parts of the county in which it is alleged that there is a demand for small holdings not being a Member or Members of the Committee, he or they shall be added to the Committee for the purpose of the consideration of the alleged demand."

The hon. Member suggested the addition of "Aldermen." I am not able now to agree to it, but I will consider the suggestion, and will endeavour to make some arrangement with regard to it. As to the observations of the hon. Member for Sunderland, I would point out that the whole question was discussed with considerable length at an earlier period of the Debate on this Bill, and that I have already made concessions in regard to it.

Amendment agreed to.

(4.59.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I beg to move, in page 2, after line 40, to add—

"(3.) When such a petition has been presented to the Council of a County, and the Council resolve not to put this part of this Act into operation, the Council shall send a copy of the petition, accompanied by a statement of their reasons for not acting upon it, and a copy of the Report of the Committee, to the Local Government Board, and thereupon the Local Government Board may, if they think fit, direct a local inquiry to be held by some person to be appointed for the purpose, and a report to be made with respect to the correctness and sufficiency of such reasons and report, and any matter connected therewith on which information may appear desirable."

The objection is presented that the County Councils have already discretion as to putting the Act in force. In proper cases we do not want to control their discretion; but there are County Councils who, for various motives, may not be desirous of doing their duty to the full extent in the way of perfectly considering the proposals of the Act, and, accordingly, this Amendment suggests that if the County Council, having a petition before them, resolve not to act, it shall be their duty to send a copy of the petition, with a statement of their reasons for not acting upon it, to the Local Government Board. Then the Local Government Board has discretionary power to direct an inquiry into the sufficiency of the reasons offered for not putting the Act into operation. The object of that is that we shall be able to move for Returns of the counties in which the Act is not in operation, and so get at the question of what the various County Councils have been doing. We shall exercise a sort of moral control over their operations, and there will be some sort of stimulus to action on their part. I beg to move this sub-clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, after line 40, add—(3.) When such a petition has been presented to the Council of a County, and the Council resolve not to put this part of this Act into operation, the Council shall send a copy of the petition, accompanied by a statement of their reasons for not acting upon it, and a copy of the Report of the Committee to the Local Government Board, and thereupon the Local Government Board may, if they think fit, direct a local inquiry to be held by some person to be appointed for the purpose, and a report to be made with respect to the correctness and sufficiency of such reasons and report, and any matter connected therewith on which information may appear desirable."—(Mr. Haldane.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. CHAPLIN: Supposing I accepted the Amendment, and the Local Government Board did send down to make this inquiry to which the hon. Member refers, and their officer reported. What then, there being no way of giving effect to the decision of the Local Government Board? It seems to me, therefore, that, in addition to over-riding in a somewhat harsh manner the decision of the Local Authority, which is naturally best fitted to judge of the requirements of its own district, no practical good would result from the Amendment.

MR. BARCLAY: For the sake of information, would the right hon. Gentleman be willing to agree to a clause requiring County Councils to send a copy of the petitions to the Local Government Board so as to afford an opportunity of ascertaining how the Act was being dealt with?

MR. STOREY: I think we may agree that the Local Government Board will often get snubbed. The Local Authorities can very well take care of their own affairs, unless the hon. Member would carry his Amendment further, and agree that national instead of local money shall be expended. If we are going to spend our own rates we really do not want to have anything to do with the Local Government Board.

Question put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, be agreed to."

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): Before the clause is passed, I wish to ask whether the Committee referred to in this clause may contain any other person than a member of the County Council, if the members deem it wise to appoint someone from their own body in order to give information on the subject before them? The hon. Member for Bordesley Division (Mr. Jesse Collings), I think, told us that in reference to a somewhat similar authority outsiders were sometimes admitted to special Committees.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Before the right hon. Gentleman replies, may

I say that I was contending for the continuity of the Committee? As I understand it, the County Council will, when it meets, appoint a Committee for Small Holdings. What I understood was an intention to have separate Committees for separate inquiries, and so never have a permanent Committee as a standing part of the Council. That is what I wished to say. The hon. Member for Rugby (Mr. Cobb) seemed to make light of that, although it seems to be the very thing he himself has done.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I think the Committee may be spared.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Yes, I think so, too. The hon. Member will remember he is not on the platform.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. CHAPLIN: In reply to the hon. Member behind me, what he asks can be done where it is provided for by Act of Parliament. Under the effect of the Bill as it stands there will be a permanent Committee to put this Act into operation, and to take cognisance of any petitions for the acquisition of land for small holdings which are presented, and to make inquiries into the subject. That accomplished it will report to the County Council. My object in inserting the clause was that such a petition might receive merited consideration.

Motion agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5.

On Motion of Mr. CHAPLIN, the following Amendment was agreed to:—In page 3, line 1, after the word "holding," to insert the words "sold by the County Council."

*MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I move, further, to omit the words "all costs of conveyance," and to insert—

"The costs of such certificate of transfer or registration of title as shall be deemed necessary for an indefeasible title under this Act."

I consider that if the costs of re-conveyance be left in this Clause, that the Bill will practically become inoperative. We know that at the present time there is great difficulty in effecting sales of land on account of the great cost of conveyance, but here there will be a double cost—the conveyance from the original owner to the County Council and re-conveyance from the County Council to the person who buys the land. The words "cost of conveyance" in this Clause do not apply to the original costs, because they are dealt with under Clause 3, and become part of the cost of purchase. Therefore, the only object of putting them in this Clause is to force the purchaser to pay the cost of conveyance in the second case. If that is to be so—taking a share of the original conveyance which is scattered over the different holdings under Clause 3 and the whole cost of re-conveyance in Clause 5—there will, in the case of a small holding of two or three acres, be added 40 to 50 per cent. to the purchase money. Therefore, as I am quite certain that the Bill would become utterly and entirely inoperative, I desire to leave out the words, and to establish in the Bill a system of transfer to the new purchaser from the County Council by means of a registration. The question of registration is nothing new. It has been in the platform of various Governments since 1880, and in 1887 a Bill dealing with registration was introduced by the present Government. Then there is the Land Registration Act now in operation, although nothing has been done under it since 1875, and there was a Clause similar to the one I have proposed in the Irish Bill of last year. The Minister of Agriculture himself has practically admitted the necessity of this, for I find he has placed an Amendment on the Paper himself providing for the payment of the costs of conveyance to the purchaser, including any costs of registration of title. But I do not care for his Amendment, because it still leaves the alternative of re-conveyance in the Bill, and the Committee may be perfectly certain that with the great objection lawyers have shown to any alteration in the law with regard to registration and transfer, the County Councils will be a long while before, under the advice of their clerks, they obtain such a system of registration as would make this Bill operative and practicable. I wish, therefore, to take out of the Bill all question of re-conveyance and have only one conveyance between the original owners and the County Councils, so that the County Councils shall by a simple transfer deed transfer the land at the cost of a few shillings to the purchaser. I am perfectly well aware that my words, as they stand, will not entirely accomplish the object I have in view; but if the right hon. Gentleman will look a little further on on the Amendment Paper he will find that I have down an Amendment to Clause 6, as well as the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings), which would carry out the proposal if these words are inserted in the Bill. And I may say that the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone) has an Amendment down which I shall be willing to accept in place of my own. I do hope that we are not going to place on the Statute Book an Act which never will be used, because it is utterly and entirely impossible that the purchasers of these small holdings can afford to pay the expenses of conveyance. The difficulty of purchasing land is no doubt a matter that has come home to us all. There are plenty of instances now of Nonconformist chapels and schools never having been enfranchised, and for which is still paid a yearly rental, because those interested prefer trusting to the good faith of the person from whom they rented the land instead of paying the expenses of conveyance, and I am certain that that would be the case here if it were possible. But here they will not have the option. They must either pay for the conveyance, or go without the land altogether, and therefore it is a question whether the Act shall come into force or not. My objection to the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment is not that I prefer my words to his, but because he would leave no option in this matter, as I think if there is an option we shall never get a system of registration. We want a register to be kept by the County Councils by order of the Lord Chancellor, to carry out the provisions of the Act of 1875, and that the transfer of land shall be by means of this register at a nominal cost to the purchaser, and not by a second conveyance with all the costs of lawyers' bills.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 2, after the word "include," to leave out "all costs of conveyance," and insert "the costs of such certificate of transfer and registration of title as shall be deemed necessary for an indefeasible title under this Act."—(Mr. Heneage.)

*(5.10.) MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I agree with what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. I believe that the uses of this Bill will in a few years be absolutely extinct, unless you adopt an Amendment for entirely clearing the titles from all those difficulties which have made the transfer of land up to this time so expensive that land has practically been a monopoly of the rich. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) has done a very good work in this Bill in giving to the owners of the holdings he has created an indefeasible title, and freeing them from the difficulties other land is subjected to. But unless he does something to keep the titles as clear and indefeasible as he makes them, in a short time all the evils of the system of land tenure in this country, and which Government after Government have attempted to remove, will re-appear, and the whole benefits conferred by this Bill will be lost. Now, Sir, this is a difficulty I have considered for the last 30 years. It does not merely affect the kind of holdings you are now creating. It has been the main difficulty in preventing workmen from owning their houses, or people in the neighbourhood of small towns possessing plots of land. Owing to the cost of transfer, land has become one of the most expensive things a man can invest in. We have to regret the disappearance of small holders of land, and I think the real reason for the disappearance of that class is the difficulty of replacing them. When a merchant disappears he can be replaced by anyone who wishes to take his place without immense expense; but when a small holder is thinking of buying a property he knows he is exposed to great uncertainty with regard to what he may be called upon to pay in the way of costs for conveyance. This is a difficulty that does not stand in the way of a large owner of property adding a farm to his estate to the same extent as in the case of a small man buying a property. I recollect a striking instance bearing on this point being brought before me some years ago, when I was engaged in carrying a Bill through this House for the purpose of making easier and less expensive the transfer of land. A man wrote to me to say he was so glad I had introduced that particular Bill. He had bought a house for £150, and he bargained with an attorney to convey it to him for £5; but when the bill of costs was sent in, the man found he had to pay more than £30. He applied to a lawyer, and was told there was no help for it. Well, about the same time I bought a small property for £4,000, and my total expenses for transfer were £40, so that in one case the cost was 1 per cent., and in the other 20 per cent. It is on account of this enormous cost of transfer to the comparatively poor that we have this disappearance of small holders. Then there is another point, and I am glad to observe signs in this Bill which indicate that the right hon. Gentleman sees the importance of it, because it is one of the greatest difficulties in the way of making his scheme of benefit to the working classes. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Gladstone) has rightly called attention to this. Suppose a man has saved a little money. Well, he can employ it a great deal better by taking a large farm and using it as capital than by buying a property. But if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) will make his small holding current coin, that can be borrowed upon without risk or expense, he gets rid of that difficulty. Supposing a man has £1,000, and he buys with it ten acres of land. He has hardly any working capital left. But if you make his holding current coin, with no difficulty in borrowing upon it beyond an examination of the register, the man has only to take the register to the banker, and the banker, if he knows him to be a good farmer, will advance him more than the whole value of his farm, because he knows he has that additional security in his stock, &c., which a banker acts upon. Your system, however, whatever it is, must be perfectly simple, and prevent the crowding of your title now or in the future with all the present difficulties. If the right hon. Gentleman does something of that kind than the comparatively poor man may safely invest his money in land, because it will be available for carrying on his business. I do not wish to detain the House longer, but I must say that I think the Amendment is necessary and that registration should be made compulsory, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take care to provide that the titles to the small holdings, as time goes on, shall be just as indefeasible as on the day he gives them.

MR. CHAPLIN: I can assure the right hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) that I am as anxious as he is that the Bill should be made a real one. It will be seen that I have placed on the Paper an Amendment which seems to me to differ very little, if at all, from the Amendment of my right hon. Friend. I would suggest that he should allow me to insert the Amendment I have to propose at a further stage, and that we should postpone this discussion on registration until it can be dealt with in new clauses. I may add that I have a perfectly open mind on this point, and without pledging myself further at the present time I may state that I am most anxious to deal with this question, and that I propose to put clauses on the Paper dealing with it.

*(5.20.) MR. HENEAGE: I should be glad to accept the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, but while, according to his Amendment, it is voluntary, with the County Council to establish a register, in mine it is compulsory. This will have a very great effect upon the lawyers' bills; and as the clerks to the Councils will be the persons to benefit by these charges, I want to make it incumbent on them to establish registration. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes me to understand that he desires it to be compulsory, and that that will be the effect of the new clause, I agree with him it would be better to discuss the clause when it comes.

(5.21.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I think this matter could very much better be discussed when the clause is brought up. The right hon. Gentleman will find that the words are substantially the same in both cases.

*(5.22.) MR. HENEAGE: It is a question of machinery. I think that it is better that the registration should be compulsory, but I agree that it is better that the matter should be discussed later on.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I should like to ask if these words "costs of conveyance" are kept in will they include the cost of proving the title?

MR. CHAPLIN: That question was settled in an earlier part of the Bill.

MR. HALDANE: I think it would be better to postpone the discussion on this very important matter till the clause is brought up.

Question put, and agreed to.

(5.23.) MR. CHAPLIN: I beg to move in page 3, line 2, to leave out the words "costs of conveyance," and insert the words "the costs of conveyance to the purchaser (including any costs of registration of title)."

Amendment agreed to.

(5.24.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I think it desirable now to determine what shall be purchased by the County Council and what shall be sold by the County Council to the purchaser. The proposal of the Bill is that one-fourth of the money shall be paid, and there are Amendments suggesting several other percentages, but I want to raise a question of principle. I do not want the County Council to sell to the small holder an economic rent, and I propose to add these words after "assistance," in line 3—

"It shall include the value of all buildings, roads, fencing, drains, and other improvements, all value due to the expenditure of capital and labour in forming the holding, but shall not include the natural value of the soil and site or economic rent."

I wanted to get the legal jargon to express these economic phrases, and I asked several hon. and learned Gentlemen on this side, but I could not get what I wanted, and I have had to leave the words in ordinary phrases. At present rent represents two things: It represents the interest payable to the landlord for capital invested in the buildings, drains, and in all those so-called improvements which add to the value of the soil. So far as England is concerned, that probably represents from three-quarters to four-fifths of the rent payable by tenants. The economic rent is what remains. There is the value which labour and capital have created, the value given to the land by its possessor or his predecessors. But there is another value, which is simply the value of the inherent power of the soil. Take, for instance, four fields, and place in those fields the same amount of capital and labour, and yet one gives 30 bushels to the acre, another 35, another 40, and the fourth may give more. That depends simply on the geological and chemical structure of the soil, not created by any individual, but created by nature, and no one is entitled to the rent from it in preference to any other individual. Then there is also the value of site, which is also economic. This natural value of the soil ought to go to the County Council for the purposes of taxation. If you sell it to a new holder you are giving him a right to a superior soil. You are giving him a monopoly and a privilege by which he will become richer than his fellows in a similar position who have not got his privilege. The question is between what the County Council buys and what it sells. I take it that the four per cent. you are going to charge on what is allowed to remain will represent the difference. I think that should be retained by the County Council in perpetuity. I will not detain the Committee further, but will move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 3, after the word "assistance," to insert the words "It shall include the value of all buildings, roads, fencing, drains, and other improvements, all value due to the expenditure of capital and labour in forming the holding, but shall not include the natural value of the soil and site or economic rent."—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(5.30.) MR. CHAPLIN: So far as I have been able to apprehend his meaning, the Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) says that rent represents two things: one of them is the interest which may fairly be claimed for outlay that has been made on the land by the owner, or by those who expended money on it; and the other is the economic rent which he describes as the inherent power of the soil. No one, he says, has any right to that inherent value. There we part company, and I do not think it is necessary for me to discuss the question at any great length. Take the case of a man who has bought a piece of land. I hold that the man's right to his land in that case is exactly the same as the right of the hon. Member to the coat on his back or the watch in his pocket. The cases are exactly the same, and I trust the hon. Member will forgive me if I decline to enter into a discussion which promises to go into the question of land nationalisation.

(5.31.) DR. CLARK: I think the right hon. Gentleman knows something about the matter, but he is trying to throw dust in our eyes. He was unfortunate in his illustration, for the coat on my back is the result of human industry, and the labourer who created it from the raw material had a right to it. I will go further, and say that the men who now have the soil have a right to it, and if we take it away from them they ought to be compensated. But in this case we are not dealing with present landlords; we are going to create new rights in holdings, and the question is whether there should be any limit. The only proper basis of property is that the labourer who creates it, and those who by abstinence save it, have a right to it. But with respect to the natural power of the soil, the right hon. Gentleman knows that there is a difference, though he declines to discuss it, and his argument about my coat and my watch is entirely beside the point. He knows very well also the value of site; and if he wishes to treat the matter in this way, we shall have a Division to take the view of the House on the matter. I sense we quite know in this case whether do not the legal phrase is nationalisation or localisation; but hon. Members will follow my meaning when I say that no one has any more than his fellows, of the soil has not created it, and it because he belongs to the whole community. ought to belong to the whole community. The present landlords have been permitted to hold the land, and when making a change it is best and when making to do it by purchase or compensation. I want to nationalise, so to speak, for the county the economic value of the holdings which may be sold by the County Council.

(5.36.) MR. STOREY: I should be glad to agree with my hon. Friend if I could grasp his meaning. As the Bill stands the County Council can buy land and sell to the new occupier what it likes, and if it chooses to adopt the view of my hon. Friend and sell only a portion, reserving the rest in the form of a rent-charge, it can do so. By so doing it will be repaid the capital amount, and in the future receive interest on the unsold part of the holding. I therefore fail to see what my hon. Friend seeks to gain by his Amendment.

*(5.38.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): This is an Amendment which we might well have had an opportunity of considering. As I understand it, the Amendment makes it compulsory on the County Council to reserve a rent which my hon. Friend called the economic rent. That would be the proper way to deal with the question, for then in course of time the County or Parish Councils would probably receive sufficient rent, to pay their local rates. I do not take it that there is any confiscation as suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, as the new occupiers would only pay for what they got. I do not believe that the Amendment is likely at this moment to get proper consideration, but I believe it is the proper way to deal with the land question, especially with a view to the future.

(5.40.) MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I hope my hon. Friend will not press the Amendment. It appears to me that it would produce exactly the opposite effect to that which he intends. He intends that the economic rent, which he defines as those qualities of the land which are not conferred by labour, but which arise from the qualities of the soil and the advantage of situation, should be kept for the benefit of the County Council and not go to the new freeholder. On the principle there might be something to say, but how would it work out? The County Council might buy land for £100, and then sell it to the new freeholders for £80, supposing one-fifth to represent that which he says is unsaleable; therefore, the County Council would be one-fifth to the bad on the transaction, instead of being one-fifth to the good.

(5.42.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): The County Council would not be quite so badly off as my hon. Friend who has just sat down seems to think, for they would retain the 20 per cent. as a quit-rent, but I do not think the suggestion of my hon. Friend in the Amendment is a practical one. My view is that a much larger proportion of the value would be wisely retained by the Council, even as much as 80 per cent. We should try to get from the Government the retention of a quit-rent in as large a proportion as we can. If the County Council sells right out in any future dealing with the land question we should have to deal with a hundred proprietors, while now we have only to deal with one. I hope the Amendment will not be pressed to a Division, as I think it would defeat the object we have in view.

(5.44.) DR. CLARK: I am desirous of taking a Division on the Amendment, as this is the first time, so far as Great Britain is concerned, that we have had the Irish principle, which I opposed, before us. I do not wish to transfer an unjust monopoly from one class, a small one, to another class, a large one. I do not think the hon. Member for Lanark (Mr. Crawford) heard me explain that the difference is simply whether you sell certain things at a certain price, or other things at a higher price. The economic value of these holdings will go on increasing with the increase of the population, and the increase of wealth which will follow the future decrease of competition by our Colonies and America, which will require all their food-stuffs for themselves. Under these circumstances, I think I am compelled to take a Division.

(5.45.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 42; Noes 329.—(Div. List, No. 118.)

(6.4.) MR. BARCLAY: I beg to move—

In page 3, line 6, after the word "purchase" to insert the words—(3.) "The whole or part of the purchase money may be paid by annual or semi-annual instalments, but such instalments shall not extend over a period of fifty years from the date of the sale as may be agreed on with the Council."

The object of this Amendment is to facilitate the acquisition of land by people of small capital, and at the same time to give perfect security to the County Councils. This proposal does not make it imperative upon the County Councils; it only empowers the County Councils and authorises them, if they see fit, to receive the whole of the price of the land, or part of the price by annual instalments. I think after the experience we have had of these instalments in Ireland, we ought to have equal confidence in the small farmers of England and Scotland. Speaking with regard to Scotland, I can say if this system were adopted a small capitalist occupying his land would strain every effort to pay his instalments. I hope the Government will look with favour upon this Amendment. It is not imperative, but enables the County Council, if they think they can do so with security, to take payment of the price by instalments.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 6, after the word "purchase" to insert, as a new sub-section, the words—(3.) "The whole or part of the purchase money may be paid by annual or semi-annual instalments, but such instalments shall not extend over a period of fifty years from the date of the sale as may be agreed on with the Council"—(Mr. Barclay.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.7.) MR. CHAPLIN: If the hon. Member will look again at Sub-section 4, he will see that the County Council can do exactly what he desires.

MR. BARCLAY: That is the objectionable portion.

MR. CHAPLIN: If the object is to ask me to give up that, then I cannot.

(6.8.) MR. HALDANE: This Amendment is a very important one. It negatives any future attempt to get rid of the one-fourth deposit. Now, I own it seems to me that this clause requiring a deposit is a very great difficulty in the way of this Bill becoming an effectual Bill. Suppose a small holder wishes to become a small occupier under this Bill, what is his position? He has got to find money for stock. Some people put it as high as £10 an acre, and nobody puts it lower than £3 an acre. Suppose it is a farm of between 30 and 40 acres, that means he has got to find £100 down. Then, under the Bill, he has got to find this deposit in addition. That will mean he has got to find another £100 or £150. How many agricultural labourers are there in this country who can find £200? They will find difficulty in getting enough for the bare requisites of stock, and in making a living as they go on. On these grounds we who are anxious to remove this restriction must support the Amendment. It is said there is a danger that you will be letting in an impecunious class of tenants. But there would be no more danger of that than in letting—certainly no more danger than in the case of the Irish tenants. This minimum deposit is something new, and it seems to me if you intend to reach the class who have not got a large amount of means to come and go upon, it is a very unnecessary and unnatural provision to introduce into a Bill of this kind.

*(6.11.) MR. MORTON: I confess I agree with this Amendment so far as it would allow County Councils to advance the whole of the purchase money. I cannot see how this Bill is to be of any use at all to the class of agriculturists whom it is hoped to benefit, unless you lend them the whole of the money. We have to bear in mind that they will in any case have to stock these little holdings to some extent, and how you can expect them, in addition, to find 10 or 20 per cent. of the purchase money, I cannot understand at all. There is another matter. In the Irish Land Purchase Bills, including the one passed last Session, we advance the whole of the purchase money to the Irish tenants. Now, I want to know why we should do that to the Irish people and not to the English, Scotch and Welsh? Why should the right hon. Gentleman propose to deal less fairly with what, at any rate, has been the most orderly portion of the United Kingdom? He may no doubt say that owing to the extreme agitation in Ireland you have been obliged to pass Land Purchase Bills which advance the whole purchase money to the tenant; but if he says so he is inviting the people of England Scotland and Wales to agitate in the same manner in which the Irish people have had to agitate to draw attention to, and get some amelioration of, their grievances. I therefore protest against the attempt of the right hon. Gentleman to deal less favourably with the English agricultural labourer, if you like to so term him, and with the Scotch and Welsh; and I say distinctly that Parliament has a right to deal with all the nationalities alike, and that if you advance the whole of the money to the Irish tenant you ought to do the same for the other parts of the United Kingdom. Now, of course, it may be also said that we ought to have a margin for the protection of the County Council who lend the money. That is all right in advancing money on an ordinary mortgage; but I take it that there is no occasion for this where you are proposing to benefit a class who have not got much or any money, and that the County or the Parish Council should take the risk in the same way that it was intended benefit building societies should do; the whole of the members taking the risk for the first few years. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will really give us some better explanation than he has given of his refusal to consider this Amendment. I should like him to explain to this Committee how he expects the agricultural labourers and others who have been meeting him in the country, and to whom he says he is giving such large benefits, to get any benefit unless he advances the whole of the purchase money. I do not think there would be any risk in the matter at all to the County Council or anybody else, because I think it very likely that these holdings instead of decreasing will increase in value. I shall gladly support this Amendment, because I believe the Bill will be of very little use unless it is adopted.

(6.15.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I regret that this point should have been raised on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) rather than on that of the hon. Member for Had-dingtonshire (Mr. Haldane), because I think the latter raises the question in a much neater and clearer form than the present Amendment. But I am bound to confess—the question having been raised—that, so far as Scotchmen are concerned, I believe that to insist upon the payment down of a quarter of the purchase money will really render the Bill nugatory. I have had occasion before on this Bill to say that we in Scotland do not look to it to give us those small holdings which English Members expect to establish in England. In Scotland, the would-be small holder expects to get a larger class of holding altogether than the 10, 15, or 20 acre holding expected to be instituted in England; and I do not think any such holder in Scotland would be content to enter upon his holding with a capital of only £3 an acre to stock and to work it. I am much more inclined to think that £10 per acre would be nearer the sum necessary to work a holding of 40 acres and to make it profitable. That, therefore, means that a man in Scotland would require a large amount of capital to enter upon his small holding. Now, the vast majority of Scotch agricultural labourers, or farm servants, have not got large sums of money by them, and the whole of the sum they had would be sunk in this payment down of the quarter of the purchase money. They would, therefore, find themselves incapable of stocking the farms and obtaining working plant. I am quite sure that from the Scotch point of view we must do our very best to insist upon the exclusion of this quarter of the purchase money if we possibly can.

*(6.18.) MR. THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk): I thoroughly agree with what has been said by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Marjoribanks). In Scotland this Bill will be rendered to a great extent inoperative, if one-fourth of the purchase money is required to be paid down. Take, for instance, a pastoral holding. A man taking one would require something like £300 to stock his farm, and if, in addition, he has to find a fourth of the purchase money, I do not believe you will get any appreciable number of people to take the holdings on such conditions. I should like to see this Bill a thoroughly successful Bill as regards both England and Scotland, and I feel convinced in my own mind that if the Government accede to the Amendment of my hon. Friend the effect upon the working of the Bill will be of the most beneficial nature.

MR. CHAPLIN: I think it would have been more convenient if this discussion had been taken on the Amendment following the one now before us. We seem to be discussing two distinct things at once. In the first place, there is the question whether there should be any payment at all, and then there is the subsidiary question of what that amount should be if there is to be one. I think it would be more convenient to confine ourselves, at first, to the question of whether there should be any payment at all, and I would like to advance some reasons in favour of insisting on it. The provision was inserted in order to give some security, and not an unreasonable security, against loss to the ratepayers. That surely is a consideration which should have received some attention from hon. Members; but it appears to have been entirely omitted from the view of those who have taken part in the Debate. With such a provision as that contained in the Bill, if from any cause there should be a deficit in the tenants' payments, which in the ordinary course would come upon the rates, the County Council would have security. We have been told that the provision would make the Bill a dead letter. But I have frequently pointed out that we have made provision in another manner for those who are not in a position to pay down a sum of money, by enabling the County Council to let the land instead of selling it, and only last night I agreed to extend the limit at which land may be let from 10 to 15 acres. All that will happen where persons are not able to pay down a sum of money will be that they will become tenants under the Local Authority, and with regard to that I have heard argument after argument in favour of their being made tenants instead of purchasers. As to the statement that England and Scotland have been treated unfairly as compared with Ireland, where the tenants are enabled to buy their holdings by having the whole of the money advanced to them, I would point out that a most important consideration has been omitted. On the whole, the Irish tenant is less liberally treated than the purchaser under this Bill. It is true that the whole of the purchase money is advanced in the case of the Irish tenant; but what is it advanced for? It is for that part of the farm which is not already his own. It must be remembered that since the Land Act of 1881 the tenant's interest in his farm is probably equal to the interest of the landlord, so, although we advance all the money, there is twice the amount of property given as security. In the case of this Bill there is as security only the land itself, whilst in Ireland there is also the tenant's interest in the farm.

MR. MORTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman how it is that the Government have had to take possession of farms in Ireland because the instalments have not been paid?

MR. CHAPLIN: Only my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary can answer with regard to particular cases. I have heard, however, of tenants being afraid to pay, and actually being prevented from paying and things of that kind. I cannot myself give the hon. Member a fuller answer, but the fact remains that in Ireland there is double the security as compared with England and Scotland. With regard to what has been said about the capital required to stock these small farms, I think that it is probably an exaggeration to say that £10 an acre would be necessary. I consider that there ought to be some security to the ratepayers; and, therefore, so far as the proposal to abandon the money payment down by a purchaser is concerned, I must offer it uncompromising opposition.

MR. ESSLEMONT: What is wanted is to make the operation as easy as possible for those persons who require holdings, and to give them a fair chance of carrying them on with success. There can be no doubt whatever that in Scotland, if a fourth part of the price has to be paid down, the Government would exclude from the advantages of the Bill those whom it is intended to benefit. With all respect to the right hon. Gentleman, I do not think that it is necessary to call upon the tenants to pay a fourth part down; and if this section is retained, those who want to acquire these holdings will not be able to do so.

MR. STOREY: There are some Members in this quarter of the House who are obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the care he has shown in the interests of the ratepayers. I want to know where the security for the ratepayers appears in this Amendment? I hope the right hon. Gentleman will adhere to his resolution to safeguard their interests. We, as Radicals, have had to remonstrate against the Government passing measures which a Radical Government would not pass for England and Wales. The cases, it is said, are not quite the same, because in Ireland there is more security; but I invite hon. Members to remember that, when the Government at first proposed to make advances to the people of Ireland, it was a proposal to advance a portion of the money only. Then the proposal grew, and, influenced by the pressure of Irish Members, the Government came ultimately with a proposal to advance the whole of the purchase money. By a succession of measures was this done, and for this we owe a Conservative Government little thanks. I feel that the operation will be the same under this Bill. The Government are, we assume, going to pass this measure now, advancing three-fourths of the money only; but does not the right hon. Gentleman see on this side of the House the revolutionary elements which by-and-bye will compel his successor to propose the advance of the whole of the money? I see these indications; and it is because I foresee them now, as I foresaw them in the case of Ireland, that I take the liberty of protesting against this method of using public money. Therefore I thank the right hon. Gentleman for the security he is inserting in the Bill; but I submit that it is not at all sufficient. Speaking for the county of Durham, I do not think the Bill will be much used, and I do not quite see why the miners, the capitalists, the manufacturing and trading classes, and those who go to make up the population of Durham, should find this public money without some return. I know how far this argument would carry me if developed, but the proposal now is that the security shall be abolished; and I contend that not only should we retain the security, but we should have some return to the body politic in exchange for the credit we are lending to these persons. I am not going to vote for the Amendment, but I am not supporting the Government in this. I am giving effect to my own opinions. I am not in favour of this Bill, and never have been in favour of it. I am told that we must not say too much against it because it would be bad electioneering. That is a very valid reason for saying little; but, so far as I am concerned, I am not afraid to say, here and in my own constituency, that this is a bad method of dealing with public money, and that I think the object you have in view is not being carried out in the general interest. Therefore I cannot vote for the Amendment, and have to choose between the Amendment, which would make the Bill more effectual at the ratepayers' expense, and the proposal of the Government to make it less effectual with more security to the ratepayers at large, and so I am driven into the same Lobby with the Government.

(6.40.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Looking at the question from the point of view of security, and whether a County Council might be justified in lending the whole of the money, my belief is that if we adopted the Amendment now its effect would be that County Councils, as a rule, would be so afraid of the security that, practically, there would be no transactions under the Bill. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that there is no analogy between this Bill and the advances under the Act of last year. It is possible to advance all the money under the Irish Land Purchase Act, first, because you have the security of the tenant's interest, which in the great majority of cases is almost equal in amount to the landlord's interest; and, in the second place, you are able to buy land in Ireland at eighteen or twenty years' purchase, whereas in England you must pay thirty—or twenty-five years at the very least. On the whole, I am unable to support the proposal to advance the whole of the purchase money; but whether some further relief can be given at a later stage is a question for consideration hereafter. I conceive that the effect of the proposition that the whole of the purchase money shall be advanced will so lower the security as to prevent County Councils from taking action.

(6.42.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I appeal to my hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment, which, I feel sure, will not conduce to the progress and smooth working of the Bill. We have heard a good deal about the advances made to Irish tenants, but there is a clear distinction between their case and the case under this Bill. Under the Irish Act we had to deal for the most part with the selling tenant—with the man in possession; and that very sensitive person, the ratepayer, did not come into the transaction, the advances being made from the National Fund from the Exchequer in the case of Ireland. Here we ask a body elected by the ratepayers, who have the responsibility of administering the ratepayers' money, to buy land without any security whatever against loss. It has been said that the first instalment is security, but it is not sufficient security against the loss that may follow an ill-judged attempt of a man to farm a small holding to his own loss and the ruin of the land. There must be the protection to the ratepayers for the necessary good working of the Bill of some sum—not a large sum—but some amount advanced by the would-be purchaser, sufficient to show his bona fides. Without such a protection to the ratepayers, I feel quite sure that in the rural districts of England ratepayers will make this an Election question if they are likely to sustain such losses, and they will exact pledges from County Council candidates. We want to bring the ratepayers into sympathy with the Bill and with its operation, and this we can do if we can show them that only a reasonable risk can in any case be run. In the interest of the good working of the Bill, I hope the hon. Member will withdraw the Amendment, because I understand the right hon. Gentleman will be ready to consider the question of allowing this amount of a quarter of the purchase money to be somewhat reduced, making the terms easier for the purchaser, while requiring him to give some security for his bona fides.

(6.45.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): The question for decision is the terms upon which it will be safe for the County Council to carry out the principle of the Bill. We are asked to choose between giving responsibility to the County Council or declaring that the County Council is not fit to be entrusted with the power of making a bargain giving sufficient protection to the ratepayers. For my part, I can see no objection to the County Council having liberty to make such arrangements as they choose for the security of the ratepayers against loss. The Bill proposes to make it obligatory upon the new owners to pay a certain proportion of the purchase money, but I think a County Council may very well be trusted to take the necessary precautions on behalf of the ratepayers, whose representatives they are. Even if any ground for taking such a precaution as this existed the putting it in the Bill will greatly tend to make the Bill inoperative. In Scotland I do not think that a very large amount per acre will be required to start a small holding, certainly not in the northern part of the country; but if you insist on this fourth of the purchase money being paid down, I am afraid little good will come of the Bill so far as Scotland is concerned. It will amount to taking from the purchaser just that amount he requires to start himself in his new undertaking to become a proprietor. If the Amendment is withdrawn I hope the next Amendment, in the name of the hon. Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane), will take its place.

*(6.47.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I quite agree there is no analogy between cases under this Bill and under the Irish Land Purchase Acts, but it should be remembered we had two Irish Acts under which the tenant had to find a fourth of the purchase money, and both these Acts were inoperative and little better than dead letters. The Acts of 1870 and of 1881 were dead letters, so far as the purchase clauses were concerned, solely because the fourth of the purchase money was required. It was not until the whole of the purchase money was advanced by the State under the Act of 1885 that any success in the direction of purchase by tenants was attained.

*(6.48.) MR. MORTON: I quite admit that to some extent—and to a large extent—the Irish tenant has a value in his holding; but there are a good many cases, as shown by the Returns presented last year, in which the Irish tenants could have had no value whatever, because the Government have had to take possession and re-sell at a loss. Whether we decide upon this or upon the next Amendment does not concern me; but I do say that the hon. Member (Mr. T. W. Russell) who has just sat down proves the case for the Amendment, for he says the system was unsuccessful in Ireland until the State advanced the whole of the purchase money. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) has mentioned electioneering tactics, and I should like to ask whether this Bill is not an electioneering Bill? I can assure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) that unless he makes this Bill a bona fide useful Bill it will be of no use to him in the coming Election.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is going beyond the scope of the Amendment before the Committee.

*MR. MORTON: I will endeavour to keep more closely to the Amendment before us.

MOTIONS.

CROFTERS' HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) ACT.

RESOLUTION.

(9.2.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): Having regard to the limited time available for the discussion of the Resolution which stands in my name, and knowing that a number of crofter Representatives desire to speak upon the subject, I will be brief in my explanation of the nature and scope of the Motion it is now my privilege to move. The Resolution does not attempt to deal with the whole of the crofter grievances which have arisen under the operation of the Act; it relates only to those of more public and general importance in regard to which Parliament may fairly be asked to express an opinion. In the first place, the Resolution declares that the benefits of the Crofters Act should be extended to small leaseholders. Prior to the passing of the Act the only way in which an enterprising crofter who desired to improve his holding could protect himself was by obtaining a lease when it was possible for him to do so. But even this protection was limited in its operation. Although he might greatly improve his holding from the time the lease was granted, yet at the end of the lease those improvements made by the tenant became by the operation of the law the property of the landlord, and in the generality of cases without any compensation to the tenant; and on a renewal of the lease the landlord had the power to exact an increased rent in respect to the very improvements of the tenant. But such was the operation of the law, and the small leaseholder had to choose between expatriation or acceptance of the landlord's conditions, amounting practically to confiscation. Apart from this question of confiscation, the leaseholders who may be said to be the most enterprising section of crofters and whose object was to make the best of the holdings they had taken, have by the Act been placed in a position very much inferior to the ordinary crofter. The ordinary crofter has acquired by the Act a recognition of his improvements; he is secured in his tenure, and is not liable, like the leaseholder, to have his rent raised at a future time in respect to his own improvements. It is not necessary to urge this matter upon the attention of the present Government. The principle of the admission of the leaseholder to equal benefit from land legislation with the non-leaseholder has been recognised already by this Parliament in the case of Irish tenants, and this Resolution is well within the limits of Irish land legislation on the same subject. Leaseholders are described in the terms of my Resolution as "small" leaseholders, and in the term I include leaseholders whose annual rent is not over £30, and the period of whose lease is 21 years or under. The application of the Resolution is not to Scotland generally, but only to the crofter counties—counties where the soil is poorer and the climate worse, and the conditions of agriculture more unfavourable than in most of the districts of Ireland which have received the benefits of similar legislation. Therefore, I do not anticipate that there will be any objection from the Government to the first part of my proposal. The second demand I make is that all the improvements made by the tenant or by his predecessors in the same family and not paid for by the landlord shall be expressly exempted from the payment of rent. This was indeed the scope and intention of the Crofters Act; but in practice it has not been given effect to, and hence arises the necessity for expressed recognition and enactment. Upon this point I am relieved from taking up the time of the House at any length with argument, for I find from the Amendment given notice of by an hon. Member on the other side of the House (Mr. Shaw Stewart), and which no doubt represents the view of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that the House is to be asked to declare its opinion that all improvements made by a crofter or by his predecessors in title—a wider declaration than mine, which has relation only to predecessors in the same family—should be fully protected. I may take it, therefore, that the second part of my Resolution meets with approval from both sides of the House.

Thirdly, I invite the House to declare that the Commissioners should be empowered to enlarge present holdings, and create new holdings, an inquiry being instituted to ascertain the amount of land available and suitable for that purpose. By this it is intended to give fixity of tenure to the crofter, and to enable him to live on his croft. It is obvious that the retention of the crofter on the soil can only be a benefit to himself and the community when he has land sufficient for his industry and enabling him to maintain his family. To pinch and circumscribe his holding is but to perpetuate that poverty which it was the object of the Crofters Act to remove. The enlargement of crofter holdings is a most important consideration; but the Act has so surrounded these extensions with restrictions and qualifications that, as the Commissioners specially reported in 1888, very few applications for extension are made, and the Commissioners find many difficulties in the way of granting such applications. The smallness of the existing crofter holdings has been the source of much complaint in the Highlands; it is a widespread grievance. But, again, most fortunately, the tendency of Parliament and the country has been steadily advancing in the direction of measures for keeping the occupier on the soil. Not to speak of the Land Purchase Act for Ireland, the very Bill which has engaged our attention in Committee to-day, the Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, shows the direction in which public opinion is moving, and the desire that is springing up in all parts of the country for the creation and extension of small holdings which shall be sufficient to employ the whole industry and knowledge of the cultivator. When speaking of an inquiry into the amount of land suitable and available for the erection or extension of holdings, I do not contemplate the limitation of the inquiry to the amount of arable land available. Hill pasture and grazings are necessary appendages to crofter holdings, and milk farming is an important element for the sustenance and up-bringing of a crofter family. Grazing land is then a necessity. The advisability of extending the system of small holdings seems to be universally admitted in the House, and the only real point in dispute is whether their creation should be left to voluntary arrangement, or should be brought about compulsorily. Anyone conversant with the state of matters in the Highlands must feel how necessary is compulsion to effect the desired end in the crofter counties. The amendment to be moved from the other side of the House suggests that land purchase is the true remedy; but I would only observe that there is no use in purchasing a holding and permanently settling a man on the land where the croft is obviously too small for the occupier to earn a living. We must first obtain reasonable-sized holdings before we speak of land purchase. To talk of land purchase now as the solution of this question is simply to delay reform. The land purchase suggested is obviously purchase by voluntary arrangement, and not under compulsory powers of purchase; and everyone who knows anything of the condition of things in the Highlands knows how utterly impracticable a system of voluntary purchase there is. With this explanation, I beg to move the Motion standing in my name.

(9.15.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): With great pleasure I second the Motion. Before I address myself to the proposals contained in the Resolution, I may be allowed to say a word or two on the operation of the Act in the Highlands. We have now had the Act in operation for five years, and I think we are able to form a fair opinion of the effect it has had and will have in the future in the Highlands. I hold in my hand a table showing all the decisions given by the Crofter Commission in the last five years, and, if time permitted, I should like to read it to the House. But I take only my own county, Caithness. In the first year 250 cases were determined by the Commissioners, and the average reduction of rent was 40·9 per cent. In the same year the cancelling of arrears was 70·9 per cent. In the second year the reductions of rent amounted to 51 per cent. and the reduction of arrears 74 per cent. I will not trouble the House with the figures for the whole five years; these, I think, will be sufficient to show that our contention that there was severe rack-renting in the Highlands, equal to that in Ireland, is fully borne out by the facts.

The percentage of rack-renting in the Highlands was much higher than in Ireland. During the five years and three or four months the Commission has been sitting it has determined 11,739 cases. The old rents amounted to £59,000, the fair rents fixed to £41,000, a reduction of 30 per cent. over all the cases. If we deduct the case of the Duke of Sutherland, who applied to the Court to have his fair rents fixed—he, I suppose, desiring it for the sake of his reputation as a landlord—deducting these cases, the average is very much greater. Even the 30 per cent. is higher than in Ireland, where I think the average reduction has been 23 or 24 per cent. In the same period 66 per cent. of arrears were cancelled. Arrears were determined in 11,700 cases, and the amount £149,000, of which amount £100,000 was cancelled. So far we may say the Act has operated very successfully, and the result demonstrates that our contention was right and that the First Lord of the Treasury, when he pledged his reputation as a politician that it would be found there was no rack-renting, but that only fair rents were exacted, was altogether mistaken. Our contention, which we did not press very much, was that there was worse rack-renting in the Highlands than in Ireland. Well, now we want the Act extended to two classes of crofters who are now excluded, and first of these I mention the sub-tenants. It was the intention of Parliament that these sub-tenants should come under the Act, and the Crofter Commission carried out that intention. But the Court of Session, going beyond its power, decided that these people were not crofters within the meaning of the Act. Why the Court of Session should have determined that I do not understand, because the Act debars them from giving such a decision, the 31st Clause declaring that in the event of any dispute arising as to whether a tenant is a crofter within the meaning of the Act it shall be within the jurisdiction of the Commissioners to determine such a question, and the decision of the Commissioners in regard to any matters committed to their determination shall be final. Notwithstanding this, however, the Court of Session interfered, and the Court and the Commission are now at loggerheads. The Court of Session has interfered, the sub-tenants have been taken from the protection of the Act, have been evicted by the landlords, and there may be some trouble in Argyllshire. The Lord Advocate thinks the Court should determine; we say the Court went beyond its powers. I remember one case in point which occurred while the Irish Land Act was before the House. The hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. Timothy Healy) wanted to move an Amendment 'to protect the improvements of the tenant, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Gladstone) the then Prime Minister, said it was totally unnecessary, that the Bill did that, and that no Court would dream of arriving at any other conclusion. However, the Court in Ireland treated that clause as the Commissioners have treated similar clauses—the intention of Parliament has been set aside by the Courts. Another class we desire should be included is the leaseholders. In my own constituency the rents are being reduced by 50 per cent., and we have had cases of 60, 70, and 75 per cent. One case of £24 was reduced to £6, and on one large estate several hundred crofters got their rents reduced on an average by 50 per cent. The leaseholder, however, whose interest is much greater, is still paying unjust rent; and some of them, I am sorry to say, finding it impossible to live decently, and at the same time pay these rack rents, are leaving the country for America. Another class, of whom little has been said, is the cottars. They come under the Act, but I do not think there has been a single decision in regard to them since the Act came into operation. Their condition is a very hard one, and I think something really should be done for them. They are the men who, by agitation, helped us to get the Act. The cottar, who is probably an agricultural labourer, under this Act now owns his house, and I think if we are going to extend this principle as in Ireland we should be more logical and consider the case of the agriculturists. If we are to stand between the landlord and the tenant to prevent the evil of competition, we are equally called on to stand between the farmer and the cottar. We have in the past stated that there has been terrible rack-renting, and the decisions of the Crofters' Commission prove that to be the case. I frankly admit, however, that if you were to give them their holdings for nothing you would not solve this question. The case of improvement is as in the Irish Land Act. We endeavoured to draft a clause, but as a matter of fact that portion of the Act has not been carried out at all. The result is that the crofter is paying 15s. and 18s. per acre for what used to be let to himself, his father, or his grandfather at 1s. or 2s. 6d. per acre. Some time ago I spoke to a valuer, who was a convener in my county, as to the case of a man whose holding, originally let for 5s., was afterwards increased to £6. We maintain that this advance was based solely on the man's improvements. The one vital requirement, and without which everything else is useless, is more land. In this connection I will take the three crofting counties—Inverness, Ross, and Sutherland. What are the facts? As far as Sutherland is concerned there have been 1,427 cases determined by the Commission, and the average fair rent fixed is £3 7s. 8d. In Ross during the five years there have been 3,605 cases determined, the average fair rent fixed being £2 9s. 10d. In Inverness, 3,582 cases, and an average fair rent of £3 0s. 10d. So that, taking these three counties, 8,694 cases have been determined, the average rent being £2 12s. 8d. per annum. Therefore, if you were to pass a no-rent manifesto you would simply be giving to these unfortunate men the equivalent of 1s. per week. All that can be done to improve their condition under the present circumstances has been done by the Government in giving security of tenure. They have not, however, got sufficient soil to produce a fair living, and the real question to solve is how to increase the size of the holdings. In the Act there are several pages, the purpose of which is to permit the Crofters' Commission to enlarge holdings. How many cases have come before it? In 1887 there was no case; in 1888, one case—a case which the Duke of Sutherland practically called in the Commissioners to determine—affecting 210 crofters. Next year the Commission got to Orkney, where there were six cases affecting 56.

crofters, and in which infinitesimal increases were made. In 1890 there was one case in Caithness, by which four crofters secured an increase of holding; and there was another case in Sutherland affecting 68 crofters. In Ross there were two cases, by which 17 crofters got a small increase of holding; in Inverness 13 got holdings; in Argyle, 10; and last year there were 14 more cases affecting 116 crofters. If we deduct the Sutherland cases, where the Duke simply got the Commissioners to go North to do the work, there have only been 100 cases in the rest of the six counties during these five and a quarter years. Thus the provisions have been perfectly useless as regards our object in seeking to give these men sufficient land on which to thrive. The point arises, Is there sufficient land for the people? I suppose Lewis will again be trotted out. A larger population now exist, there is any amount of arable land in the hands of the sheep farmers and graziers, and it is curious to note that since the Commission sat about 600,000 acres more have been added to the deer forests. I contend that if that land had been given to the crofters their position would have been very much better. Our contention is that the subject is a debatable one, and that we ought to have information. It is time the question was determined, and my friend proposes a solution, by means of some kind of Commission of Inquiry, to determine how much of the land can be used. I have for 30 years watched the land, and what I remember as green fields is now covered with bracken and heather, and looks as much like heath as unclaimed land. Year after year all the green spots are disappearing, and where thousands of pounds have been spent by the Duke in improvements, the heather and bracken are coming in to take possession. The only people who can make and secure the improvement are the crofters themselves. I have much pleasure in seconding the Motion of my hon. Friend, and I trust the Government will do something to further its object.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act ought to be extended and amended in the following respects—namely: that the provisions of the Act be extended to small leaseholders; that all improvements made by the tenant, or his predecessors in the same family, and not paid for by the landlord, be expressly exempted from the payment of rent; that adequate powers be given to the Commissioners to enlarge present holdings, and to create new holdings; and that to this end an inquiry be instituted with the view of ascertaining authoritatively the amount of land suitable and available for that purpose."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

*(9.40.) MR. SHAW - STEWART (Renfrew, E.): The scope of the Motion before the House I venture to think amply warrants a Lowland Member taking part in this debate. But beyond that I think I might bring forward the fact that any thing that affects any part of Scotland must be of interest to any Scotchman, whether he lives in the Highlands or in the Lowlands; and perhaps a Scotch Member who is not directly interested in the ownership or tenancy of Highland lands may take a somewhat impartial view of this important question. I have on the Paper an Amendment to the Motion in the following terms, which I now beg to move:—

Leave out all after "That," and insert "while in the opinion of this House, it is important that all improvements made by a crofter or his predecessors in title should be fully protected, the main improvement in the system of land tenure in the Highlands is to be sought in the extension of the principle of land purchase to that part of the country."

Now, Sir, the Motion of the hon. Member for St. Rollox (Mr. Caldwell) deals with three points—the leaseholders, the question of improvements, and the question of the enlargement of holdings and the establishment of new ones. In dealing, first, with the question of leaseholders it is almost imperative that the House should remember the history of the subject as connected with the Crofters Act of 1886. I have diligently read the reports of the debates during the time of the passage of that Act when the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. J. B. Balfour) was Lord Advocate, and I find that acting in that capacity he studiously and strenuously resisted the inclusion of leaseholders in the Act. The distinction between a crofter and a leaseholder is very plainly set forth in that Act, and to differentiate the leaseholder from the crofter, I can use no better words than those employed by the hon. Member for North-East Lanark (Mr. Crawford), who, during the debate on the Bill of 1886, said: "Speaking roughly and generally, a tenure under a lease is a sign that the man is not a crofter." This Act, being intended to benefit crofters, naturally excluded leaseholders. In the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Clackmannan—

"The man who has made his bargain is clearly out of the historical scope of the Bill."

Subsequently, in 1888, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Clackmannan took up a different attitude with regard to the leaseholders, on the ground of a changed condition of things owing to another Government having admitted leaseholders in Ireland in 1887 to the benefits of the Irish Land Act. For my own part I do not think the analogy is good, and I believe it would be difficult for the right hon. Gentleman to show clearly that the case of the leaseholders in Ireland was on all fours with that of the leaseholders in the Highlands who seek to be admitted to the benefits of this Act. The Crofters Act was mainly brought in to deal with a phase of circumstances which had arisen through a course of historical events peculiar to the Highlands, whereas the Irish Land Bill of 1881 did not deal with any special case in any part of Ireland, but with the whole system of land tenure in that country; and, therefore, to compare the Irish Land Act of 1881 with any Bill affecting Scotland you would have to take into consideration a Bill dealing with the whole land tenure of Scotland. Then as to the question of the enlargement of the holdings. The hon. Member who last spoke (Dr. Clark) dwelt upon this point to some extent, but he did not say how it was proposed to amend the Bill in this respect. Now, Sir, I think we ought to be told how hon. Members opposite would propose to extend the Crofters Act so as to make it deal more largely and extensively with the enlargement of holdings. Are they prepared to withdraw the restrictions laid down in Section 13 of the Crofters Act, and which, I maintain, are in the interest of the crofting community as a whole? One of these restrictions is to the effect that it shall not be competent for the Crofters Commission to assign land for the enlargement of a holding if it forms part of an existing farm or other holding, unless the rent or any letting value of it shall exceed £100. That was evidently put into the Bill in order to prevent the harm that could be done by reducing the already small farms. Well, I take that restriction as an example, and I maintain that all the others are intended to be framed in the interest of the crofting community as a whole. Although a few individuals might be benefited by sweeping away these restrictions, yet I believe that by doing so the large body of crofters would suffer. With regard to the question of improvements, I fully agree that a crofter ought not to be damaged by any improvements he has made. But I would ask hon. Members opposite whether they could devise any better plan to insure that than by laying down the plain direction, found in the Act, to the Crofter Commissioners—namely, that in fixing a fair rent they shall take into account any improvements that have been made by the crofter? In the course of a debate in 1891, the hon. Member for Sutherland (Mr. Angus Sutherland) said—"The great and burning question in the Highlands is not reduction of rents," which I think shows that the question of improvements does not press very heavily upon the crofting community, "but more land." That opens up an entirely new question, and one quite different from that of the enlargement of existing holdings. It opens up the question of new holdings altogether. Well, Sir, it is part of the policy of the Party to which I have the honour to belong to increase the number of holdings and the ownership of land, whether in England, Ireland, or Scotland. I could quote pages of sentences from speeches, both of the Prime Minister and the First Lord of the Treasury, to the effect that it is their earnest wish to bring about a closer union between the people and the land. The House, however, must guard against setting up new crofts, and thereby intensifying the evils which we have spent years in trying to mitigate by this very Act. That is a thing we must keep clearly in mind, and more particularly so considering the present condition of agriculture. Now, Sir, I come to the subject of my Amendment, and, I think, if we sought to improve the system of land tenure in the Highlands by the extension of the principle of Land Purchase, more would be accomplished than by an extension of the Crofters Act. I will put forward two reasons why I believe that is the better plan. In the first place, let us deal with the question of the new holdings, which the hon. Gentleman opposite laid such stress upon. A system of land purchase for the Highlands would, of course, have to be made applicable to the Highlands. I think we might take both the principle of the Land Purchase Bill in Ireland and the principle of the Small Holdings Bill now in Committee, and devise a purchase scheme for the Highlands, drawing its life from these two measures. Now, in dealing with new holdings, you are going quite outside the range of the Crofters Act, which does not pretend to deal with them. I submit, however, that by extending the provisions of the Small Holdings Act, with Amendments suitable to the conditions of life in the Highlands, we might find a way of setting up the new holdings. The second advantage of my Amendment is that it would deal with leaseholders. If the principles of the Irish Land Purchase Act were extended to the Highland leaseholders, they would gain two advantages over the Crofters Act. First of all, they would have a reduction of rent beginning at once, for under a similar purchase Act to that of Ireland the annual payments made would be less than the yearly rent. The second advantage, which, I think, must be patent to hon. Gentlemen opposite, is that they would have a fixity of tenure of a more valuable kind than that which they would obtain under the Crofters Act, because that Act only keeps it in the family, whereas under a system founded on the Irish Land Purchase Act it would be inalienably their own. Well, Sir, this would be exactly in harmony with the recommendations laid down by the Crofter Commission of 1884. They recommended that facilities for purchase should be given to crofters, and added that in their opinion the possession of real property ought to be a powerful agent in forming habits of industry and self-respect, and would supply resources of rational enjoyment. I cordially re-echo that sentiment, and it is because I wish to see the aspirations for land ownership in the Highlands satisfied under conditions which will not increase a poverty-stricken peasant proprietary, nor interfere with the natural development on a large scale of the resources of the Highlands, and in the hope of bringing about a better state of things and a more prosperous community which will redound to the happiness of my country, that I have brought forward this Amendment, which I now beg to move.

(10.0.) COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire): I have very great pleasure in seconding the Motion of my hon. Friend, and I think I may say that the hon. Member for St. Rollox (Mr. Caldwell) has not by any means made his meaning clear. He says he wishes the provisions of the Act to be extended to small leaseholders; then he wishes adequate powers to be given to the Commissioners to enlarge present holdings; and he also wants to create new holdings. Who are those new holdings for? He says nothing to give us any idea whether they are for the crofters or for the leaseholders. And then he wants an inquiry to find out authoritatively what land is suitable and available for the purpose. I should like to have some authoritative definition of what is suitable and available for this purpose, and I think until hon. Members opposite can give some reasons for their demand they have no right to ask us to vote for an inquiry.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out all the words after the word "That," in order to insert the words "while in the opinion of this House it is important that all improvements made by a crofter or his predecessors in title should be fully protected, the main improvements in the system of land tenure in the Highlands is to be sought in the extension of the principle of land purchase to that part of the country,"—(Mr. Shaw-Stewart.)

—instead thereof.

*(10.3.) MR. JOHN B. BALFOUR (Clackmannan): As the hon. Member for East Renfrew (Mr. Shaw-Stewart) has more than once referred to what I said on two different occasions, first in carrying through the Crofters Act of 1886, and afterwards in the discussion in a subsequent year, it is only courteous to him and fair to the House that I should make a few remarks on this Resolution. He has accurately stated that in carrying that Bill through the House in 1886, we relied upon what may be termed a historical basis. The Bill was not intended and it was not represented as a measure which was intended to deal with what may be called the commercial tenant, that is a man who goes from one part of the country to another and takes land as a man might buy an article in any other commercial pursuit. It was intended to give legal sanction to rights which had existed by custom, but had partly been lost or become imperfect, and as we were dealing with customary tenure it was right and fitting that we should take care that the Act would not extend to different cases, such as that of the commercial tenant. It is quite true further that at that time there had been no recognition by Parliament of the propriety of reforming or altering the terms of contract leases, and I do not understand that the hon. Member for St. Rollox or his seconder propose in asking the House to affirm this Resolution that the House should commit itself to anything like a general reformation or alteration of contract leases or commercial leases throughout Scotland. This resolution refers to the Crofters Act; it is founded on that Act, and takes up and carries forward the principles of that Act. And I will give my hon. Friend two very good reasons for supporting this Resolution, and for what I said some years ago when, as he mentioned, he saw me sitting where he is glad to see me sitting now. One reason is that between the time when the Crofters Act was passed and the discussion two years after, the House had for the first time recognised the propriety of Parliament intervening to alter the arrangement under leases on a very much wider scale, and with very much wider effect than any that could be covered by the Crofters Act, and so it was very natural when there had been a Parliamentary recognition of that propriety, that it should seem to not a few of us not unreasonable that some of the advantages which had been given to his Irish brother should be given to the Scotch crofter. That is one reason why I said what I did at the time, and why I repeat it now. Another reason is that it has been represented to me, and I believe it to be true, that in not a few cases the landlords in the crofting districts, when the Bill was going through Parliament, or before the Crofter Commission came to the locality, persuaded their crofter tenants to sign leases. Such cases may not have been very numerous, but I was told that they existed, and that when the inquiry arose as to whether a man was a crofter in the statutory sense or not, something was put forward which was or purported to be a lease. I do not suppose my hon. Friends desire to carry this Resolution beyond the kind of cases to which the Crofters Act applies, and in deciding now that the mere fact of a lease having been entered into should not deprive a man of the benefits of the Crofters Act if he otherwise fulfils the conditions laid down in the Act, Parliament would simply be carrying out the spirit of that Act and preventing the intention of that Act from being defeated in the manner which I have just indicated. Therefore I do not think it necessary to detain the House by saying anything more on the matter beyond that I adhere to the principles upon which the Act of 1886 was founded. That Act, as I have said, was founded on a historical basis, but now six years have elapsed, and we have something beside a historical basis to go upon. But there is another consideration. The Crofters Act of 1886 was certainly a novelty in legislation applicable to Scotland, and I do not think anyone would blame Parliament or those who were directly responsible for the measure, for desiring to legislate cautiously and carefully, and in such a way as would conduce to the general and prevalent acceptance of the measure by the community and to its practical success. We had at that time very little information on most important matters. We had, it is true, the Report of the Commission of 1884, and it was a valuable mine of information; but it was necessarily limited, because it did not cover the whole ground, and now the experience of six years of the operation of the Act has added very largely to the information which Parliament has in its possession. In that connection, I would say that one point upon which we have fuller information now than we had then is as to the great prevalence of over-renting in the crofter districts. We had no evidence of that great prevalence in 1886. The Report of the Commission of 1884 rather led to the belief that it was a rare and exceptional circumstance, and no one could complain that the measure was founded on the only authentic information which the Government were able to place before Parliament on the subject. But now when we find, as the result of judicial inquiry, as far as that judicial inquiry has gone, that it has been thought right and just by the Commission to reduce by 30 per cent., and in many parts of the crofting districts by 50 per cent., the rents which had been exacted from the crofters, this information puts a different colour on the whole of this matter, and may well embolden Parliament to deal with it less experimentally than was previously done when there was less information in the possession of Parliament. I am not going to follow my hon. Friend through the whole of his argument, but he mentioned the question of the enlargement of holdings. There again we thought, and I believe with the general assent of Parliament and the country, that it was our duty to proceed cautiously with legislation; and the principle that actuated those who were responsible for the Crofters Act was, that while they were desirous of providing facilities for enlarging the holdings of the crofters, they must take care that in so doing they did not injure the prosperity and welfare of the crofter communities in other respects. That is one of the reasons why many safeguards were introduced into this Bill. One of these safeguards speaks of the general prosperity of the locality, for it might have been that unless there had been some safeguard we might, while adding to a croft or a group of crofts in any particular place by statutory machinery, have done an injury to the community as a whole, either by diminishing employment, or in some other way. The aim was to benefit the crofter community as a whole, and I think the precautions we took were sound. But it does not follow from that, that upon a review of the operation of the Act, if it is proved that the restrictions and safeguards which Parliament thought necessary in 1886 can, to any extent, be dispensed with, or if it is proved that these safeguards have prevented the effectual application of the leading provisions of the Act, it would be unreasonable to re-consider the matter in the light of six years' experience. In point of fact, the number of extensions under this Act has been very small. Then the hon. Gentleman suggested what he considered an alternative. We are all agreed upon the importance of protecting the interests of the crofters, but if I wanted to be hypercritical I should object to his expression, predecessors in title. The expression we used was predecessors in the same family, because at the time the Act was passed the crofters had no legal title. If we had said predecessors in title, it would therefore have done the crofters no good. It is true the crofters have had the benefit of the Act for six years, and there may now have been some predecessors in title in a legal sense, but we prefer our own expression of predecessors in family. With respect to my hon. Friend's alternative, what I understand he proposes is that the main improvements in the system of land tenure shall be sought in the extension of the principle of land purchase to that part of the country. That opens a very large question indeed, and I am not going to enter upon it now. But what I do say is that whether my hon. Friend is right or whether he is wrong in looking to land purchase as the main source of improvement, that can be no possible reason for not improving existing legislation until we have got land purchase, if we ever are to get it. You should make the Crofters Act as effective as you can consistently with its leading principle, whether you may afterwards be tempted to proceed to another principle or not. But I do submit that the reference to land purchase can be no reason at all to put forward against the Resolution of my hon. Friend. We know that it is common to say that, because something else of a totally different kind would bring about a better result, you should not improve what you have got until that comes up for consideration. I only wish to say that this mention of land purchase is rather seeking to put on the public generally or the taxpayer what, according to the aim of the Crofters Act, should have been done by a fair adjustment of the relations between landlord and tenant, and that is taking up a wholly different question. The aim of the Crofters Act was to say what were fair relations between the owner and occupier of the soil in these crofting communities. Undoubtedly that would be to put the burden upon totally different shoulders, and whether the general taxpayer would prefer that he should take over the adjustment of those relations is a question for him to consider when the proposal is made. In the meantime, we consider that any defects and shortcomings in the scheme of 1886 ought to be perfected, leaving over for the present the question of the adoption of another principle. My hon. Friend who seconded the Amendment did so in a rather interrogative form; rather on the ground that he did not quite understand what the Resolution meant. The hon. Member for Argyllshire (Colonel Malcolm) did not know what land suitable and advisable for the purpose was. I am afraid the hon. Member's reading does not extend to the Crofters Act of 1886, for in it he will find a whole chapter devoted to explaining and defining available lands, and I understand that my hon. Friend in the Resolution takes that definition in the latter part of his Resolution—

"An inquiry be instituted with the view of ascertaining authoritatively the amount of land suitable and available for that purpose."

I venture to think it is a reasonable proposal that you should find out how much land is available in a statutory sense or in an enlarged statutory sense, for these holdings; that is to say, not withdrawing land from more useful and profitable occupation by the inhabiting community, which was the test in the Crofters Act, but land defined in the terms of the Act; or such modification of them as experience may have dictated. Interpreting the Resolution in that sense, it appears to me to be in accordance with the spirit of those Acts; and I maintain, whether ultimately in Scotland generally or parts of Scotland, land purchase may or may not be introduced, there can be no reason for not making our present statutory system as perfect as we can, consistently with the principles on which it is founded.

(10.25.) THE LORD ADVOCATE. (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I have listened with interest to the explanation which my right hon. and learned Friend has vouchsafed to the House of what undoubtedly, on his part, is an important change of position. There can be no doubt that, when the Act which we are discussing was introduced under the care and guardianship of the right hon. Gentleman, the justification of certain provisions which have been canvassed to-night was laid upon matter of principle; and in so far as it is laid upon matter of principle, it appears to me that the explanations given to-night do not meet the contentions of my hon. Friend behind me. It is said that the Act of 1886 was passed at a time when such legislation was, to some extent, a novelty, and it has also been said that one of the reasons for re-considering the matter was that the right hon. Gentleman has been informed since that there were certain cases in which the crofters had been persuaded by their respective landlords to accept leases. I should have thought, Sir, that that was a matter which the right hon. Gentleman had in his mind, and might very easily have provided against.

MR. J. B. BALFOUR: I said since.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: But I should have thought that was a matter that is either perfectly innocent—and in the right hon. Gentleman's statement of the case it seemed perfectly innocent—or else he makes charges against landowners of having done that in fraud of legislation, which shows a defect in legislation for which he is responsible, but which is not touched by the Resolution now under consideration. The right hon. Gentleman has given no explanation, satisfactory to my mind, of the fact that in supporting this Resolution he has departed in point of principle from what he laid down in introducing the legislation of 1886, because it stands on the records of the House that the legislation then proposed was justified, and justified strenuously in face of opposition, by reference to the historical basis on which the matter rested and which is absolutely undisturbed by anything which has happened since. In the progress of the Act through the House, the question of extending its provisions to leaseholders was considered, and was rejected by the right hon. Gentleman. I do not wonder that he rejected it. He rejected it on two grounds, which are as sufficient now as they were then. He rejected it in the first place, because if you extended it to leaseholders there is no reason for stopping at the Highlands and Islands of Scotland in that extension; and, in the second place, because, according to the principle of the legislation he was submitting to the House, the commercial aspect of it was out of the question, and he was not proposing anything which would involve the touching of commercial bargains, but was proposing legislation founded entirely on the old alleged historic position of the crofters. I ask the House whether anything has been said against the reasons then given for limiting the Bill as it was limited, or in support of the Resolution of the hon. Member? Something has been said, in support of the first topic of the Resolution, by reference to the case of Ireland. I think, when closely examined, and after the change of front has been discounted, that is all which has been advanced in support of that part of the Resolution. This is not the first time that that argument has been used in this House on that very subject. The reply was made at the time—and is as effectual now as then—that the case of Ireland in this particular presents no analogy to the case of Scotland as settled by the Crofters Act. The Act—of 1887 I think it was—it is quite true, dealt with tenants in Ireland, but it dealt with the tenants of the whole country, and not merely with exceptional districts; and, in the second place, as I always understood, it dealt with the whole country with the object and purpose of putting an end to dual ownership. There was a period during which that could not be introduced all at once, and it was in reference to that interval that the legislation was passed with reference to the Irish tenant, which has been referred to to-night as a reason why legislation of a permanent nature should be applied, in what I cannot think is an analogous case, to Scotland. The hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) seemed to think there were other classes of persons than leaseholders who ought to be included in the improved legislation; he mentioned, I think, the cases of cottars and sub-tenants. As far as the case of cottars is concerned, he seemed to think the Act had not had much application.

DR. CLARK: Not in one single case.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: Well, the inference I should draw from that is that the Act has either not been required in the case of cottars or that the conditions have been so satisfactory that there has been no occasion for an appeal to the Commissioners. The hon. Member says that sub-tenants were included in the Act—that they were intended by Parliament to be included in the Act. I would only remind him that while the Supreme Court of Scotland does not arrogate to itself any power to over-ride the Crofters Commission, or to review its decisions under the Act, that Court is quite within its power in deciding, in a competent proceeding, whether sub-tenants have been excluded. The intentions of the Legislature must be construed by a Court of Law according to the words used by the Legislature, and in so construing them I am not aware that the Act has been infringed in the least in the direction the hon. Member indicated. One word as to the second part of the Resolution—as to improvements. There can be no doubt from the words of the Act of 1886 that the Crofter Commissioners are bound—are expressly enjoined—to take into account the unexhausted improvements which existed on the land when fixing a fair rent. What difference is there between that, an instruction by Parliament to a judicial tribunal, and the proposal now put forward as if it were an ameliorative one? In one sense we can all agree with the hon. Member on the point; but my agreement with him is founded on the fact that the Act provides expressly for the very thing which he desires to obtain. When the hon. Member for Caithness was on that part of the subject, what was it to which he pointed? How did he propose to demonstrate to the House of Commons that the instruction of Parliament to the Commissioners had not been technically carried out? He gave one instance only, an account of an interview he had had with a valuer.

DR. CLARK: It was a letter.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: He had a communication with a valuer, and it came to this: that in the opinion of that valuer one of the elements to be taken into consideration in fixing a fair rent was whether the land was in its own nature capable of improvement, and that that was credited to the owner. The improvability of the land is part of the value of the land. The question is, to whom ought that part of the value to be credited? If it is to accrue to the crofter, the hon. Member's language, translated into plain English, means that fair rent is to be fixed on prairie value. Then I ask, was that the meaning and intention of the right hon. Gentleman's legislation in 1886? Most of this discussion has dealt with the enlargement of holdings, and subsidiarily with the creation of new holdings. Well, Sir, I am at a loss to follow the figures which the hon. Member has submitted to the House on this subject. I have taken out some of the figures as accurately as I can, and I find that including Sutherland—you cannot get much benefit from the figures if you exclude one of the counties—the total figures, down to the end of 1891, show that the number of enlargements granted—a great many more have been considered—has been 32. I do not say that is a large number, but I think it is considerably more than the figures of the hon. Member. But then this enlargement of holdings affects a considerable number of individuals. The result is that it has taken effect in an extension of holdings in the case of 527 crofters. I do not say that that is all that might have been done, or all that was expected to be done. But I have listened with interest and expectation in order to hear in what respect those safeguards which the right hon. Gentleman himself put into his Bill in reference to the terms on which land should be taken for the enlargement of holdings, could be safely and appropriately limited or done away with. I have not heard of a single one of these safeguards upon which any Member laid his finger, and said, "That is too restrictive," or that it should be abolished. And I think if hon. Members will only read those safeguards as contained in one of the clauses of the Act, including even those that deal with deer forests, they will see that while these restrictions recognise the large and legitimate interest of the landowner where his land is to be taken away from him, in most cases also they are obviously for the interest of the crofters themselves, and of the crofter community in the immediate neighbourhood. Now, it is a serious thing to raise by Resolution, and without any attempt to enter into details, the question of abolishing or materially modifying these restrictions, which were found to be just and reasonable. At the same time it is true, as I have said, that the enlargement of holdings does not bulk largely. That may be owing to the poverty of the people, who have to satisfy the Commissioners that they could utilise the additional lands before they are meted out to them by the Commission. As to the assertion that the failure of that part of the Act to produce a large effect has been owing to the restrictions which were imposed, I have heard, at all events, nothing to-night to make me think that this is so, or that these restrictions are capable of very large modification with safety to the community which are most interested. As to the creation of new holdings, there again I come to the historical basis of the legislation. You abandon that altogether when you propose to give the same rights to those who have gone quite recently and who have settled down without being able to attach themselves to the old historical tenure. It seems to me you will be in danger of creating a fresh class of crofters, who in turn will require Acts for the enlargement of their holdings. That part of the Resolution, which was very little spoken to, and which was not much elaborated by the hon. Member who moved it or the hon. Members who have supported it, is one which is entirely met by the proposal in the Amendment. The Amendment moved to this Resolution is one which the Government are quite prepared to accept; and it appears to me it is in that direction that the true solution of this problem is to be found. The Amendment safeguards the question of improvements. It recognises that it is proper that where a crofter is having a fair rent fixed he should have his own improvements withdrawn from the consideration of the fair rent which should be awarded. For the reasons which I have assigned the Resolution seems to me to be inadmissible, and the Amendment to suggest what will ultimately be found to be the true and safe policy.

*(10.46.) MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I think the people of the Highlands will be very much disappointed with the speech which we have just heard. All the arguments it contained were used six years ago. I am glad, however, that the late Lord Advocate has stood out boldly on this occasion and expressed himself in a distinct manner that the changes in the Act which were suggested by the Crofter Members in 1886 should now be carried out. The Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for the St. Rollox Division of Glasgow has my hearty support. When Lord Napier's Commission was investigating the grievances of the people of the Highlands in 1883 the question of the amount of rent did not come before us in an acute form. The great question that came before us was, according to the words of the people themselves, "more land," and that cry rose from every district, from every locality of the Highlands and Islands. Until more land is given to the people the Highland question will never be solved. The Lord Advocate has referred in his speech to the fact that nothing was said as to how extension of holdings was to be given and carried out. Perhaps I might be allowed to mention to the House a matter that came under my own observation within the last 14 days to show the necessity—I may say the absolute necessity—for increased holdings in many parts of the Highlands and Islands. I visited for the first time in a parish in the Island of Skye, in my own county, a township called Elgol.

It was a miserable place, cribbed, cabined, and confined, bordering upon the sea. There were 37 heads of families, including in all 200 souls. It was formerly, within the memory of people living in that place, only occupied by five heads of families, who lived there in comfort, a credit to themselves and to the people they belonged to. But by the operations of the former landlord whole townships were cleared off in other parts of the estate and crowded into this place. A great deal of sickness prevailed there some years ago; fever spread in it; nurses had to go there from Edinburgh, and a number of people died. Why should not these people be provided for when I may say there are hundreds of acres of land lying waste in the hands of the proprietor of this very estate, without any stock upon it or being devoted to any good purpose whatever? The above case has come under my own observation; and there are hundreds of them all over the Highlands and Islands in the same position. One word as regards the class called "cottars," who may be described as holding a worse position than the labourers in England. From a property in South Uist a petition was sent to me, signed by 30 heads of families, making the most grievous complaints of the way in which they have been treated under the Crofters Act. Formerly these poor people were allowed to take land for a certain time for a certain purpose; now, owing to the restrictions under the Crofters Act, if a crofter allows a cottar for a few months a bit of land even for raising potatoes, there is a danger, under the Crofters Act, of his tenure being destroyed. I was very glad to hear the speech of the late Lord Advocate this evening. But I must say that if three-fourths of his Bill had been omitted and struck out altogether, it would have been an excellent Bill. As to the Amendment that has been moved by the hon. Gentleman opposite, I am very glad in one sense to hear it; but it is not a proper answer to the demand that is now before us. That there should be an increase of the small proprietary all over Scotland is a suggestion that I am very much in favour of, and if the hon. Gentleman will bring forward a Motion to that effect I will be most happy to support it; but in the meantime, as I do not consider his Amendment to be a fair or legitimate answer to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for the St. Rollox Division, I must vote against it.

*(10.55.) SIR G. O. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I must say that the announcement of the Lord Advocate has thrown a very new element into the Debate. At any rate, from this side of the House we cannot be charged with what we are usually charged with in this House—namely, bringing forward a sensational Motion compared with that which has been accepted by the Government. We keep ourselves entirely within the limits of the Act of Parliament, which has passed both Houses and has been tested for five years; and we ask the Government to amend it. But the Government meets us by supporting a Resolution, and a Resolution which has not been commended to the House by any detail, by any argument on principle, but a Resolution which opens up an immense field. That is to say, that a system of land purchase is the proper method to deal with the grievances of the Highlands. Now, upon that point I will only say this: that we will discuss that when we come to the right time, when it is brought forward by a responsible Government in the shape of a definite proposition. But at present all we say about it is this: that we do not accept it as an answer to the demands brought forward in the present Resolution, because these demands are demands upon the landlords of the Highlands. We ask that they should restore to the tenants that which Parliament—as I will show in a few moments—has proclaimed to be the tenants' right; and we do not wish to shift the burden from their shoulders to the shoulders of the general taxpayers, who include all the tenants, all the labourers, all the men of business in England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland alike. Now, the Lord Advocate says that no reasons—no adequate reasons—have been given for this Resolution. There are four clauses in the proposal of my hon. Friend. The last in order, but by far the most important, is that proposal which is at the bottom of the improvement of society in the Highlands, which is the substance of the aspirations of the people, and is the enlargement of their holdings and the acquisition of more land. Now, this is no new question. It has already been approved in principle by Parliament. The principles by which Parliament expected to be able to carry out this great boon to the people of the Highlands are embodied in several pages of the Statute Book; but unfortunately, in this part even this most defective measure, the Crofters Act, was largely found to be defective. I shall venture to read two or three sentences from the speech in which the Crofters Act was introduced in 1886:—

"This is a Bill founded strictly on the historical and local circumstances of a very peculiar district. We do not want to make the crofter a possessor or a landed proprietor. He and his ancestors never have been landed proprietors or possessors; but they claim the right of grazing a certain number of sheep and cattle on the higher pastures on payment of a certain rent. Without that right neither he nor they could live; and we propose to put the genuine crofter with a genuine holding in possession of that right."

That was the intention of the Crofters Act—of one main part of the Crofters Act. But the Crofters Act has failed to carry out that intention for reasons into which I will not enter at this moment. These reasons are exposed to the public in the very able successive Reports of the Crofters Commission, and more especially in the special Report which on my urging the Government laid before the House in the year 1888. The aspiration of Parliament was that every genuine crofter should have his holding enlarged, if necessary, out of the land that is at present put to other uses. That was the aspiration of Parliament; and what has been the result? In the year 1891 there were 59 applicants from Argyllshire; none of them had their holdings enlarged. There were 244 applicants from Inverness-shire; no holdings were enlarged. There were 244 applicants from Ross and Cromarty; and not a single holding was enlarged. It was the same in all the rest of Scotland, and in the case only of 113 applicants in Sutherland were holdings enlarged. In 1890 there were 111 individuals in Sutherland who were benefited by the Act by having enlargements of their holdings; and over the whole of the rest of the Highlands only 44 individuals were benefited by the Act, so that in the course of these two years those who obtained moorland were only 22 on an average in each year, except in Sutherlandshire, out of 40,000 crofters in Scotland, of whom 25,000 come already under the scope of this Act. Now, what is the case of these poor people? They are people who have in past days been evicted from their holdings which Parliament by legislation has deliberately pronounced to be, in part at least, their property. There is one single proprietor who in old days removed altogether six whole townships, restricted the grazing of others, collected all the people who remained into the diminished area, and largely increased the rents of that area. That is a specimen case. I do not give the name—I do not give the place. It is an old story; but Parliament has now pronounced by the Crofters Act that the people who remained on the land—and equally those people who were turned off the land—had a very definite, tangible, moral, and what ought to have been, and is now, a legal part, in their own farms. Parliament is therefore absolutely bound to place these people in the position in which they were before they were deprived of that which by legislation Parliament has pronounced to be their right; but whether Parliament is justified or obliged to do so or not, at any rate it has announced that it thinks that it ought to do so, and this Resolution of my hon. Friend is for the purpose of making it affirm that the Act which it has passed is insufficient and ought to be amended. Now we come to another clause of this Resolution—the extension to the leaseholders. I listened very carefully to the speech of the Lord Advocate, and I could find no single argument of any sort or kind against that extension. He spoke of my right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. J. B. Balfour) not having been sufficiently careful to make his Land Act perfect all at once. I must say that I think it is greatly to the credit of my right hon. and learned Friend that the first draft of the Crofters Act was so very efficient, so very complete. What is the story of Ireland? First, there was the Land Bill of 1871, then the Land Bill of

1881; and it was not until there had been two great Land Bills that the matter culminated in the Land Bill of 1887, which gave to the leaseholder a part property in his farm. It is a very little thing that we should ask in this the second attempt at land legislation for Scotland that which this Government have done in the third attempt at land legislation for Ireland. If it is for the benefit of the crofter who is not a leaseholder, if it is his right to obtain this position, it is equally for the benefit of the crofter who is a leaseholder, and it is equally his right; and it is of the most enormous benefit that every part of the crofting population should be included in this Bill. It is for the benefit of the individual. I do not know that in any place in which I have travelled I ever saw anything more interesting than the change in the houses which were occupied upon the crofts after the crofters came into the secure tenure of their holdings. I have seen a little village, at the higher end of which there were a number of houses which were as good as the best cottages in the North of England; while at the other end were the ruins of poor hovels, which were as bad as the worst hovels that, I am sorry to say, I have seen in some parts of the West of Ireland. The old hovels were the buildings in which the crofters lived before they had security of tenure; the new cottages were the dwellings which they built after they had obtained security of tenure. There you have an indication of the advantage to the individual. But what an advantage it is to the community! Another thing I was told on all hands. We here at a distance have been very much perturbed, and I think greatly shocked, at the lawlessness of the Highlands. It was a fact that for several years, and during the best part of one Administration and the whole of another—these Administrations coming from different parties in this House—the Queen's writ did not run in a great part of the Highlands, and rents could not be collected, no serious attempt being even made to collect them. I was informed, when I was in the Highlands, that in those parts of the country to which the Commission had not gone there was the greatest difficulty in getting the rent—in some cases even an impossibility; but when the Commission had once gone there, when they had dealt with the arrears in that sweeping way in which they did deal with them, when they had fixed a rent which the conscience of the people recognised to be a just rent as the law proclaimed it to be, then from that moment, and after that moment, the rents began to be freely and regularly paid. The immense benefit to the individual, and the immense benefit to the community, which would be granted by extending to the numerous leaseholders those benefits of fixity of tenure and fair rent which have worked such miracles on the populations who have come already within their sphere, requires to be answered by much more serious arguments than the not very convincing tu quoque which was levelled by the present Lord Advocate across the Table against my right hon. Friend. For my own part, I believe Parliament is quite prepared to lay down this doctrine—that every holding on which the tenant substantially creates the fixtures should come under the Act, even when that tenement and that farm is held on lease. The limit should be a limit of rent, and, if Parliament so chooses, a limit of locality. But within that locality, at any rate, and within that rent, the tenements ought to be brought within the beneficent operations of this most important Act where the permanent improvements are made by the tenant, and not by the landlord. And now, Sir, I am much obliged to the House for hearing me so attentively while I have gone through the main propositions of this Resolution. There is only one that remains, and that is the proposition that all improvements made by the tenant or his predecessor in the same family, and not paid for by the landlord, should be expressly exempted from the operations of rent. This part of the Resolution is, I conceive, framed to meet the anxious feeling that exists in the Highlands as to the universality of the obligation upon the Commissioners of taking into consideration the improvements which have been made by the crofter and his predecessor. It is very generally felt in the Highlands that the first clause of the sixth section in the Act directing the Commissioners to take into consideration those improvements is not sufficiently strong, and has not been carried out with sufficient regularity. Whether that is the case or not, I do not know; but this I do know, that wherever I went I received memorials from the people of the district, and that those memorials invariably contained two prayers, whatever else they contained—first, that the land contiguous to the crofter's holding should be available for the enlargement of such holding; and, secondly, that all the improvements of the holding of the crofter should be attributable to the crofter occupant thereof, except to the extent to which the landlord might prove such improvements to have been executed or paid for by him. Now, those two petitions are the gist of what the Highland people wish and desire. They are entirely within the four corners of that great Bill which Parliament in its wisdom passed in 1886—a Bill, I will venture to say, which, in its operations—where its operations have been put into force—has been more successful and more thorough in procuring those things which Parliament wished than perhaps any other Bill which Parliament has passed. And it is to supplement this Bill, and not in any way to go beyond it, that we ask this House of Commons this evening to agree to the Amendment.

(11.13.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman has, perhaps, a better title to speak on the merits of the Crofters Act than any other gentleman in this House, because, unless my memory fails me, he was the person who was the sponsor for the infant which he now so much eulogises. I am rather surprised that he finds that the Bill he introduced to Parliament now requires amendment. Of course, I admit that after six years' experience any Bill, drafted by whomsoever it may be, may well require re-consideration and amendment in detail, and I do not think that even the handiwork of the right hon. Gentleman may not require some re-consideration. But as I shall presently show, the alterations which he now desires to make in the Act strike at the very root and principle on which the Bill was originally framed, and are inconsistent with the very fundamental considerations which he advanced to the House in defence of that Bill when he first brought it before us. I propose to deal briefly with the three points raised by the Amendment, and especially the defence of those three points as presented to our consideration to-night by the right hon. Gentleman. I shall take the last point he has brought before us first, that namely connected with the improvements of the crofters. On this subject, as has been quite truly remarked by more than one speaker, there is no disagreement in principle between the two sides of the House. We are all agreed that the crofter should have full right to the value of the improvements, and that his rent should be fixed after an ample estimate has been taken of the value of those improvements. And yet, says the right hon. Gentleman—

"I am continually receiving memorials from all parts of the Highlands praying that these improvements may be properly valued."

If they are not properly valued, it is either the fault of the Act, or it is the fault of the Commission. But as I do not believe it is the fault of the Commission—and I am sure it is not the fault of the Act—I cannot but believe that the memorials which the right hon. Gentleman has received err, as other memorials err, by being founded on an imperfect knowledge of the facts. What says the Act? The Act says that—

"In fixing the rent the Crofter Commission shall hear the parties and shall fix the rent after considering all the circumstances of the case, the holding and the district, and particularly after taking into consideration any permanent or unexhausted improvements on the holding and suitable thereto which had been executed or paid for by the crofter or his predecessor in the same family."

Now, Sir, these words are wide. The right hon. Gentleman apparently thinks they are imperfect. He has not told us, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. B. Balfour) sitting next to him has not told us, in what respect they think they are deficient. Both have said that better provision should be made for dealing with the improvements of the crofter. They had the words of their own Act—I presume drafted by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. B. Balfour) and approved of by the right hon. Baronet (Sir G.

Trevelyan)—before them, words which appear to cover every conceivable case in which the crofters require compensation, and they have not condescended to inform the House in what particular these very wide words are deficient, in what possible manner any crofter whose case is justly adjudicated upon by the Crofter Commissioner can be damnified in respect of his improvements; and until the framers of the Act show us how it is deficient, what is the use of coming down and telling us that it ought to be amended? Can we conceive a less business-like transaction than telling us the crofters' improvements are not adequately safeguarded and yet not telling us in what particular the safeguards provided by the Act are deficient, and in what particular they ought to be amended? I agree with the principle laid down in the Act and repeated by the two right hon. Gentlemen and by the mover of the Resolution; but before it is worth while for the House to take into consideration what new statutory defence shall be provided for the crofters in this particular it surely is not too much to ask those who were originally responsible for the Act to tell us in what particulars they think that it falls short of the object for which they framed it. However, I do not propose to delay the House upon any subject upon which we are agreed, although I think in this particular matter the speeches of the right hon. Gentlemen savour rather of vague rhetoric than of business-like suggestion. I turn to what the right hon. Gentleman describes as the main part of the Motion, and what in fact is described as the part of the Motion which deals with the only portion of the Act in which any deficiency has been shown. I think that was an incorrect expression of the right hon. Gentleman, for the Bill also requires amendment on the subject of leaseholders. At all events, the view of the right hon. Gentleman is that that is the main deficiency in the Act, and, therefore, the main and most important clause in the Amendment of the hon. Member for St. Rollox is that which deals with the enlargement of leaseholds. It will be admitted that compulsorily to enlarge anybody's holding, be he crofter or anybody else, at the expense of somebody else's holdings, is a very serious step to take, and one which Parliament will take if at all, only after providing every safeguard and precaution. I wish to know what are the safeguards and precautions in the original Crofters Act which the right hon. Gentlemen opposite wish to see either omitted or amended? In their interesting Report laid before the House, and dated 1887, the Crofters' Commission enumerated the reasons which, in their opinion, rendered the number of cases in which they could compulsorily enlarge the crofters' holdings fewer than they could desire. Those reasons were two. The Bill laid down that a holding may only be increased out of contiguous land which is either in the occupation of the landlord or is not on lease; and also that before the crofter can claim a compulsory enlargement of his holding, he should see that he has adequate money to work his existing farm. I wish to know which of those two reasons the right hon. Gentlemen opposite desire to see either abrogated or modified? Do they seriously think that the position of crofters is to be improved, not by increasing their farm by the process of addition from contiguous land, but by dealing with another farm in another district which they are to cultivate in addition to their present holding; and if they think neither of these two restrictions should be removed, do they think that the restriction as regards the means of cultivation should be removed? In other words, do they think it is a proper thing for this House to enact that land should be compulsorily taken away from a tenant who has money to cultivate the land, and handed over to a tenant who, by my hypothesis, has not? It appears to me, if I might venture to say so, that though we would all like to see small crofters' holdings enlarged, the difficulties could not be got over by any possibility through a simple modification of the Crofters Act. Poverty is the main reason why these holdings cannot be increased. The aggregation of poor tenants on a poor soil, in a poor climate—that is the reason why they cannot increase their holdings—and that is not a state of things which can be done away with by a simple Amendment of the Crofters Act, whatever hon. Gentlemen, for electoral or other purposes, may say to the contrary. The right hon. Gentleman drew a pathetic picture as usual as to the crofters being removed in enormous numbers from their original holding on a certain great estate. Everyone who heard him must know that he referred to the Sutherland Estate.

SIR G. TREVELYAN dissented.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He must have done so. I know the Highlands as well as the right hon. Gentleman, and I never heard of any estate on which families have been removed on a large scale within the last two or three generations except the Sutherland Estate. On that estate, I boldly say, though it is not a popular doctrine in some parts of the House, the public spirit shown by the owners, whether mistakenly or not—I believe it was not mistaken—is deserving of the highest admiration. It is a matter of historic notoriety that they do not make money out of that estate, but that they spend money upon it, and that for generation after generation they have lavished funds drawn from other parts of the country in attempting, according to the best of their lights, to improve the position of their people. I am, perhaps, audacious enough to think that after the criticisms I have ventured to pass—I will not say upon the suggestions made by right hon. Gentlemen, but upon the pious opinions they have expressed—we shall not hear any more of any modification of the Crofters Act in the direction of giving additional powers for the extension of holdings. I therefore turn to that part of the Motion which deals with the inclusion of leaseholders. And here I confess I listened with immense surprise to the right hon. Gentleman. I could perfectly understand Members rising in other parts of the House and saying, "You have extended the Irish Land Act of 1881 to Irish leaseholders, why not extend the Crofters Act of 1886 to leaseholders in the crofter counties?" That is a very plausible argument, but it is not one which comes very well from the right hon. Gentlemen who framed the present Act, because they distinctly framed it on the ground that the crofters, holding from year to year by customary tenure, have peculiar rights through that tenure not possessed by any other farmers in this island; the whole basis of their legislation was an historic basis. The whole ground on which they moved the Bill was that there is a customary tenure prevailing in the Highlands by which the crofters possess certain rights from which a few landlords here and there desire to drive them, and because they take that view of their own Bill they themselves resisted the very Amendment for which they are now going to vote. It appears to me, whether it is right or wrong to introduce leaseholders into the Bill, it is impossible for any man who sincerely believes in the original ground upon which this Act was introduced to suggest such an Amendment or to support it when suggested by others. First let us consider the analogy brought forward in regard to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. J. B. Balfour) has repeated to-night an argument he used on a former occasion. He said, both then and now—

“When the Bill was introduced I was prepared to resist this Amendment; but now a Conservative Government have extended to Irish leaseholders the privilege claimed for crofter leaseholders I am absolved from my principle, I am permitted to vote for that which I have formerly spoken against.”

I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman used that argument as a tu quoque argument, a form of argument to which I have no objection; or whether he thought it absolved him in foro conscientiae. I can hardly believe that the right hon. Gentleman, in the silence of his own chamber, and reflecting over the Bill he himself has so laboriously drawn, was really satisfied in abandoning his own principles in regard to Scotland simply because it had occurred to him that he might attack the Unionist and Conservative Party for abandoning their principles with regard to Ireland. But what did this Irish analogy mean? In 1881 a Bill was passed, not for a portion of Ireland, but for the whole of Ireland; not for a few Irish tenants, but practically for all; not for tenants below a certain valuation, but for tenants whatever their valuation might be. From that Bill leaseholders were nominally excluded. How does that compare with the Crofters Bill?

The Crofters Bill did not apply even to the whole of the agricultural population, but only to an infinitesimally small portion of it; and in the very limited district in which it did apply it applied only to a very limited class of tenants—tenants who held land at a rent under £30. There is another distinction which appears to me to have escaped almost every hon. Gentleman who has argued on the subject. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who attacked the Unionist Party for extending the Act of 1881 to Irish leaseholders talked as if Irish leases had not been interfered with before that date. That was a profound mistake. The Act of 1881 not only interfered with Irish leases, but interfered with them in a fundamental way. The essence of a lease is that the landlord lets his land to a tenant on certain conditions for a certain period at a certain rent, and on the condition that at the end of the lease the land should be given back to him in the same condition in which it was originally let. Were Irish leases left uninterfered with? Why, that last condition, the most essential of all, was absolutely destroyed under the Act of 1881. It is true that the conditions as regards the cultivation of land were not interfered with; but it was provided that, when leases came to an end, the land should not be given to the landlord to be dealt with as he desired, but that the tenant who had the end of the lease should thenceforth be a tenant with all the rights under the Act of 1881, with fixity of tenure, and a right to have a fair rent fixed. Thus, under the Act of 1881, the greatest right of ownership the landlord had was deliberately taken away by the British Legislature, and the Act of 1887 did not so much deal with leases as with the small fragments of leases left by the legislation of six years earlier. The framers of the Crofters Act of 1886, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton and the right hon. and learned Member for Clackmannan, whom we have heard with so much pleasure and, I may add, with so much astonishment to-night, deliberately excluded leases altogether from the Act. They said, and said rightly I believe, in the language of the hon. Member for East Lanark, that the tenant who holds under lease is ipso facto not to be included in the crofter class, as he is not a customary tenant and has not the historic basis of tenure which a crofter has. Under the Act of 1886 not only were leases not touched, in the sense that rents were touched, they were not touched at all. They were not touched in the sense that the Irish Act of 1881 left leases untouched; they were touched in no sense whatever, and the landlord at the end of these leases became the absolute owner of the land as in England he becomes the absolute possessor of the land when it is no longer held by the lessee. Do not hon. and right hon. Gentlemen see the enormous difference between the cases in Ireland and in Scotland? The argument is that there is some analogy existing in the case of Scotland to justify this extension of the Act of 1887 to Scotland, but there is no such analogy. Argue the question on its merits if you like, but there is no analogy. There was no suggestion in the case of the Irish Act of 1887 that we were for the first time interfering with contracts, whereas you are in this case, for the first time, proposing that contracts fairly entered into between landlord and tenant shall be set aside in the interest of one of two parties. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. B. Balfour) has alluded to certain cases which have come within his knowledge of leases having been entered into in the crofter counties, after the Act of 1886 was introduced, but before it became law.

MR. J. B. BALFOUR: Before the Commission went there.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am quite sure he has not attempted to deceive the House, or in any way to exaggerate the cases as they have reached him. They are monstrous cases, and there is not a word of defence to be said on either side of the House for the man who deliberately used force for the purpose. If it can be shown that illegitimate pressure was exercised to take advantage of the hiatus between the introduction and the passing of the Act, by all means let us apply such remedies as the cases require. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman will admit such cases are few, and stand outside the general scope of the proposition. How many other cases are there? They must be very few. I do not believe there is a crofter of the few who hold leases on the whole of the west coast of Scotland. I do not know whether any hon. Gentleman has heard of such. I have made inquiries, and I have heard of none. As we all know, the great mass of the crofter population is congested there; and if these leaseholders exist, they would be found there if anywhere. I do not believe they exist in great numbers. Even those most anxious for the Resolution will hardly maintain that there are any great number of persons to be found whose cases would be ameliorated if this provision in regard to the breaking of leases were carried out. What are we asked to do? For the sake of an occasional tenant scattered here or there in the more thinly-populated districts in the eastern parts of Scotland we are asked for the first time in the history of legislation in this country to introduce a provision for the breaking of contracts deliberately entered into between landlords and tenants. Is that a contingency the House contemplates with equanimity? Is that a form of legislation hon. Members seriously think will benefit the persons for whom it is intended? We are occupied four days in the week at present in the discussion of the Small Holdings Bill, and hon. Members opposite desire that the measure should tend to the creation of small tenants rather than small owners of land. They are anxious to see the number of small agricultural tenants increased. Do they think that if they interfere in this matter of leases, of contracts between landlords and tenants, that there is a single landlord in England, Wales, or Scotland who will be idiot enough ever to make a contract with a small tenant unless he is obliged? Do hon. Members not see that by this kind of interference they are rendering it impossible for any of those contracts to be made, which in their speeches on every day in the week, except Tuesday at 9 o'clock, they have led us to believe they desire to have carried out? Is it not madness to say to a landlord who has entered into a contract with these small tenants,

"You have entered into these agreements, but we break them." Will any landlord enter into such a contract again? If under such circumstances a landlord should ask my advice, I should say, "Parliament has begun to take these matters into its own hands; leave them to Parliament to finish. Let Parliament undertake the whole administration of land." It would be foolish for a landlord to enter into a contract with a small tenant under such circumstances, because, however equitable the arrangement might be, he might find Parliament coming down and quashing the bargain, and making some other arbitrary proposal to which he had never been a party, and which, if he had foreseen, he would never have assented to. Is it not a monstrous suggestion that we should, for the sake of a fractional part of an insignificant section of the Scotch population—insignificant, I mean, in point of numbers; the leaseholders are but a fraction of the crofters, as the crofters are relatively insignificant in point of numbers to the population of the whole country—is it not monstrous to say that for this fraction of the population we should lay down a new principle of legislation the end of which you cannot foresee, which is based upon no settled ground whatever, having no plain object in view, apparently doctored to meet some particular electoral cry, not intended and not suited to benefit any large portion of the agricultural community in England or Scotland? If you once begin to break leases, I do not see where you are to stop, and why you should leave any contracts unbroken. I confess I do not see how the community which exists on contracts, and contracts alone, can hold together. These are considerations which demand serious attention. Do not let us to-night vote for an Abstract Resolution which cannot be carried into effect without the disastrous consequences I have ventured to foreshadow. Easy it is, very easy, to vote these Resolutions. They appear to carry with them no special responsibility, for, after all, they are vague and may mean nothing, they are vain and empty sounds until embodied in legislation. Unless you can see your way to legislation applying to all classes of the community—and you would shrink from any such general application—it would be insane to pass such a Resolution on which such legislation is to be ultimately founded.

(11.50.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I am not going to make a speech, but I may be permitted to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question. We have not heard any announcement from the right hon. Gentleman as to the attitude he assumes towards the abstract Amendment to the Resolution moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew (Mr. Shaw Stewart), which was accepted in the name of the Government by the Lord Advocate. The Amendment suggests the alternative of land purchase applied to the crofter districts, and I think it is somewhat remarkable—it is due to oversight probably—that the right hon. Gentleman has not alluded to that Amendment accepted on his behalf by the Lord Advocate. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman does he endorse what was said by the Lord Advocate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: And in that case whether the Government intend during the present Session to propose legislation for land purchase in the crofter districts of Scotland?

(11.52.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I have no desire to intervene at any length. The right hon. Gentleman has been pleased to attribute to us the design of bringing this matter forward for electoral purposes. If we had had any such design it would have served its purpose in drawing from the right hon. Gentleman the speech he has just delivered. The right hon. Gentleman has twitted my right hon. Friend on the action he took in regard to the Act, and he has said that he approved the principle of the Act. But the right hon. Gentleman said on the second reading:—

"I give assent to the Second Reading with grave misgivings, and I will do my best in Committee to remove from the Bill as much as may be of the evils in it which I fear are ingrained in the very fabric and substance of the measure."

I am free to admit that so far as my knowledge goes the right hon. Gentleman did his best in Committee to remove those features to which he objected. I admire the spirit of the right hon. Gentleman very much—it had many good qualities; but it lacks any quality that will find for it acceptance in the Highlands to which the Resolution applies. He made a great deal of the want of analogy to the case of the inclusion of Irish leaseholders, but I prefer to take his own ground and to take the proposal on its merits. On that ground we justify the proposal, for we find that through the operation of the Act an imaginary line is drawn, on the one side of which a man has his rent reduced from 30 to 50 per cent. with security of tenure; while on the other side an unfortunate crofter must continue to pay his old rack-rent merely because he happens to be a leaseholder. Such there are in my own constituency. A great deal has happened since 1886. Leaseholders in Ireland have been given fair rents and security of tenure. The arguments used to-night against the Resolution have been trotted out time after time, and I cannot withhold admiration from the courage of the right hon. Gentleman in bringing forward the high old Tory arguments which have been so repeatedly knocked down. I need not further refer to them. Meanwhile, what has become of the Amendment? It is, in my opinion, a far more revolutionary proposal to buy up the crofts than to extend the existing Act. It might be desirable under certain conditions, but now it would perpetuate the evils of which we complain. First, there must be a redistribution of the people on the soil, and after that we may consider a scheme of land purchase. That part of the Resolution which relates to an inquiry has not been much noticed. That clause has been put in because it has been asserted, though not this evening, that there is no land in the Highlands available for the purpose. This we deny, and so we ask for an inquiry and an authoritative declaration on that point. I heartily commend this very reasonable Resolution to the favourable consideration of the House.

Question put.

(11.55.) The House divided:—
Ayes 113; Noes 152.—(Div. List,
No. 121.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

It being after Midnight the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

Mr. Angus Sutherland

CORN SALES.

RE-APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Select Committee be re-appointed to inquire and report upon the various weights and measures used for the sale of grain throughout the United Kingdom; the desirability of selling grain by weight only or by measure and weight, and, in the event of either being considered desirable, the extent to which either might be enforced; the desirability of the adoption of a uniform weight, either for the United Kingdom or any part of it; if a uniform weight is desirable, the standard to be adopted; and whether there should be one standard for all kinds of grain; and if not, what should be the standard for each kind."—
(Mr. Jasper More.)

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): This is a question in which Ireland is interested, but on looking over the names I find that only one Irish Member is nominated, and I do not know that he will be able to attend. I am not aware either whether the usual course has been followed in making the selection and to allow a little time for consideration. I object to proceeding with the appointment of the Committee now.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. AKERS DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): The usual plan has been adopted in the selection of names, and in a Committee of 13 Members there is the usual proportion of Irish representation.

MR. SEXTON: I do not find that there is any Member connected with the interests of agriculture in Ireland.

MR. SPEAKER: The Motion for the appointment of the Committee is apart from the nominations to serve on the Committee.

MR. JASPER MORE (Shropshire, Ludlow): May I suggest to the hon. Member that he should allow the appointment of the Committee, and I shall be perfectly willing to comply with any wish expressed by Irish Members, and, indeed, am anxious that Irish interests should be represented. I hope he will not force his objection.

MR. SEXTON: I have no doubt of the good disposition of the hon. Member, but the interests of Ireland must be safeguarded.

Motion deferred till To-morrow.

EDUCATION CODE, 1892.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): The Motion I have to make relates to the examination of teachers and pupil teachers, extending the number of opportunities for teaching and for examination. It is simply a recognition of the lectures, classes, and certificates of the University Extension System as a sufficient test, and I am glad to say the Vice President of the Council assents to the proposal as an improvement in the Code.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that the following be added to the Code of Regulations by the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council on Education, 1892, in page 39, column 5, at bottom of of column, add:—

8. Marks will also be given to candidates who shall present University Extension Certificates awarded by the University of Cambridge, the University of Oxford, or the Universities Joint Board, London, provided that the certificates shall have been obtained for a course of study in one subject, other than those mentioned in the Schedule or in Notes 5 and 6 thereof, which has been previously approved by the Department and is certified to have included attendance at not less than 24 weekly lectures and classes."—(Sir Albert Rollit.)

Motion agreed to.

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

SOLICITORS' APPRENTICES (IRELAND) (COMMISSIONERS' REPORT).

MR. SEXTON: I move for the Return in its amended form. I desired to have the evidence also, but I find the Treasury object to that on the score of expense. To the Report I understand there is no objection.

Copies ordered—

"Of the Reports of the Commissioners appointed by the Treasury to inquire into and report upon the matter at issue between the Irish Benchers and the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland regarding the allocation of part of the Stamp Duty on Indentures of Solicitors' Apprentices in Ireland."—(Mr. Sexton.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

DUBLIN BARRACKS IMPROVEMENT
(re-committed) BILL.—(No. 218.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. SEXTON: Can the hon. Gentleman give us any explanation of this?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The Bill was very carefully considered by a Committee upstairs. I do not know whether the hon. Member is aware that it deals with the matter of procedure for the arbitrator in reference to property to be taken. There was no opposition upstairs. Two Irish Members were on the Committee.

MR. SEXTON: Were the Members present?

MR. BRODRICK: One was. The hon. Member for North Longford was absent.

MR. SPEAKER: There is notice of an Instruction down on the Paper, which, if the Bill goes forward now, cannot be moved.

MR. SEXTON: That Motion is in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), who is not now able to attend in his place. The Bill is not so urgent, I think, that it cannot stand over for a day.

Committee deferred till Thursday.

SALMON AND FRESHWATER FISHERIES BILL.—(No. 258.)

CONSIDERATION.

As amended, considered.

New Clause—

(Provisions subject to application of Act to Ireland.)

"In the application of this Act to Ireland the following provisions shall take effect:—

(1.) This Act, so far as is consistent with the tenor thereof, shall be read as one with the Fisheries (Ireland) Acts, 1842 to 1891;

(2.) The date "the first day of November," shall be substituted for the date "the third day of September;"

(3.) The powers of opening and detaining packages conferred by this Act shall be exercisable only by officers appointed for that purpose in writing by the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries;

(4.) Proceedings may be taken, in manner provided by this Act, against a person contravening any of its provisions,"—
(Mr. Barton.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I hope the hon. Member will not press this clause. The Bill deals with England only, and he knows that the Fishery Acts for England and Ireland differ and that the close time is different. If it should be desirable to apply such legislation to Ireland it should take the form of a separate Bill.

MR. BARTON (Armagh, Mid): The object the Bill has is one I think very desirable to carry out in Ireland, and the application could very well be made by the clause I suggest. If the hon. Baronet objects, I will not press it, but at the same time I do think the clause meets the case of Ireland, and I do not think there is any reason why it should not be inserted.

MR. SEXTON: The Amendment is of a somewhat complicated character, and I will not attempt to go into its merits, but until we have the advantage of the counsel of Irish members conversant with the subject, I think we had better postpone the Debate.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

ALLOTMENTS PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.—(No. 308.)

Read a second time, and committed.

LAND DRAINAGE PROVISIONAL ORDER (MORTON FEN) BILL.—(No. 314.)

Read a second time, and committed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 4) BILL.—(No. 305.)

Read a second time, and committed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 5) BILL.—(No. 306.)

Read a second time, and committed.

BUILDING LANDS RATING AND PURCHASE BILL.—(No. 244.)

Order for Second Reading [25th May] read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

WATERMEN'S AND LIGHTERMEN'S COMPANY BILL (NO. 144.)

Read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee of Seven Members, Four to be nominated by the House and Three by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bill presented three clear days before the meeting of the Committee be referred to the Committee; that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.—(Mr. Wootton Isaacson.)

MILITARY LANDS CONSOLIDATION BILL.—(No. 184.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [28th March], "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill committed to a Select Committee.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 224.)

Read a second time, and committed for Friday.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAYS BILL.—(No. 50.)

Order for Second Reading to-morrow read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

MOTIONS.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 3) BILL.

On Motion of Sir M. Hicks Beach, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade, under "The General Pier and Harbour Act, 1861," relating to Killala, Stornoway, Sutherland, and Torquay, ordered to be brought in by Sir M. Hicks Beach and Sir J. Gorst.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 335.]

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT (1882) AMENDMENT (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Brunner, Bill to amend "The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brunner, Mr. Neville, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, and Dr. Commins.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 336.]

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 11th May, 1892.

Mr. SPEAKER was in his place shortly after Twelve o'clock, but not until twenty-five minutes before One o'clock, and after attention had been called to the number of Members present, was a quorum found.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT (1882)
AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 35.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(11.40.) MR. MATTINSON (Liverpool, Walton): I had hoped that the good sense and fairness of principle upon which the Bill is founded would have enabled the Second Reading to pass without any opposition. But I find notices of opposition have been given from more than one quarter, and therefore I must say a few words as to the object of the measure and the necessity for it. The object is to amend the Municipal Corporations Act in the direction of removing a difficulty—a serious difficulty I allow, but a senseless difficulty, and one founded on no principle in the way of the re-adjustment of municipal boundaries in cases where such re-adjustment is found to be necessary. I do not know what will be admitted in this Debate; but I think I may assume that it is vital to the principle of popular representation that there should be some approach to equality of voting power in the constituencies, whether in relation to Parliamentary or municipal representation. It follows that there ought to be some practical provision by which the inequalities in the voting power of constituencies which may from time to time arise may be cheaply and expeditiously remedied. It is matter of common knowledge that the centres of population are continually shifting, growing here and declining there; and it is obvious that arrangements for the division of representation which may be perfectly fair in a town to-day may become unfair in ten years' time, and may, indeed, become a scandal, a mockery of popular institutions twenty years later. The House will scarcely credit how imperfect the provision in the present state of the law is in regard to the correction of the difficulties and anomalies that arise. I believe I am right in saying that the original Act of 1835 made no provision at all for dealing with the matter. It provided for the definition of the limits of a borough, and of the wards within the borough, but there it stopped, making no provision for the future revision; and for a considerable period after 1835, in cases where there was necessity for revision, there was no course open to a municipality but to come to Parliament with proposals for private legislation. In 1859, for the first time, Parliament proposed to apply a corrective, and in that year an Act was passed, which I think was substantially re-enacted in the Act of 1882, and constitutes the law which prevails at the present time. The legislation of 1859 and 1882 provides that upon petition the Queen in Council may make an order with regard to the re-arrangement of municipal wards, and subsequently, after local inquiry, issue an Order re-defining the wards. Unfortunately, and as I think probably by inadvertence, a difficulty has been created by the wording of this legislation, and two limitations imposed on the exercise of this power have combined to render the power given to the Queen in Council practically a dead letter. We propose in the Bill to deal with these limitations. Parliament enacted that no petition should be sent to the Queen in Council, unless and until it was signed by two-thirds of the members of the Town Council. That has been construed to mean not two-thirds of the members present on the occasion of passing a resolution for the petition. That meant a considerable clog on the action of a municipality. Worse than that, the view acted upon has been that in order to set the machinery of the Privy Council in motion it is necessary that the petition presented should be subscribed by two-thirds of the total number of persons elected to the Town Council. Now, I think it goes without saying that the effect of such a provision has been to place a great power, a most unreasonable power, in the hands of a minority to prevent the question of a re-adjustment of wards being considered. It is not necessary for those who are determined, rightly or wrongly, to stick to some inequality in the division to take any active steps or incur the odium of public opinion; they have only to remain quiescent and refuse their assent to a petition. That is one and the main difficulties we propose to deal with in this Bill. But there is another difficulty which has grown out of, as I conceive, the unhappy wording of the Acts of 1859 and 1882. As the law stands, it is necessary, if there is any petition to the Privy Council at all, to petition for a change in the number of wards as well as in the boundaries of wards. Now, it often happens that there is local necessity for a change in the limits of a ward; but it rarely happens that there is necessity for changing the number of wards. This is a further difficulty put in the way of those who may desire reform. These are the two limitations which at the present time exist to the power vested in the Privy Council for the correction of anomalies, and I think the mere statement of these limitations should command sympathy with the desire for their removal. But I should like further to point out that not only is legislation in this matter theoretically defective—that appears on the face of it—but this legislation has practically worked in a way most detrimental to free play and free action being given to popular representation in municipal administration. I have here a number of facts compiled and founded on Returns made by Town Clerks in different boroughs. I will not weary the House by going through them all, but I will call attention to a few which I think will satisfy the House that throughout the municipal boroughs of England and Wales there is a vast mass of anomalies and irregularities which call for legislative attention. I find in Birkenhead there is one ward with 423 electors, and another ward quite close to it with 3,456 electors, the voting power in one ward being eight times that of the other. In Brighton there is one ward, the Pavilion Ward, with 849 electors, and the St. Peter's Ward with 4,620; at Manchester a ward with 1,183 as against another with 5,993; and in Newcastle a ward with 869 electors, and another with 3,952, a proportion of five to one. In Sheffield I find there is one ward, Upper Hallam, with 503 electors, and another, Attercliffe, with 5,785—a proportion of ten to one. There is another case at Sheffield, St. Phillips, with 2,794 and Eccleshall with 11,961, each being represented in the Town Council by six members. Leaving these places, I should like to mention to the House the cases of three municipal boroughs, and in regard to which my connections give me some actual knowledge. Take the case of Carlisle. In that city there is one ward called St. Mary's Ward with about 270 electors, while there are two great working-class wards each of which has within a trifle of 3,000, the relation being ten to one. That is one case. Then there is the case of the town of Blackburn. I find here there is one ward, St. Mary's, with 713 voters, and there is the Park Ward with 5,218—a proportion of seven to one. And now I come finally to the case of Liverpool, which does not differ in principle from any one of the cases I have previously mentioned. So far as the principle of the inequality and injustice is concerned, the case of Liverpool is precisely the case of the other towns; but as regards the incidence of the injustice, the case of Liverpool is incomparably stronger. Will the House credit that in the City of Liverpool you have at the present moment this state of things. There is one ward, called Pitt Street, with about 710 electors, which returns three Councillors to the City Council, and you have another ward, Everton Ward, with an electorate of 23,145, which has only exactly the same representation and the same influence in regard to municipal government as the 710 electors of the minute ward of Pitt Street. But that is not all, because the gross and palpable injustice to which I have called the attention of the House runs all through the representation of the city; and it has this broad and general result: In Liverpool there are 74,000 municipal electors, who are divided more or less unequally among 16 wards. Now, there are three wards—Everton, West Derby, and Toxteth—which among them have 44,000 out of the 74,000 electors, and yet those three wards, with that preponderating proportion of electors, only return to the City Councils nine members, while the remaining 30,000 burgesses, divided among 13 wards, return to the City Council 39 Councillors. Submitted in another way the result is this: that four-sevenths of the total electorate of Liverpool do not return one-fifth of the representatives, while three-sevenths return more than four-fifths. That is the case of Liverpool, and I make bold to say that if it stood alone it would constitute a sufficient case for the intervention of this House to correct such a travesty upon the system of popular representation. Let me say before I sit down what we propose in this Bill. We do not propose in any way to interfere with the authority which has finally to determine the question whether there ought to be any re-adjustment of municipal boundaries and what that re-adjustment ought to be; and I hope that fact will be a sufficient answer to the suggestion which has been made, that there is any desire on the part of any of us to jerry-mander the representation of Liverpool. The responsibility of determining whether, in the first place, a case is made out for the change; and, in the second place, the determination of what change—that responsibility we leave where it was before. But the defect of the present system is this: that the authority which has power in the matter has no initiative of its own. The authority can only be set in motion as the result of local intervention, and all that we propose to do by this Bill is to remove the difficulty in the way of that local intervention. We propose to do that in two ways; we propose to apply in this case the sound and wholesome principle which Parliament has generally applied—that the vote of the majority of the elected Town Council shall be sufficient, at any rate, to start the machinery which will enable this matter to be considered by the authority. We propose that a bare majority of the Town Council shall take the place of the existing fantastic suggestion that two-thirds of the whole Council shall be necessary; and, in order to meet the possible case of the failure of a Town Council to do its duty, we propose as an alternative that a certain number of the burgesses in any ward shall themselves have the initiative of sending to the Privy Council a petition to start the proceedings. We propose further, while we are legislating, to get rid of the other difficulty which exists—namely, that if you petition for the re-adjustment of the limit of the municipal boundaries, you must also petition for a change in the number of wards. The law in future, if this Bill obtains sanction, will be that you can either petition for a change in the number of wards, or for a change in the boundaries of the wards, or for both. That is our Bill, and I suggest that its justice and equity are as clear as the extent of the evil it is designed to meet. I notice that there is opposition to this Bill, but I am not going to anticipate anything that may be said in support of that opposition. I have some difficulty, however, in thinking that the opposition can be persistent, because it is the opposition of Radical Members, gentlemen who pose as the champions of popular principles and popular ideas. Therefore, I have difficulty in believing that hon. Gentlemen who, on the platforms of the country pose in that character, are on this May afternoon going to turn reactionaries by doing all in their power to oppose the passage of a Bill founded upon popular principles, and the object of which is to give fair play to the majority in the municipal administration in this country. I do not wish, so far as this opposition may be of a local character, to say more than one word about it, because this Bill is general in its character, and I do not wish to entangle its discussion with the details of any local controversy. I trust, however, the House will note the character of the local opposition to the Bill, and I suggest that the measure of that opposition is the measure of the necessity of this Bill. If the representatives of the minority in a certain city oppose the Bill this afternoon, the House and the country will form its own judgment as to what justice the majority of the ratepayers in that city will receive at their hands. I only wish now to say this final word. I do not believe Parliament will depart from the principle which it has always pursued of refusing to allow special interests to stand in the way of general interests; I do not believe the House will recognise in the case of Liverpool a vested right in injustice and inequality; believe, on the contrary, that this House will accept the Bill on the broad ground that it is a measure the scope of which is general, that it is a measure founded upon the principles which now prevail, and, further, that it is a practical mode of dealing with a practical grievance. This Bill is one which most municipal corporations desire to-day, and which every municipal corporation will want shortly. I beg to move its Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Mattinson.)

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I oppose this Bill in spite of the way in which it has been introduced into this House by my hon. and learned Friend opposite, and in spite, too, of what he has said. I do not hesitate to say that the Bill would be better described by the title: "A Bill to Gerrymander the Wards of the Municipality of Liverpool," than by the title which it holds, and which is innocent enough on the face of it. But the devices of my hon. and learned Friend are not sufficient to conceal the identity of the right hon. Gentleman who sits in front of him, and who stands behind him in regard to this Bill. One thing those with experience of Liverpool are almost certain to recognise is that when there is going forward any political manipulation in the city the right hon. Gentleman will not be far off. With regard to the devices to which my hon. Friend has resorted on the present occasion, the right hon. Gentleman has apparently considered it wise not to identify himself with the measure, probably deeming the other course inconsistent with the dignity of a position in the Privy Council and membership in Her Majesty's Government. But, Sir, notwithstanding that, I think we recognise the master mind behind, for I do say, in the right hon. Gentleman's favour, that he is a past-master in the art of so arranging electoral divisions as to give an undue preponderance of Tory votes to Liverpool. For my part, I trust he will not have an opportunity to exercise his undoubted abilities in that direction with regard to the present division of the Municipality. My first objection to this measure is founded upon the fact that it is a local measure and nothing else; and if the House desires to be convinced upon that point, I do not think I need go further than to point out the names upon the back of this Bill. Without one exception they are those of the Tory Members for the Port of Liverpool, and I think my hon. and learned Friend must have been laughing in his sleeve at us when he disavowed any local intention in regard to this Bill, and suggested that there was a very burning desire for it elsewhere.

MR. MATTINSON: I did not disavow any local intention. This Bill will correct injustice in Liverpool; but it will go far beyond that, and correct injustice all over the country.

MR. NEVILLE: I am glad there is no difference of opinion between us on that ground. It is a Bill the object of which is to deal with alleged injustice in Liverpool.

MR. MATTINSON: One of the objects.

MR. NEVILLE: It may have the effect of removing injustice outside Liverpool, but that has nothing to do with the origin and support of the Bill. Now it seems to me that it would be setting up a very bad precedent to introduce a measure altering the general law of the country in order to meet an alleged injustice in one particular case, and to enforce that argument I think I need not do more than point to the state of the Benches opposite on this occasion. Here is a Bill which, as I think I shall be able to show, proposes an alteration of a very serious nature in the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882, by which the Municipalities throughout the country are regulated. It is supported, in the first instance at all events, by the representative of a particular borough, but little or no interest is taken in it throughout the country. I do not believe half-a-dozen Municipalities are aware of its existence, and I therefore ask the House to pause and consider very carefully the nature of the proposed change before voting for the Second Reading of this Bill. I feel sure that hon. Members on both sides will admit that the general principle I have stated—namely, that there should not be an alteration of the general law of the land in order to meet a particular case of injustice—is a right principle, and ought not to be departed from except where a very strong case of injustice is made out. Well, I propose to show that there is nothing in the case of Liverpool which can justify hon. Members opposite in asking for an alteration in the general law to meet it. In the course of my remarks on that city I shall have to speak of the conflicting interests between Liberal and Tory there. No doubt some persons will say that Party politics ought not to obtain at all in municipal government. (Hear, hear.) I am surprised that a Member of this House should commit himself to such an opinion, because I think anyone who has only a superficial acquaintance with municipal government in large cities must recognise that there is no other reasonable system upon which it can be carried on. So long as Party Government is conducted on the principle of division into two broad lines, whether you call them Liberal or Tory, Progressive or Moderate, I do not care—but so long as that method obtains, I believe you have the most satisfactory system human ingenuity has yet devised for carrying on the government of a free country or city. Therefore, Sir, I do not think I owe any apology to the House for speaking of the Liberal or Tory cause in connection with the municipal affairs of a city like Liverpool. Undoubtedly there is practically the same line of cleavage between Tory and Liberal in municipal matters as in Imperial affairs, and politics generally. I have no doubt that in 99 cases out of every 100 the habit of mind which leads a man to declare himself Liberal or Radical in regard to Imperial affairs will place him on the same side in municipal affairs. With that preface, let me call the attention of the House to the municipal history of Liverpool, extending over nearly 50 years. During the whole of that period that city has been under the absolute domination of the Tory Party. At the present time, however, very strong indications are apparent of a weariness of this Tory domination, and Tory seats have been lost year after year in the municipal elections. It is not unreasonable that there should be these strong indications of a desire for a change on the part of the citizens of Liverpool, because, despite a magnificent corporate estate, they find themselves burdened with heavy taxation and the town swarming with public-houses, a state of things for which they have to thank those who have had the regulation of their city for the past 50 years. At all events, whether they are right or wrong, the people of Liverpool are evincing a desire to see if the other side cannot do something better for them, and I do not hesitate to say, Hence this Bill. What is the present position of municipal affairs in that city? Of the elected Councillors there are 28 on the Liberal side, and 20 on the Tory side; but then there are 16 Aldermen, every one of whom is a Tory. Upon the termination of the present Council eight of these Aldermen will have to retire, and of course eight will have to be elected in their place. Should the Liberals gain at the next municipal election one seat, they will then have an actual majority in the Council, as they now have a majority of elected Councillors. It is obvious if that programme is carried out, as the Tories in Liverpool fear, there will be at all events a temporary end to their long ascendancy, and it is with the view of meeting that difficulty by what they call a re-arrangement of the wards that this Bill is introduced. For my own part I do not think it is a fair device for the purposes they have in view. I do not object to a good fight, and I hope when I get a defeat I can bear it well. But I like to fight fairly, and I think in this case the Tories have not kept to the rules of the game. And, Sir, I am fortified in this view by this reason—the anomalies which my hon. and learned Friend has pointed out have existed for a considerable number of years, and are anomalies which exist in a greater or less degree all over the country, both in Parliamentary Divisions and in the wards of Municipalities, because at the present time the principle of equal electoral divisions has never been accepted in this House. This is a question which when it is dealt with should be dealt with as a whole, and not as it affects one particular locality. Curiously enough, just twelve years ago the Tories in Liverpool found themselves in a position almost identical with that which they occupy to-day. They discovered that if they lost one more seat at the municipal elections, the Liberals would have an absolute majority and have the management of the city in their hands. Thereupon the injustice of the distribution of the wards immediately struck the Tory mind. It had existed before, but it had suited their purposes, and it was only on the memorable occasion I have referred to that the injustice of the existing state of things flashed upon them. An agitation was begun, and steps were taken to introduce a Bill on the same lines as the present one. Well, Sir, that scheme never took final and definite shape, because in the interim a better device occurred to the Tory mind, which had the desired result without putting that Party to the inconvenience and danger of an alteration of a system which, on the whole, had worked so much in their favour. I think I am not wrong in saying that the Gentleman who discovered the device is the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forwood). At all events, he always obtained the credit for it, and it was considered another evidence of his astuteness in municipal matters. Now, the device was this. There were a great many Tory voters who had duplicate and triplicate qualifications, giving them the right to vote in different wards in the borough. Of course, such a course was contrary to the whole spirit of the Municipal Corporations Act, but that was immaterial. The brilliant idea was to send a circular round to these persons, inviting them to poll early and often. This invitation was readily accepted, with the result that the dreaded catastrophe was averted. Instead of losing a seat, the Tories gained several. Well, it may be said, "What advantage could accrue from that? Obviously, it was a flagrant breach of the law, and could not pass unnoticed, and upon a petition being presented the matter could be set right." Yes, but observe the extraordinary astuteness of the scheme. You cannot petition in a moment, and owing to the faulty condition of the law, as soon as Councillors are elected they are entitled to vote for the election of Aldermen. Consequently those gentlemen who had obtained their seats by the exercise of the duplicate and triplicate franchise on the part of their Tory supporters turned up on the 9th of November and enabled the Tory Party to select eight Aldermen of their own political colour. A petition was in due course presented, and a Commissioner was sent down to try the case, and I am sorry to say he had to describe this Tory device as a fraudulent one, and several of those elected Councillors were unseated. But that did not matter, because eight Tory Aldermen had been elected who could not be turned out, and so the Tories were left in possession of their ascendancy for another 12 years. Now, I am sure hon. Members will not be surprised when I tell them that with the success of this device the anxiety of the Tories for a re-arrangement of the wards began to cool and gradually faded away, and it was not until the same position of affairs again began to stare them in the face that they bethought themselves of bringing in this Bill. In answer to my hon. Friend who suggested that I should find a difficulty in opposing this Bill, because, in effect, it provides for the right of popular representation, I would point out that its great defect is that it takes away from popular representation that power which is intended to be given, and is given, by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882. My hon. Friend spoke of the extraordinary provision of a two-thirds majority. I wonder, in reading that Act, it did not strike him why that two-thirds majority is required. It is tolerably easy to see the reason. The Municipal Corporations Act provides that one-third of the Corporation shall consist of Aldermen, and consequently the effect of the two-thirds regulation is this—that you can petition for a re-constitution of the wards when—and only when—you get a majority of the elected Councillors ; and it was with the very object of giving the wards themselves a voice in saying whether there should be a re-constitution of them that this provision as to a two-thirds majority was inserted. The effect of my hon. Friend's Bill will be to transfer the power from the hands of the elected Councillors to the hands of the Aldermen, and on that ground I say that every man who believes in Local Government being conducted by the representation of the people themselves ought to support me, and resist the Second Reading of this Bill. Now, my hon. Friends opposite know quite well that the Liberals in Liverpool have from time to time suggested an alteration in the size and distribution of the wards. But it is not on the question of whether it may be right or wrong to re-arrange the wards that I base my present opposition to this Bill. This is only part of a larger question, and cannot be fairly touched without entering upon other matters germane to it, including the present incidence of the rates and the power of the Aldermen to vote for their own election. I say this is part of a larger question, and you cannot enter upon it without entering upon those that are germane to it; and while we are perfectly ready to have taken into consideration at one and the same time the incidence of the rates, the power of the Aldermen, and the distribution of the wards, hon. Gentlemen on the other side wish to deal only with the re-distribution of the wards when it serves their purpose, and to relegate to the future or to perpetual limbo the other questions. I will refer to a Report which was made by a Sub-Committee of the Council appointed for the purpose of considering the re-distribution of the wards at the time the Tories were in power and Tory Members formed a large part of the Committee. The Report says—

“Inasmuch as no re-arrangement of the wards can, in the opinion of this Committee, be accomplished without manifest injustice to the ratepayers in the absence of special provision for securing an equitable adjustment of the rates, having regard to the rateable value, indebtedness, and other incidents in the parish wards and on the townships respectively, it be reported to the Council that no re-arrangement can be satisfactory without securing adequate protection of the rating interests in the parish wards and on the townships respectively.”

So that here you have in the year 1883 a declaration by a Sub-Committee of the Council that the proposal which my hon. Friend places before the House to-day is one which cannot justly be carried out without reference to the incidence of rating in the borough. I ask the hon. Member how he proposes to deal with this question? Why is there in this Bill no provision for the re-distribution of the incidence of rating in the borough of Liverpool when a Committee of his own Council, whose Report I have read, say that one proposal without the other would be unjust and unsatisfactory? How is it that what was unjust and unsatisfactory to the Tory mind in 1883 is now in 1892 just and satisfactory? I think I have sufficiently indicated what is the ground of the support of the present Bill. Let it be remembered that this is not a mere struggle between two Parties in Liverpool. That the existence of that struggle was the occasion of the Bill nobody can deny, but it is a Bill which proposes to deal with every Municipality in the country ; and I ask, are hon. Members prepared, having regard to the tendency of popular opinion, to transfer the power from the elected Councillors of a Municipality to the Aldermen? That is what this Bill does in fact. It takes away from the elected Councillors the right to say aye or no whether some such petition as is referred to shall be presented, and vests it in the Aldermen, so that the Aldermen, backed by a very small proportion of elected Councillors, can present a petition and embark on an attempt to jerrymander the wards wherever they think it would be to their advantage. It is perfectly idle to suppose that an inquiry of this kind does not open the door to jerrymandering, and it is impossible to suppose that astute politicians would not take advantage of it. Can we have a clearer example than in the re-distribution of seats at Liverpool, with respect to which the hon. Member is entitled to full credit for the service he did his Party? The borough of Liverpool used to return two Tories and one Liberal, the Tory representation being in the proportion of two to one. The majority was not a large one, and so near, indeed, were the Parties in strength, that I believe I am right in saying that on a poll of something like 40,000 the majority would be 2,000 or 3,000. I dare say also the House remembers that at the last bye-election, before the re-distribution, Liverpool showed an actual Liberal majority and returned a Liberal Member. This shows at least that the Tory majority was very small. Now, under the re-distribution, the Tories get seven of the seats and the Liberals two. That is not a fair re-arrangement; and the Liberals fear that if the re-arrangement of the wards is left in the same skilful hands, the same disastrous results will follow if the present Bill finds favour with the House and existing Corporations are empowered to re-distribute the wards to suit their own purposes. The whole object of this Bill is that it should become law before the next 9th of November; because if it does not it will fall to the ground. Is it a right thing to give to every existing Corporation in the country the power to try before the next 9th of November, if they can so gerrymander their wards as to give them a majority which they would not otherwise have? Such a course would be most unjust. This matter was not before the ratepayers last 9th of November, and the present Corporations have not been returned with a view to the re-distribution of the wards in any way, and consequently you will have a Corporation who are moribund, who are in the last phase of their existence, attempting to secure their return to power by a re-arrangement of the wards which has not been submitted to the people to whom they are responsible, and upon which they would have no possible opportunity of consulting the people. I think it would be a monstrous thing, and the effect of this Bill would be that every expiring Corporation would be in a position to gerrymander. That seems to me to be an argument of very great weight against the Second Reading of this Bill. We ought to know more about the views of the Municipalities themselves. If this were not unjust with regard to Liverpool, as I think it is, it might well be unjust in the case of other Corporations, and yet we are asked to blindly rush in and alter what has been the law of the land for the last ten years without knowing the view of a large number of the Municipalities. It is quite true there are anomalies, but I would ask the House to bear in mind that this question is of much larger import than is suggested by the present Bill. In Liverpool the question of re-distribution cannot be attempted alone without the danger of doing injustice in respect to the incidence of rating, and yet there is no provision for anything of the kind in the Bill, and I hope the House will consider what they are asked to do in reading this Bill a second time. It has been suggested in the newspapers that my hon. Friend is to have the support and assistance of the Government in this matter. I do not pretend myself to know the views of the Government, and I hope, in common with others, before many weeks are over I shall have an opportunity of giving my views with regard to the action of the Government during the last six years. But I do not think so badly of the Government as all that, and I think my hon. Friend (Mr. Mattinson) must be reckoning without his host when he says he is going to have their assistance in this matter. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forwood) and the Liverpool members will go into the same lobby, but that is a very different thing from obtaining the support of the Government. I venture to think the Government must know their ground in the country very little if they give their support to such a practice as this, for in spite of the sobriety with which my hon. Friend introduced this measure, and in spite of his appeals to us to remedy this injustice of which no one complains, and in spite of the wonderful case which has been dug out and which has been supported by hon. Gentlemen opposite to the best of their ability, I say it is perfectly obvious to the House that this is a proposal that excites very little interest in the country outside the particular borough of Liverpool. I feel sure that the Government will never lend themselves to an alteration of the law in a case of this kind. I almost think from a Parliamentary point of view I should be glad if I were to discover that I have formed too good an opinion of the Government, and that they supported my hon. Friend and took up this measure, because I think that, so far as Liverpool is concerned, they could not do anything which would render them more unpopular. We shall very soon know what the views of Liverpool are, and I am ready to consult my constituents to-morrow, if right hon. Gentlemen opposite will give me the opportunity. If hon. Gentlemen opposite imagine that the Government is going to weaken its popularity by going out of the proper course to interfere in a local dispute, and to allow the general law to be altered to deal with a particular case which their supporters declare is adverse to them, I believe they are mistaken; but if they are not mistaken, then I say that not only in Liverpool but throughout the country there will be a very strong feeling that to serve a party end they have taken a course which is unworthy of Her Majesty's Government, and have embarked upon a scheme to which they ought not to have lent themselves. I move, Sir, that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

(1.45.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): As one who takes a deep interest in municipal prosperity, I desire to say a few words in seconding the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Neville). We were told by the Mover about the sacred rights of majorities, and we were told something about the majority of the ratepayers of Liverpool; but now we have learned from my hon. Friend, who knows all about it, that the majority is on the other side. Here are the plain facts. We are told that there is a majority of eight amongst the Councillors on the Liberal side, and out of 75,890 burgesses there voted last November for the Tories 24,097 and on the other side 22,796, which gave a majority of 1,301. In 1890 the Liberals polled a majority against the Tories. Of the twelve wards within the old city boundary, eleven return Liberals, and in eight of these wards all the Councillors are Liberals, and the majority of the Council is Liberal. This proposal goes to the root of popular rights and proposes to set up the rule of Aldermen, which has been found to be an intolerable yoke: This Bill is intended to fasten that yoke in a still more painful manner, not only upon Liverpool, but upon every other town in the country, whose voices we have not heard. This is really more in the nature of a Private Bill. Not only do the names on the back show that it refers to Liverpool alone; but look at the present condition of this House—the Members for Liverpool are about one-quarter of the Members present. Where are the representatives of Birmingham, Manchester, and the great towns of the country? The fact is those gentlemen have not given the slightest attention to this matter. They do not look upon it as Public Business; they regard it simply as a Party measure for gerrymandering the Liverpool wards. The hon. and learned Member for the Walton Division (Mr. Mattinson) alluded to a considerable number of towns in which the wards are very unevenly arranged and with some very unequal numbers of voters, and he referred amongst others to Birkenhead. What is to hinder Birkenhead at the present time applying to have the wards re-arranged? They say it requires a two-thirds majority. At Birkenhead the Tories have a two-thirds majority. I do not know whether the majority is not even larger than that. If they want the wards re-arranged they can have it done by presenting a petition, and so it is in the case of Liverpool. They have rejoiced in years past in a two-thirds majority on the Council, with the Aldermen; but they never thought of proceeding with the re-arrangement of the wards, and it is only when their majority is in danger that the idea occurs to them. It is drawing too largely upon the credulity of this House to represent this as a great public measure for the emancipation of majorities and the assertion of their rights. I do not think I need add any facts to those that have been advanced by my hon. Friend (Mr. Neville). I rather wish to say a word or two from my own experience in support of the view that if any city in the country ought to have such a Bill Liverpool is the last city which ought to have it.

of returning nine members to the City Council. If wards containing 55,000 electors return seven members—Tory members—while 19,000 electors were able to return nine Radical members, is it to be wondered at that the hon. and learned Member wants to continue this unjust system, wants to build up a nominal Radical majority in that Council Chamber by retaining the jerrymantering of the wards as they stand to-day? The hon. and learned Gentleman, no doubt, could not be expected to have had in his own personal knowledge the information which he has vouchsafed to the House; and he has had to rely upon others. I strongly advise him not to rely upon the same informants at any future time he wishes to address the House, if he desires to adhere to the facts of the case. He went into the history of this matter as regards Liverpool. He said the Tory members of the Council of Liverpool saw their position twelve years ago, and then, with a subtle argument worthy of the Court in which he practises, he associated this with a certain circular that was issued by the Conservative Party, as to the advice to be given to the duplicate voters. But he went on to say that although the Conservative Council saw this twelve years ago, they had taken no action in the meantime. He said nothing was done for twelve years, for the Tories had no wish to change. But in the following sentence the hon. and learned Gentleman said the question had been considered again and again. So it has. Almost year in and year out has this matter been brought before the Council of Liverpool; but the Liberal members of the Council, as a minority, have prevented justice being done to the large districts having their due measure of representation—the Liberals of the town, acting under a peculiar clause at present in the Act, obstruct and prevent anything being done to remedy this injustice. In passing, I may say that the hon. and learned Member brought forward the question of the so-called fraudulent advice of the circular issued to the duplicate voters, and which said—"Vote early, and vote often." He characterised this—and as a lawyer, no doubt, he thought it just and right to do so—as a flagrant breach of the law, which was as well known to the Liberals as to the Tories. Well, it may be a surprise to the House to know that if it was a flagrant breach of the law, which was as well known to the Liberals as to the Tories, that they issued a very similar circular to this six months before the circular was issued by the Conservatives. And they did not issue it in a tentative form, but they issued it in an absolute form, because it told the duplicate voters to vote in every ward in which they were qualified. It is a fact that the first of these circulars, which the hon. and learned Gentleman says the Liberals knew to be a breach of the law, came from the friends of the hon. and learned Member who has just moved the rejection of this Bill.

MR. NEVILLE: I never heard of it before.

*MR. FORWOOD: The hon. and learned Member says he never heard of it before. I do not wonder at that. I think it was a little before he had the honour of representing a division of Liverpool; and I can well understand that his friends in Liverpool would not be likely to call his attention to that appeal. But if he wishes I can, at an early date, furnish him with a copy of the circular.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Will the right hon. Gentleman furnish me with a copy of the other circular? ("Order, order!")

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Mr. O'Connor.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman furnish me with a copy of the other circular issued at the same time by the Conservative Association which contained a demand by a number of Conservative candidates with a note that unless the electors voted as described in that paper the votes would be lost?

*MR. FORWOOD: Certainly I will furnish the hon. Member with a copy of the circular issued by the Conservatives which the hon. and learned Member for the Exchange Division said contained fraudulent advice, and also with a copy of the circular previously issued by the Liberals to which I have referred.

MR. NEVILLE: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon—I did not call the advice contained in the circular fraudulent advice. I said that the Commission had called it fraudulent advice.

*MR. FORWOOD: Another reason which the hon. Member, speaking on this Bill, urged was that Liverpool had been misgoverned for the last fifty years under Tory administration. Well, if the prosperity, the growth, and the progress of Liverpool in its trade, in its commerce, in the health and welfare of the inhabitants—if the happy change that has occurred in these fifty years is to be called misgovernment, I hope we may have the same misgovernment in every town in the country. He went on in his argument to say that Liverpool is full of public-houses, and that it was indebted for that to Tory municipal management. Again he has been misinstructed. The Radical brother of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, 20 or 25 years ago, using the great and just influence which he possessed on the Bench of Liverpool, instituted what I may call the free trade in licences. That is, that every responsible man who had a house that was fit for licensing should have a licence, irrespective of the number of those adjacent, or irrespective of the wants of the neighbourhood. In consequence of the Radical magisterial influence—and not of the influence of the Town Council—Liverpool was afflicted with something like 2,800 public-houses; and although the population has increased 30 per cent. since that time, the houses have been materially reduced by the action of the Tory majority on the Bench, till I think they to-day have fallen to 2,000. Another instruction of the hon. and learned Gentleman was evidently wrong. He suggested to the House that this attempt to alter the arrangement of the wards of Liverpool was being done without any regard having been paid to the incidence of taxation—in other words, that a majority of the ratepayers, if they were duly represented, on the Municipal Council, might perform the operation of practically robbing, or making other ratepayers not liable pay a proportion of their burdens. Now, under the constitution of the Liverpool Corporation that is impossible. Under the Act 16 Victoria, chapter 127, the Corporation of Liverpool are distinctly and clearly directed as to how the rates of the town are to be collected. Liverpool is divided into four or five separate rating districts. That Act of Victoria, chapter 127, enacts that the work done in these several rating districts must continue to be levied upon each of the several rating districts until the work is completed; and it would not be in the power of the Corporation, however constituted, to affect the question of the rates to be levied in any ward or district one iota.

MR. NEVILLE: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to misrepresent the argument that I addressed to the House. I did not suggest that one section of the Council would endeavour to override the law; but I referred to the Report of the Committee appointed to consider the question of the redistribution of the wards, and it declared that no such redistribution would be just unless there was a re-adjustment of rating.

*MR. FORWOOD: Yes, the Report of the Committee to which the hon. and learned Gentleman refers was carried by a Radical majority, and it is not a Tory Report.

MR. NEVILLE: I think the right hon. Gentleman will find that there were eight Liberals and eight Tories on the Committee.

*MR. FORWOOD: But not eight Tories when the Report was agreed to. I will, however, come to much more modern history. As late as November, 1891, a special meeting of the Council of Liverpool was called for the purpose of endeavouring to get the necessary 42 signatures to a Petition to Her Majesty in Council to re-arrange the wards of the city. That Petition was opposed by the hon. Member's friends, the Liberal and Home Rule Party in the Liverpool Council. But there was not a word as to the incidence of the rates. What they said was this—that “Whilst recognising the inequalities now existing in the wards and in the city, and the desirability of a juster representation, we resolve”—not that the rates are unfairly levied, but—“that the consideration of the subject be postponed until the Aldermen of the city are prohibited by law from voting in the election of Aldermen."

And yet he comes here and says that the Liberal Party oppose this because of something which has to do with the incidence of the rates. Nothing of the sort. They endeavour to continue in the hands of the minority of the town the practical majority of the Council. Another argument of the hon. and learned Member was that this Bill would transfer the power as regards the alteration of the boundaries of the wards from the elective Council to the Aldermen. The Bill will give to the majority of the Council elected and Aldermen, whoever they may be, the right to petition to remedy this wrong. The hon. and learned Member has endeavoured to prove to the House that next November the Party whom he represents will be in a majority in the Council Chamber of Liverpool, and that, being in the majority, they will be able to elect a certain proportion of Aldermen. Very well, if he is right in his assumption, the Aldermen who will have the power—as at present—to take part in the question of any petition will be those whom the majority, or Liberals, may choose; but it is not in the power of the Aldermen or in the power of the Councillors of Liverpool to make this alteration. It would not have been in the power of this House, had the small pocket boroughs of this country five years ago been in a majority of the House, to proceed with the re-distribution of the seats in this country. It is not natural that a member for a small ward or small district should fly in the face of his constituents, and vote for its practical extinction or absorption in any neighbouring constituency. That is the point which is raised in the Bill proposed by my hon. and learned Friend. The present Act requires two-thirds of the Council to concur. To get that two-thirds of the Council you will require some of those who represent the small wards of the town to do what the Japanese know as the "happy dispatch"—to do away with themselves, to extinguish their wards, or to amalgamate and to create a new state of things in their place. It is not at all likely—human nature being what it is—that gentlemen representing these small constituencies will concur in a vote that will extinguish themselves and their constituencies. Then another argument used to make this a local instead of an Imperial question is, that the basis and purport of this Bill is that action may be taken under it before the 9th November, and a re-arrangement of the wards carried out so that the elections in November next may take place under the new condition of things. Now, I venture to say that if the hon. Member had reflected for one moment upon what he said, from his legal knowledge he would have known that it was perfectly impossible for that to take place. He must know that the date for fixing those who are in residence and entitled to vote is the 20th June, and that it is physically and practically impossible for this Bill to become law and for a Commissioner to be sent down by the Home Office to inquire into the existing state of things before the 20th June, so that the elections that take in November, whatever may be the result of this Bill, must be taken upon the present register and upon the present division of the wards. If his friends are to have a majority of Aldermen they will obtain that majority whether this Bill is passed or not. The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) alluded to what he called the party bitterness and intolerance existing in Liverpool, and said there was now the unjustifiable rule of the minority. Yes, Sir, that is so, and the object of the Bill is to give the majority their just rights. I will give in a moment or two some figures showing the position in which the minority is placed; but I have already stated that 55,000 people in Liverpool last November had to succumb to the votes of 20,000. Now, the hon. Member talked about intolerance in Liverpool as regards the election of Aldermen, and about the large spirit evinced by the Radicals of Leicester, holding Liverpool up to scorn compared with the town which he represents. I am informed—the hon. Member will correct me if I am wrong—that all the Aldermen in Leicester, where there is a majority of Liberals, are Radicals. I am told that the same prevails at Leeds, at Nottingham, and in other towns of the country. I am not here to justify that condition of matters. If you ask my own opinion, I think the county principle is the right one—that Aldermen should not vote for Aldermen; and I have proposed that in the Liverpool Council. That Council has unanimously petitioned this House to assimilate the law with regard to boroughs and counties in that respect. I believe Liverpool is the one town in the country that has a monopoly of Tory Aldermen. All other towns in the country have a monopoly of Liberal Aldermen; and before hon. Members support such a proposal as that Aldermen shall not vote for Aldermen in boroughs I recommend them to communicate with their friends in the number of boroughs who apply the principle of electing none but Liberal Aldermen. My hon. and learned Friend who introduced this Bill gave the House some interesting and startling figures. He did not give all that he could have done, and I hope the House will bear with me while I place one or two other facts before them. The position of Liverpool is not an isolated case. It is to be found in other parts of the country than those named by my hon. Friend. Blackburn has one ward with only 713 electors, and in another ward it has 5,218 electors, and I may say that that state of things continues, although I think all the Aldermen are Radicals. Bristol has in one ward 1,900 electors with six members, whilst it only allots three members to 3,700 electors in another ward. Huddersfield gives six members to 1,500 electors in one ward, and only allows the same number of members to another ward with 2,200 electors. Leicester—and I regret that my hon. Friend who represents that constituency is not in the House—has one ward with 585 electors and another with 6,500 electors. But they are promoting a Private Bill in this House to alter their boundaries and to re-arrange their wards. The conclusion I draw from that is that they have not found the present Act as regards the alteration of the wards satisfactory, and so they have proceeded by this Private Bill. If that Bill becomes law it may assist them in Leicester to remove such a great inequality. I am told by an hon. Friend who sits behind me (Mr. Hornby) that I am wrongly informed with regard to the Aldermen in Blackburn, and I want at once to correct that. I express my regret for having given the House any wrong information; but I ought to have said the town of Burnley has ten Radical Aldermen and two Conservative Aldermen. Northampton is in a similar state to Leicester. Norwich is even more remarkable, with one ward of 400 electors and another with 6,500 electors. Salford has six members for 2,500 electors, and it has only three members in another ward with 4,200 electors. The place which my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Home Department so worthily represents gives six members to 2,800 electors, while it only grants three members to 5,875 electors. I say that that is an altogether wrong, improper and unjust representation of the people, and that it prevails so generally as to justify the introduction of a Bill which will enable it to be considerably modified. I would like, with the permission of the House, just to follow my hon. Friend into one or two other figures as regards Liverpool. He has told the House that in one ward there are 23,000 electors. Its rateable value is £598,000; it contains 82 miles of streets, and yet has only three Councillors. On the other hand, the smallest ward contains only 700 electors. Its rateable value is only £98,000, and it has only an area of 400 acres, and yet it has the same number of representatives as the enormously large district of Everton, with 1,300 acres. When the Municipal Bill of 1835 was passed, what was the state of these two places? The electorate was then 500, whilst it is now 23,000, whereas the small ward of which I have spoken had then 500 electors, and it has now only 700. These may be extreme cases. I will now refer to the five wards which have between them no less than 55,500 electors, but which return only 15 members to the Town Council. The remaining eleven wards have only 17,000 electors, and yet they have the privilege of returning 33 members to the Corporation. The object of dividing the town into wards is to create a personal interest in the districts represented on the Council. If a body of 48 gentlemen were got together indiscriminate'y to rule a town, and to look after its welfare, the ratepayers would not have the same opportunity of approaching the Council, and of getting their special interests attended to as well as if they had their own district representatives, to whom they could go with their grievances. The five wards I refer to, which have only 15 Councillors, cover an area of 3,900 acres, whilst the eleven wards which have the advantage of being represented by 33 Councillors cover the comparatively small area of 1,350 acres. The five wards include no less than 200 miles of streets, whilst the eleven wards include only about 75. If there was ever a question which distinctly affected the interests of the working classes it is this question. It is said frequently, I know, that you must have regard to rateable value as well as to population in the division of wards, and that the Act of Parliament requires the Commissioners who may be sent to the town to have regard to rateable value. I am not sure it is the right principle, but it is in the Act, and it is to be carried out. In our large provincial towns, the rich, prosperous people fly to the suburbs as soon as their day's work is over. They remain for as few hours as they possibly can in their shops or their counting-houses, and they take comparatively little interest in the condition of the people. But it is far different with the working classes. They must remain near their work the whole day, and sleep there. They can never see the green fields or the country, and it is for such that you should have regard. The heaviest death rate is not to be found among the shopkeepers and traders, but in the homes of the poorer classes, and it is, therefore, most essential that the latter should have proper and just representation on the Town Council. In the five wards I have referred to, the average assessment of each elector is only equal to £26 a year, whilst in the eleven aristocratic wards in which the bankers and the shipowners live, the average is £94 per annum. The hon. and learned Member for the Exchange Division and the hon. Member for Leicester have come down to the House to-day and said, "Perpetuate this gross injustice; take away the just rights of the working classes, and continue to favour the rich men who do not live in the district." In the eleven wards which I have mentioned the number of electors is decreasing. In the last 20 years the population of those wards has decreased not less than 20 per cent, whilst in the five wards it has almost doubled in the same period. The growth of the population in Liverpool can only go on in the large wards, which are practically disfranchised. We have heard a good deal in this House about "One Man, One Vote," but when we come to put it to the test we see what the meaning of it is. When the same power is given to one Radical voter in one district in Liverpool which is given to 32 voters in another district there is a desire to perpetuate it, because it is in the interests of that Party. This is the practical manner in which this question is being dealt with; but I am satisfied that the House will not stultify itself by saying to the great working classes who are compelled to live within the district in which they work, "We will continue to give you this inadequate and unfair and unjust representation." I hope the House will deal with this question as it was intended it should be dealt with—that is, as a great National and Imperial question—and that it will give a Second Reading to this Bill.

(3.1.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I was very much interested in the observations of the hon. and learned Member who moved this Bill. I have always had great respect for his abilities, but I must say that he astonished me by his speech to-day, and the manner in which he was able to keep his countenance. He actually claimed that he and the Party to which he belonged were the Party of Reformers, and that we on this side are the Party of Reactionaries. He also put himself forward as a champion, above all things in the world, of popular rights and respect for the will of the majority of the people. But the speech of the hon. and learned Member was even surpassed by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. In the cities of America they have an institution which is known as the "boss." The boss is a person who by various means is able to get control over a large number of votes, and with the aid of these votes he becomes patron of the city which they control. The "boss," I am sorry to say, has in this case just left the House, but he will no doubt return. One of the chief directions in which this control in America is used is for the utilisation of the patronage of the city for political purposes. Now I charge it against the Tory Party in Liverpool that they have abused their municipal patronage for nearly half a century for political purposes; and I charge it against the right hon. Gentleman who is really sponsor for this Bill—for the four Gentlemen whose names are on the back of it are merely puppets put in motion by the experienced wire-pullers behind—I charge it against the right hon. Gentleman that he has been the pillar and the mainstay of the utilisation of municipal patronage for political purposes in Liverpool. Well, the people of Liverpool have borne this state of things for nearly half a century. They have had bad government—and I should have been very glad if the whole question of the government of Liverpool could have been brought before the attention of the country as an object lesson of what Tory domination means. Under the specious pretext of defending the rights of the people of Liverpool, an attempt is being made to keep up the system of corrupt jobbery which has been in existence for the last half of a century. What has been the history of this question? The people of Liverpool have allowed their property to be used or misused for political purposes; but there is going to be a majority—there is now already a majority of Liberal members. If the Liberals act half as badly as the Tories they will make Liverpool a name of reproach all over the country. The right hon. Gentleman has pointed out that there are anomalies in many other parts of the country. He has given a formidable list of cases, but why are not those Municipalities represented on the back of this Bill? This Bill will make a change not only in respect to Liverpool, but it will make a revolutionary change with regard to the Municipal laws in the whole of the Municipalities of the country, and yet it is backed by the Representatives of only one Municipality, and of them by only four out of nine. Two of the Members are also in direct and violent opposition to the Bill—a hostility which will continue to the end. I am astonished we should be asked to make such a vast and universal change throughout the country on the demand of only four Representatives of one Municipality. There is another thing to which I wish to call attention. This is a general proposal, and yet it is a particular one. It is general because it applies to all England. It is particular because it excludes Ireland. I ask why the Municipalities of Ireland are excluded?

MR. MATTINSON: They could not be included in it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: It would have been easy to have put a clause into the Bill which would have brought the Municipalities of Ireland under its control. Of course I know that the hon. Member is bound by the title, but he could have given it any title he pleased. Then why exclude Ireland from it? Only this very year we endeavoured to get a clause introduced into a Bill which would have given 70,000 people in Belfast some right to representation, but the whole of the Party opposite voted against it, and the citizens of Belfast were, by a system of chicanery and jerrymandering, deprived of it. Yet those are the gentlemen who are now setting up as the advocates of popular rights, as reformers, and as the opponents of the miserable reactionists on this side of the House. They are not thinking of reform, or of the rights of the people, but of preserving the buttresses of Tory corruption and Tory domination. I say that if we were to take our political tactics from the right hon. Gentleman we should give no fair play to our political opponents at all. There would be very few devices from which we should shrink. The right hon. Gentleman has had the courage to refer to the fraudulent device of a body to which he belongs, and of which he was Chairman at the time, and in his resentment he endeavours to fasten its application on the hon. Member for the Exchange Division. Now the right hon. Gentleman knew that the term was not originated by my hon. and learned Friend, but that it was applied to the action of the organisation of which he (Mr. Forwood) was Chairman by the Royal Commissioner, who, I believe, is, or was, also a member of the same political persuasion as the right hon. Gentleman. By a fraudulent device a number of men were elected to the Council in Liverpool; by a fraudulent device a majority was created, and the majority so created fraudulently utilised the occasion for the election of Tory officers. The majority by which those Aldermen were elected was proved to be fraudulent, but did a single Tory Alderman resign his seat? Not one! Some of them, I believe, retain their seats to this day. These are the Gentlemen who now come forward to speak in respect to the will and wishes of the people. We are all aware of the object of this Bill. The Tories have now a majority of Aldermen on the City Council, and they suspect that when the next election has decided in favour of a Liberal majority, that majority may take advantage—as it has a right to do—of its position and alter the proportion. And the hon. and learned Gentleman talks about respecting the will of the people. That will be declared next November. (“No!”) Well, I have never heard any record of Members of the Party opposite holding the City Council to be unrepresentative of the people of Liverpool so long as the majority was Tory; but the moment the majority ceases to be Tory the representative character of the Council disappears, and it becomes a miserable body, not reflecting public opinion. I make an offer to the right hon. Gentleman. If he will allow the Aldermen to be excluded from this question, then we will be willing to consider the question of the re-distribution of the wards. When the next election comes what will be the position? This—that the Tories by the Aldermen will be able to vote down the elected Representatives of the Municipality. They want to pass a Bill which will enable them to cheat the people of their rights. Why do they want to do it now? This Parliament is moribund, the Municipal Council in Liverpool is in the same state, and they come forward at this period in order that the interval between this date and November may be utilised in jerrymandering the City of Liverpool in the Tory interest. The right hon. Gentleman made one point creditable to his astuteness. He said it is not the Aldermen or the City Council who will have the right to fix the boundaries of these wards, but he must deem us very simple if he thinks we accept that. We are acquainted with the right hon. Gentleman, and we know his devices and machinery for carrying out political purposes. The boundaries, of course, would be fixed by the Commissioner, but who would appoint the Commissioner? The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty. Nominally, I know the Commissioner would appear to obtain the appointment from the Queen, who acts on the advice of her responsible Minister, and her responsible Minister acts upon the advice of the Member of the Government who is most familiar with the local circumstances, and who, in this case, is also most deeply interested in the political condition of his Party at the place in question. It is to the right hon. Member the Secretary to the Admiralty the Minister will have to go; but behind the whole proceedings will be the hand of the Tory “boss,” who, in the interests of his own persuasion, would be ready to do the kind of work he is now intending. I know plain speaking of this kind is always deprecated, and somebody will say, “Fancy a Commissioner appointed by sign manual of the Queen descending to partisan purposes.” I daresay this Division will take place on a straight Party vote, and I am sorry to think that hon. Members opposite should believe it their duty to support the right hon. Member the Secretary to the Admiralty on this question. I admire many things in the Government of America, but nobody who has ever been there can admire the municipal government of some of its cities. There are cities in America whose municipal government is a shame and a disgrace. I wonder if hon. Members opposite when denouncing that form of municipal government in America have ever asked themselves what is the cause of it. If they do, they will find it is the use of municipal patronage for party political purposes, and the institution of the “boss” system. The City of Liverpool has some of the worst vices of the worst American cities. It has municipal patronage used for political purposes, and it has its "boss" in the shape of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty. I implore Conservative Members for the sake of pure municipal government in this country not to lend their assistance to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty in his present effort.

*MR. WILLOX (Liverpool, Everton): I am afraid the House will almost have become weary of statistics and the iniquities of the Tory Party; therefore, in touching upon this question, I do not propose to go further than to correct one or two references to local history which have been given in the course of this Debate. It has been assumed throughout that the only Party which has been guilty of these acts is the Tory Party; but if we go back one step further in the municipal records of Liverpool we find this state of things—that when the Reform Act of 1835 came into operation the Liberal Party of the day secured a distinct and preponderating majority of the elected members of the Council. That power was exercised in precisely the same way as is now condemned in their political successors. They elected none but Liberals as Aldermen. The organisation of the Council at that time was as distinctly political as at the very worst imputed period of the present régime. But the Tory Party to-day has been accused of corrupt administration. That is a charge which is now made for the first time in the House of Commons as against the municipal administration of Liverpool—"No!"—because it has been the subject of an inquiry before a Royal Commission, and it was also the subject of discussion during the Debates on the Municipal Reform Bill; but in no single instance was there any imputation of malversation of office made against the earlier Corporation of Liverpool, nor was there, in the course of the whole Debate, the slightest imputation of that kind against them. But when the Liberal Party attained the ascendancy in the Corporation of Liverpool in 1835, their first act was to do one of the grossest pieces of corruption and jobbery that was ever attempted by a municipal body. The Town Clerk of that day was obnoxious to them solely on the ground of his politics. He was driven out of office by the Liberal majority and the taxpayers of Liverpool were rated in a large sum to compensate that gentleman for the deprivation of his office, and in order that one of the political allies of the Liberal Party might be substituted in his place. It may be suggested that this is ancient history, and that the Liberal Party has reformed its ways and changed its principles in municipal affairs, as it has recently done in Imperial affairs. But it is not so, because even within the last few weeks the Liberal Party, which now professes such great anxiety for purity and propriety in public affairs, introduced as a candidate for a vacant office in Liverpool—that of the Coronership—a gentleman of good parts and abilities no doubt, but one who had no other claim to public recognition except his political service to the Party which now claims to be the party of purity and independence. Then another allegation against the Conservative Party of Liverpool has been made by the hon. and learned Member for the Exchange Division, and it was this, that Liverpool has been dotted—I think that was the word he used—all over with public-houses in every street and even on every side of every street. But who is responsible for that state of things? Not the Tories of Liverpool—certainly not the Tory Town Council, for they have nothing whatever to do with it. It was the Liberal Magistrates of the borough of Liverpool who granted licences indiscriminately in every part of the town, and who placed no restriction upon the issue of those licences except that the man who applied should be of good character. The leading spirit in that social revolution, which has since been universally condemned, was no other than the brother of the present leader of the Party to which the Member for the Exchange Division belongs. And so if we go through the whole history of Liverpool in its municipal administration it will be found that in whatever charges are imputed to the Conservatives of this generation they have simply been imitating, and I am afraid not improving upon, the bad example of their predecessors. There has been frequent reference to "gerrymandering"—an Americanism which I am sorry to find introduced into the serious Debates of this House. I think the charge is still more serious when it is imputed to the Commissioners that they, at any rate, were subject to any extraneous influence, and did their duty otherwise than with impartiality and independence. Certainly it is a new revelation to Liverpool men to hear that the distribution of the Divisions of Liverpool was other than thoroughly impartial, independent, and judicious. It has been more than once said that the Liberal Councillors at the present time are in the majority in the Town Council, and therefore that the object of the Bill is to alter that state of things by which the majority may be maintained. But the Liberal Party are in a majority in that Council by reason of, and through the very means of, those inequalities which we are desiring to correct by this new legislation. But I am afraid it would be very uninforming to deal in detail with all these objections and these mere tu quoque arguments with reference to those various political parties, and I should like if possible to bring back the House to a more serious and general view of this problem. The first point, I think, to be ascertained is, what was the object and the principle in the mind of Parliament at the time when the Municipal Reform Act was passed? We have, then, to see how this principle was applied in the legislation of that period, and to consider, in the last place, how far this principle is now in force in the municipal administration, not only of Liverpool, but in other parts of the Kingdom. I think, if we go back to the Debates of 1835, we shall find a good deal of information, not only with reference to the principles upon which that legislation was based, but also as to the objects that were in view in dividing municipalities into wards, and that seems to me to be the primary object of the discussion to-day. Now, Lord John Russell, who had charge of the Bill, laid it down as a guiding principle that it was to bring the municipal system into harmony with the Parliamentary system which had been just before reformed. He said—

Mr. Willox

"The measure we propose, in my opinion, is in strict accordance with the spirit and intention of the Reform Act."

That is the Reform Act of 1832. If that was the object of the framer of the Municipal Reform Act, we have to consider how far that harmony is now maintained. Well, the Legislature has twice altered the principles, and in some cases the divisions, of Parliamentary constituencies in different parts of the country. In Liverpool, for instance, in the interval from 1832 to the present time, we have had an increase of Parliamentary representation from, in the first place, two to three Members. That must have been with the object of doing justice to the increased population of the city. We have since had that number augmented to nine, and we have had the city portioned out into nine different constituencies, the guiding principle in the arrangement being to secure as far as possible an approximately equal number of electors in each division. Now, while Liverpool has had this adaptation of local requirements in Parliamentary affairs it has remained absolutely stagnant and unreformed in municipal affairs. That stagnation is due to the fact that it is impossible under the present law to secure a sufficient majority to set a good law in motion. As I have said, we have had the Parliamentary representation adapted to the modified conditions of the town, and to the increased number of people, and to the altered incidence of taxation. But we have had no such adaptation of municipal affairs to the same end, and yet the changes that have occurred in the municipal administration of a growing and developing city like Liverpool are rather in municipal than in Parliamentary affairs. When we go back to the portioning of the municipal wards in 1835 we find that the principle then adopted was precisely that which Lord John Russell laid down during the Debate on the Bill. Lord John Russell, in reply to Lord Stanley on that occasion, said—

"His hon. Friend asked what was the principle which Her Majesty's Government intended to adopt with reference to dividing boroughs into wards. In the first instance, it would depend upon the wealth and population of the place. Undoubtedly they would, to a considerable extent, adopt the principle of population in making the wards. That is, they would not do so unless they contained a certain extent of population. He should be sorry to divide a borough into wards where the number of votes were so few that they were likely to be influenced. In that case it would produce a jealousy which would be most pernicious."

Lord John Russell laid down a sound principle, and he applied it at that time in a sound way in Liverpool by equalising the population and taxation in the various wards of the town. But the whole position of the town has changed since then. The population was almost entirely centred in the middle of the town, called the parish. The surrounding townships were little more than gardens and agricultural land. The population has decreased in the centre, and enormously multiplied in the outskirts; and yet there has been no attempt to adapt the representative system to the altered conditions of the town. That, I think, is a very flagrant injustice, and no accusations or charges between political parties can overcome the fact that great political injustice is done to the popular element in the constituencies, because we have a population in one ward of about 3,000 inhabitants enjoying a representation equal to a population of 176,000 in another ward. So that, while the Party on the opposite Benches are claiming impartiality and justice all round, they propose to perpetuate a state of things which is entirely indefensible. They themselves, in local affairs, have never attempted to justify the principle or the inequalities of the present system of representation. They have always evaded it by some pretence that an accompanying reform was also needed, or that it was inopportune for their political exigencies; but in every case where the constituency consists of tens or twenties of thousands, the Party which has been reproached for dominating Liverpool commands the representation. It is only in the effete and small central wards that the Liberal Party, by means of their restricted constituencies, are able to secure their majority of elected members on the Council. Challenges have been made by the opposite side, and I have no hesitation in accepting one of them—namely, that if all political parties will concur in apportioning the representation of Liverpool into anything like equal electoral districts, the Conservative Party, at any rate, will not shrink from the issue of such a trial. But they cannot maintain any fair representation, either of their Party or of justice to the masses of people whom they represent, while the present unfair system obtains. There have been numerous detailed references to Liverpool which I think need not be entered upon further, because the special criticisms that were directed against the town by the hon. Member for Leicester were, by anticipation, met by his venerated father, a citizen of Liverpool. He was himself a moderate man who desired to calm political partisanship, and he always did a great deal in that direction; but while he was moderate in his politics, he was no less a partisan in municipal matters than the Party who are now reproached for that as an offence. But the claim I desire to make on behalf of the constituency of which I am the Parliamentary Representative, but which constitutes only one-third of the municipal division, is that this number of 176,000 people who constitute the municipal constituency of Everton shall not be overborne, as they are now, by the vote of a small and decaying municipal division in the centre of the city; and I am quite sure that this principle, actively applied in Liverpool, will be no less beneficial in other parts of the country.

*(3.43.) MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): As an old member of the Liverpool Town Council and a former Representative of Liverpool, I may be allowed to offer one or two observations upon this Bill. I think the House now perfectly well understands that this is a Liverpool Bill. There is very little attempt made now on the other side of the House to disguise the fact that this Bill is introduced chiefly to affect Liverpool. ("No, no!") The hon. Gentleman says "No, no!" Can he point out any case where petitions have been made by other municipalities in favour of a Bill of this kind? The state of the House this afternoon shows that it is a Liverpool Bill. So thoroughly is it local that this might be supposed to be a debate going on in the Liverpool Town Council. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to deny for one moment that there are anomalies in the wards of Liverpool. I freely admit that they are unequally divided. It is quite true we have several wards with a small population, and others with a large population. I also admit that the small wards return mostly Liberals, and the large wards mostly Tories. These are undoubted facts. If the object of this Bill had been to remove all anomalies in the representation of Liverpool, it would have met with a cordial reception on this side. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that Liverpool is in a peculiar position. I do not know any town in the Kingdom that resembles it exactly. One class of anomalies in Liverpool are balanced by another class. The Tory Party for fifty years have elected all the Aldermen. They have, by means of their majority, pitchforked the defeated Tory candidates at the municipal elections into Aldermanic Chairs, and we hold that that is a most unjust proceeding. The Liberals have availed themselves of the advantage of the present division of the wards not to overbear the opposite Party; they are not enabled to do that, but to have a fair representation on the Town Council. If you redress one set of anomalies and leave the other set untouched you make the position worse. If you adopt the principle of this Bill and leave the aldermanic system unchanged, the result will be not merely a Tory majority, but absolute Tory supremacy. Now, we on this side of the House are perfectly prepared to adopt a system which will redress all anomalies alike, and make the representation of Liverpool exactly correspond with the wishes of the people, but if this is to be carried out the Bill must be of larger scope. It must not merely deal with the re-distribution of the wards, but it must deal with the present system of electing Aldermen. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Willox) alleges, I understand, that the present aldermanic system in the towns is the result of the action of the Liberal Party. So far from that being the fact, it was introduced in the House of Lords with the view of curbing the Liberal Party.

MR. WILLOX: I should like to correct my hon. Friend. I made no reference at all to the introduction of Aldermen into Town Councils by law.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I accept the correction. But, as I understood him, the hon. Member let it be supposed that we are opposing the action of the Liberal Party in 1835. Well, we are not doing so, but we are opposing the action of the House of Lords, which marred the Bill of the Liberal Party by injecting into it the present iniquitous system of electing Aldermen.

MR. MATTINSON: The election of Aldermen is regulated by the Act of 1882, and that was passed at the time the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian was in power.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I much doubt the thorough correctness of the statement just made. The present method was devised in 1835, and has not been altered since. Now, we on this side of the House would hail with pleasure anything like a just and honest method of dealing with these anomalies. We are prepared to support a Bill which will re-distribute the wards according to population, and place the election of Municipal Aldermen in exactly the same position as that of County Aldermen. That is a fair proposal. I do not see how anyone can charge us with opposing popular rights. While we are asking for the most full and complete regard for popular rights and representation, our opponents are asking us to remove an anomaly on one side which helps to balance an anomaly on the other side. We wish to remove both. Now, Mr. Speaker, allusion has been made to the character of the Tory government in Liverpool during the last fifty years, and a good deal has been said on both sides as to the merits and demerits of their methods of government. Now, I, for one, am willing to allow that in respect of those municipal matters mentioned by the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood), such as sewage works, paving, and sanitary matters, great and good work has been done. And no man has taken more pains or devoted more labour to municipal matters than the right hon. Gentleman himself. Liverpool owes very much to the right hon. Gentleman if you exclude all that relates to party questions. But he has been a most expert

Mr. Samuel Smith

Tory wire-puller, as all the world knows. The ascendancy of the Tory Party in Liverpool has been in the main caused by its alliance with the drink interest. The most powerful supporters of the Tory Party in Liverpool have been the publicans, and I venture to state that no town in England has been so cursed by the drink traffic as Liverpool; and if you were to search the United Kingdom through, you could not find a town that contains more squalor and misery. Many causes have contributed to produce this result, but the one cause which stands out above all others is the frightful intemperance which curses large sections of the population. And, moreover, the fact remains that so long as the Tory Party had undisputed control of the city it was literally impossible to get any practical reforms in the methods of dealing with the drink traffic. It is a painful thing to have to state, but it is my duty to tell the House that during the time the Tory Party held undisputed predominance the position of Chairman of the Watch Committee was held by a gentleman who was solicitor to two of the largest drink sellers in Liverpool, drink sellers who between them owned 130 or 150 public-houses in the city.

MR. FORWOOD: If the hon. Member will allow me to put one word in, I will say that the gentleman to whom he refers has denied the statement.

MR. FORWOOD: Yes.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: That is the first time I have ever heard it denied; and I am unaware that the gentleman himself has ever denied it. I shall not retract my statements, without much better evidence than the denial of the right hon. Gentleman, for it is a matter of common repute in Liverpool that there has been the closest possible connection between the former Chairman of the Watch Committee, whose business was to direct the police and to supervise the public-houses—between that gentleman and the largest brewers and publicans in the city. There may be some petty quibble by which the right hon. Gentleman is able to attack my statement, but as to the substantial truth of it I have no doubt, and I have never heard it denied. Since the Liberals have gained increased power in the government of the city we have had a great change for the better. There have been reforms in the management of the police and in connection with the Watch Committee, and I venture to say that the moral reform which has taken place in Liverpool during the last two or three years is almost unequalled. I do not believe so great a reform has taken place in any other town, and that reform has been contemporaneous with the growth of the Liberal Party (Ministerial cheers.) I understand those cheers to have reference to the action of the Liberal Party in the matter of free licensing 25 or 30 years ago. I do not defend that action—I have dissented from it all my life. It was, I think, a deplorable blunder on the part of the Liberal Party of that time, and I believe they disgraced themselves by identifying themselves with this system of free licensing. But the Liberal Party of to-day repudiate that policy. They are identified now with a policy of temperance and moral reform, and during the last few years have been able to achieve very satisfactory results. It is on this ground that I object to the passing of this Bill, the effect of which would be not merely to give simply a Tory majority—to which, perhaps, they are entitled—but which would give them an undisputed and complete supremacy for the whole of this generation. Therefore we make our protest against it, and we cannot withdraw our protest. But if the Gentlemen whose names are on the back of this Bill will withdraw it and present another Bill dealing with both sides of the anomaly, they will find us ready to give them our hearty support. But I trust the House will not allow itself to be made the tool of the Tory Party in one town, and pass the Second Reading of a Bill for which, outside Liverpool, there is absolutely no demand.

*(3.58.) MR. WILLIAM H. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): I think we are indebted to the hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. S. Smith) for the admirable speech he has made in favour of the Bill. He admitted that nothing could be better than the government of Liverpool for fifty years past, and, as I understood him, he had no complaint to make of the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) for his conduct of the affairs of the city. He further said that there is no doubt there is at the present moment a very great anomaly in the distribution of the wards of Liverpool, and the only palliation I understood him to offer was that there was another anomaly in the fact that Aldermen are allowed to vote for Aldermen, which he said to some extent corrected the other. The hon. Gentleman further told us that the Conservative Party are, no doubt, entitled to a small majority in the City Council. When we are told that the government of Liverpool is good, that the Tory Party is entitled to a small majority, and that there is a great anomaly in the present distribution of the wards, and when these admissions are made by an hon. Member who has himself been a member of the City Council and has been a Representative of the city in this House, the case against this Bill is once and for ever demolished. I should not, however, have risen but for a remark of the Member for the Scotland Division (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), who said there was no bona fides in this Bill, because if we had really intended to remedy an injustice in the distribution of the wards, we should have taken up the case of Belfast. I do not think I am betraying any confidence when I say that, after the Debate on the Private Belfast Bill, when the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) had appealed to the Government on this very point of the power to petition for the redistribution of the wards, I went to the hon. Member and asked him whether a clause in our Bill to the effect that the rate-payers might petition would meet his views. It is not for us to propose legislation to meet the case of Belfast; but I suggested that our Bill would be a move, at all events, in the direction desired by the hon. Member, and he said he quite approved of my suggestion.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I did not realise that the Bill was to be confined to Great Britain, and still less did I realise that it was intended for the use of Liverpool alone. And I may say, also, that I think the form of the proposed alteration would have been found inconvenient.

*MR. WILLIAM H. CROSS: If the hon. Gentleman chooses to suggest a form, it is open to him to do so; but we cannot undertake to graft upon our Bill the many complicated clauses required to alter the Irish Act of 1840. We did not wish to close the door against Belfast, and we considered that if we inserted the clause to which the hon. Member agreed at the time, we should, at all events, make a step in the direction of his wishes. There is one other point. The hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) said we had introduced this Bill practically without giving notice to any of the people most interested; that no petitions had been presented from municipalities in favour of it, and that it was solely a Liverpool Bill, and ignored and disregarded every other municipality. The representative association of the municipalities, the Association of Municipal Corporations, have been consulted with respect to this Bill at every step. They had the original draft of the Bill; they had copies of every alteration. We have been in correspondence with them, and no doubt every borough throughout England knows the position of this Bill. And when the hon. Member says that no borough has petitioned, I say that is again another strong argument in favour of the Bill, because if these boroughs had objected to the Bill, they are represented by gentlemen who are capable of making their views known. And as there has been no petition from any quarter except the Radical minority of the Liverpool Town Council—for every name amongst those hon. Members in opposition to this Bill is the name of some one connected more or less with the Radical minority in Liverpool—I think we may claim that the hon. Gentleman has supplied us with most cogent and powerful arguments in favour of our Bill. Once for all, I do not think hon. Members opposite will have persuaded the majority of this House that a state of things ought to exist in any town, whether it be Liberal or whether it be Tory, in which one single ward with one-third of the whole electors returns only one-sixteenth of the whole number of representatives. I hope, on the contrary, that hon. Gentlemen having heard the arguments advanced, the House will make one step forward in the direction of removing from the municipal administration one of the most crying anomalies that exists in this country.

(4.8.) MR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): It has been said that this Bill was introduced not in the interests of one Municipality, but of all. How has that interest been shown? Not a single borough has petitioned in its favour, not a single Member for any of the large boroughs has spoken in favour of the Bill, and not a single one is now in his place watching its progress. They know very well that this measure does not concern them, and they take no notice of it. It is a measure that is introduced for the benefit or otherwise of Liverpool, and for the benefit or otherwise of a political party in Liverpool. The hon. Member who introduced this measure seemed to deprecate opposition to it in the same way that the nurse in "Midshipman Easy" deprecated any criticism of the baby on the ground that it was a very little one. But I do not think this is a very little measure. It will introduce an element of disunion, dissension, and turmoil into the Municipal Corporation, and will encourage the political element which many think ought to be excluded. The Bill actually proposes that at any time fifty members of a ward may bring about a re-distribution. And why? For a political purpose; no other reason is suggested. If one Political Party is dissatisfied with the result of an election, fifteen Members can be got to sign a petition to Her Majesty in Council for a re-distribution. Such a state of things is not part of the law or Constitution of this country, and the present system does not cause anything unfair to the minority. In Liverpool the Liberals and Conservatives are about equally divided; there may be in the whole constituency four per cent. more Conservatives than Liberals, but several elections have negatived that; as a matter of fact, nobody can tell on which side the majority lies. But there is no pretence for saying the member for Pitt Street Ward does not represent the public opinion in the ward. Whether the ward has 1,000 inhabitants like Pitt Street, or 100,000 like Crickdale, the Councillor will be representative of the public opinion which elects him. The grievance is altogether imaginary. How is it that the Corporation of Liverpool has not petitioned in favour of the Bill? The Conservatives have a majority on the Corporation. Why did they not get up a petition in favour of it? Why did they not get up a petition in favour of abolishing the Aldermen or of putting their election on the same footing as that of the Councillors? Why did they not get up a petition in favour of equalising the wards? They recently got up a petition in favour of local option; why did they not put re-distribution of the wards in that? It was simply because the electorate and their representatives on the Council are utterly indifferent on the question; and if the present state of things constitutes a grievance, they will not take the slightest trouble to alter it. There is another reason behind it. There are four different rating districts in the City of Liverpool, and each is rated according to its own expenditure, and the outside wards—the ones which complain—pay a considerably higher rate than the inside ones. The difference is as much as 30 per cent. These rates are levied under an Act of Parliament, and cannot be changed by the Corporation, but re-distribution would alter the machinery for levying these rates, and render the working of the measure almost impossible till there was equalisation of rating by which these large outside wards would be able to shift part of their rates on to the shoulders of the inside wards. I quite understand why no allusion has been made to that, for there would have to be a supplementary Bill to equalise the rates and saddle the inner wards with 30 per cent. of the rating now borne by the outside wards. There is no suggestion that the present rating is unjust; it is according to the expenditure; but the re-arrangement of rating would be unjust to the inner wards, in which are the great shops, the great manufactures, the great warehouses, on which the shipping of Liverpool so much depends, and the business places of the great commercial men on whom depends the wealth, enterprise, and prosperity of Liverpool. They are the people interested in the smaller inner wards, and they are more interested in the rating than are the inhabitants of the outside wards. The latter consist of third, fourth, and fifth-rate streets, of cottage houses, rated at £25 a year, whereas the average rating in the inside wards is £94. These inside wards are interested in seeing that this measure is not passed, as it would do them great injustice and impose on them rates for the benefit of the outside wards. If, however, there were equalisation all round that would deal with several anomalies—the question of the Aldermen as well as that of rating. If they were settled much of the objection to the re-distribution of wards would disappear. I have been in the Council for 20 years, and I remember when there were only 17 Liberal members on it, which left the Tories with more than a two-thirds majority. Why did they not then carry out the re-distribution? It must have been because they did not choose to do so. For the last 50 years the Tories have had a distinct majority of the elective members to which they added the 16 Tory Aldermen, but they never attempted the change. Now that they feel their majority is diminishing they attempt it. They did attempt it in 1890, when they promoted a Private Bill for the re-arrangement of wards and boundaries; but they were not able to prove their case before the Committee upstairs, and the Bill was lost. That is not the only Private Bill in which they might have had the question settled. During the last 20 years they have promoted almost as many Private Bills, at great cost; but they have never introduced into them provisions for a re-distribution of wards as they might have done. They do it now to make a cry to go to the country with at the approaching General Election. They want to say that they are the friends of the working man; that they want to extend the rights of popular suffrage, to show that one vote is as good as another. Why, if they are such friends of the popular vote, have they no provision in the Bill dealing with the Aldermen, and putting a stop to their election by Aldermen? Let there be some semblance of popular election in their case. I promise them that if this Bill goes any further there will be a provision for that purpose introduced. The hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) has spoken of the activity, energy, and earnestness which the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) has shown on the Council. No man has been more efficient or has contributed more, in my time, by his energy and ability to the improvement of sanitary and other local matters than he has done. But that is no reason why he should now, indirectly and under cover, be able to foist upon us sham reforms which have only one object, and that is now an undisguised object—to get if possible a lease for 50 years more the power which they have abused in the grossest way during the 50 years that they have already possessed it. They have never during that time elected a single Liberal Alderman. It is true that Birmingham has excluded Tory Aldermen, but two blacks do not make a white, and I say that state of things in Liverpool is disgraceful. The father of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) served on the Liverpool Council with ability and energy for nearly a lifetime, and his name is associated with whatever is worthy of notice in Liverpool, yet, though he was proposed again and again as Mayor and Alderman, they could not even elect him as an Alderman. I think, therefore, the Tory monopoly of electing Aldermen would be sufficient reason, without any other, for opposing the Bill.

(4.15.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I move "That the Question be now put."

*MR. SPEAKER: The Debate is being conducted in a fair and legitimate manner, and as there is an evident desire to continue the discussion I cannot accept the Motion of the hon. Member.

MR. ROYDEN (Liverpool, West Toxteth): Hon. Members have spoken of the Bill as if it were a Private Bill, and I regret that, because Liverpool, instead of bringing in a Private Bill, and merely consulting its own interests, promoted this Bill, having in view a larger area, and desiring that the same justice should be done to other towns in a similar position. The last speaker said that these other boroughs have shown no interest in the question. On the contrary, I have had letters from various places rejoicing that Liverpool had taken a stand, and was endeavouring to put this matter straight. If we want further proof we have only to look what hon. Members have expressed their opinion against the Bill, for I think we may accept it that all those who have anything to say against it have been careful to do so. I have been astonished at what the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) and the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. Commins) have said with regard to the Council. I have had the honour of being a member of the Council for some years, and I am bound to say that the conclusions at which those hon. Gentlemen have arrived are not such as commend themselves to my judgment. We have heard a great deal about the corrupt management of Liverpool. But it is a most extraordinary thing that when the City Council came before the Commission for an extension of boundaries, it was a subject of congratulation by the members of the Commission that the revenues of the city had been so well administered and the wants of the city so well attended to. If Liverpool with its great prosperity, its fine buildings, the spirit of enterprise among its people, and its wonderful advance in regard to health, is a specimen of mismanagement by the Tory or any other Party, my only regret is that there is not much more such mismanagement in regard to other towns. The fact that Liverpool has been dominated for fifty years by the Tory Party is a great triumph for that Party. But will it be believed that there is not a single committee of that City Council on which there are not a good many of the Liberal members of the Town Council sitting? They have a share in all these things. I do not grudge it to them. They have a right to their share. In 1835, when the city was portioned out for municipal purposes, the manner in which the wards were laid out, having regard to the number of the electors, of course the central wards of the city were more or less covered with houses, and were a small area, whereas the outlying districts were, by reason of the sparseness of the population, a very large area. In the 50 years that have elapsed the city has grown, and the vacant spaces have become covered with houses, which are almost entirely occupied by the working population. There has, consequently, been a great increase in the number of the electors in these outlying districts. If hon. Gentlemen opposite believe in the doctrine which they are constantly putting forward in this House and upon public platforms, that the interests of the working men must and ought to be considered, they should join with us in giving the working classes in those districts an opportunity of expressing their opinion on the government of the city. My hon. Friend opposite the Member for Flintshire has pointed out that it is due to the Liberal magistrates that many public-houses were thrust upon the city, and he, as well as I, greatly regret it. But I would recall to his memory that when the Conservative magistrates were predominant on the Bench, their study was to diminish the number of public-houses in the city. I look forward, however, to a better state of things in this respect being brought about by a better feeling on the part both of the Liberal and Conservative magistrates on the Bench. We were taunted by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) that we had used our power arbitrarily, and had refused to elect Liberal Aldermen; and yet he confessed that in most of the English towns the Liberals had always elected Liberal Aldermen.

MR. PICTON : I beg the hon. Member's pardon. On the contrary, I gave an instance of a Radical Council electing a Tory Mayor.

MR. ROYDEN : But I do not think the hon. Member alluded to Aldermen.

MR. PICTON : Yes.

MR. ROYDEN : But certainly, so far as my experience goes, where there is a Liberal majority in a Council Liberal Aldermen are elected by them. I venture to say that where any prominent citizen has rendered distinguished service to the city we have always recognised and acknowledged it. But, as I have said, I prefer to treat the Bill on general principles. I feel that a great injustice is being done to the working classes, especially in Liverpool, by the way in which the wards are gerrymandered. They were not originally; it is only the present system that causes it. The hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. Commins) says he be-believes it would make very little difference. If that is his opinion of this Bill, if he really believes in the truth of his sentiments, why does he not leave it to the vote of the whole people of Liverpool, and allow them to test it? We are quite willing to accept that test. We have simply the good of the city in view. I think it was one of the doctrines of the Liberal Party that in the same town equal electoral districts should exist; but it appears that that is only a principle, to be adopted when it is supposed to be in favour of the Liberal Party. We, on the other hand, are ready to act for the whole country. Therefore, we have included the boroughs of England and Wales within the scope of this Bill. We believe in doing justice to the people of Liverpool, as well as to the people of the rest of the country.

(4.41.) MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): I have listened to this Debate with considerable and increasing surprise. The Bill which has been introduced to us to-day affects and purports to be a Bill, and is a Bill, which proposes to deal with the law as it concerns and affects every Municipal Corporation in the country. But the names on the back of the Bill are local names—Liverpool names; the whole Debate has been carried on and the speaking has been done by Liverpool men, or by men interested in Liverpool. It seems that it was originally intended to limit the Bill to Liverpool; but, as it was found that that would not do, it was then extended to the whole country. I say, therefore—and it cannot be denied—that this is a Bill of Liverpool origin; its origin, so far as I can judge, is a Liverpool Party squabble. But it may be said that whatever may be the origin of the Bill, and whatever may be the motive of those who have introduced the Bill, the question for the House is—is it a good Bill? I will address myself to that question, and I have no objection to deal with that question. I look upon this Bill with some suspicion, because it is a local Bill; but I have no objection to it because it is a Party Bill. I am not sure whether I am correct, but I am under the impression that a Bill of a somewhat similar kind with regard to Bristol was introduced some 20 years ago. It was certainly opposed by many leading Conservatives of that day, but it passed through this House. When, however, it got to another place and came under the keen, scrutinising eye of Lord Cairns that Bill was heard of no longer. Well, I think that is a good precedent, at any rate, for the Tory Government and the Tory Party. They have no need to go to another place; they have the power in this House, and I hope they will not pass a Bill of this kind, for they could not get a worse method in the shape of a Bill for dealing with the subject itself. This is a subject of considerable public interest; it concerns a serious alteration which it is proposed should be made in the Municipal Corporations Act. And my first proposition is that this is not a Bill which ought to be brought in by private Members, and that the Government should not give any show of support to a Bill for which they will not take the direct and original responsibility. I say distinctly that, according to Parliamentary precedent and the right notion of legislation, this is a subject, the dealing with, I will not say the tinkering with the Municipal Corporations Act is a subject which ought to be taken up by the Government of the day, and not by any number of private parties, more or less supported by the Government. I object to this Bill, because it is only a proposition. It proposes to allow a bare majority, instead of a two-thirds majority, of the County Council to petition Her Majesty for a new division and re-division of a borough into wards. The Municipal Corporations Act not only provided that there should be elected Councillors, but also that there should be Aldermen who were not directly elected, being about one-third of the number of Councillors. Under these circumstances, it was very intelligible and highly reasonable, it appears to me, that there should be this two-thirds, because that would render it practically impossible that a proposal of this kind should be carried against the will of the majority of the elected members of that Council. A number of suggestions have been made, but no response has been given. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty has expressed his own individual opinion that Aldermen should not vote on a question of this kind ; but I did not understand him to say that he proposed to insert an Amendment to that effect in this Bill, if the Bill passed the Second Reading and came into Committee.

MR. FORWOOD : I intended merely to express my own view on the subject, and I said that I would give my own assent to the proposal that the principle adopted in the case of Aldermen in counties should also be adopted in the case of municipal boroughs, and that, if it could be agreed to insert a clause to carry out that object, such a proposal would have my sympathy.

MR. STANSFELD : But I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he does not pretend to speak on behalf of any other Member of the House. He merely expresses his own opinion ; and hence he must allow me to say that such an expression of individual opinion is not a guarantee that the Amendment or clause, which would have his assent, would be certain of being adopted. But the view I take of it is this. This Bill raises the question again of the existence of Aldermen as part of the Municipal Corporations of this country. I would remind the House that the Liberal Party was not in the past responsible for the creation of Aldermen ; and I say that the position of the Liberal Party now with reference to this question is that we believe—it certainly is my own personal opinion—that no change of this kind ought to be made or attempted with regard to the Municipal Corporations Act, unless, at the same time, Parliament addresses itself to the question of the position of Aldermen on these Councils, and either renders them directly elective or abolishes them as Aldermen and makes them elected Councillors like the other representatives of that body, or, at all events, introduces a clause which shall prevent them from voting on questions upon which they ought not to interfere with the wish of the majority of the elected members of that Council. The Government, I presume, are about to speak. I understand the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department proposes to address the House. I hope he will tell us distinctly the views of the Government ; I hope he will tell us how far the Government intend to make itself responsible for the proposals of this measure. I say, so far as our view is concerned, it would be in accordance with precedent and the best usage of this House if the Government would either leave this Bill to its fate, in the hands of those who have brought it forward, or take it bodily in charge, and deal with it on their own responsibility. I hope the hon. Gentleman will enlighten us on that point.

*(4.49.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam) : I agree with the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down that it would be far better if Bills of such far-reaching scope as the Bill now before the House were taken in hand by the responsible Government of the day. But we have to deal with the Bill as it has been brought before us. In speaking of the Bill in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, I must be understood to express, on the part of the Government as a whole, no collective, corporate opinion, except that they wish this Bill, which has not been undertaken by themselves, to be left to the free judgment of the House, and do not desire to put any pressure upon their own supporters. That is the only collective opinion which the Government wish to express upon the Bill ; but it is necessary that I should explain to the best of my ability the way in which this Bill strikes me, and the effect it appears to me to be likely to have. This Bill appears to me to have started on a branch line, and never to have got into any main current of Parliamentary thought until the speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down ; and it comes with but very poor recommendations to this House when we see that it has on its back the names of Members representing one borough and one borough alone. I do not say that Liverpool is the only borough in which there is an injustice. I believe in the borough which I represent a similar measure might be demanded, and if demanded successfully would be hailed with much satisfaction by members of the Party opposite. Therefore, we cannot on the sole ground that this Bill comes from Liverpool reject it as being a purely local measure. My own view is that it recognises the existence of an imperfection in our law, which is undoubtedly a substantial imperfection. We must go back to 1859, to see what was the mischief which Parliament was seeking to remove, what were the remedies which Parliament sought to adopt, and what were the methods by which Parliament sought to carry out those remedies. The mischief aimed at was that the constitution and composition of a municipal Council should not be manipulated by a mere Party vote. It was against that possible abuse that security was sought to be taken, and the method by which that was to be carried into effect was by requiring a two-thirds vote of the Council that had been constituted under the Act of 1835. But unfortunately I do not believe that in adopting that peculiar modus operandi the House really took the security which it was seeking to take. What I believe it ought to have done was to have secured that petitions should be framed by two-thirds or some other substantial and preponderating majority, not of the Council but of the electorate from which the Council derives its power. I believe that was their object, and I believe that Parliament at that time failed to foresee that this one-third of the Council which might stop the way of the redivision of the wards of the borough might possibly consist solely and entirely of the representatives of what we may call the over-represented wards—resisting the claim of the under-represented wards. That is the situation which my hon. Friends the Members for Liverpool complain of, and I must say they come before this House entitled to much sympathy in respect of the remarkable anomalies which they present to our attention. Now, I observe on the part of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and other Gentlemen who have preceded him, a disposition to proceed to a sort of barter in this matter. It is suggested that against this two-thirds majority might be exchanged some more or less substantial part of the powers of the members of the Council called Aldermen. That offer is based upon this consideration: that to a certain extent, and in some rough and imperfect way, the institution of Aldermen serves as a counterpoise to the possible inequalities in representation such as exist in the case of Liverpool. In the case of Liverpool, there are over-represented wards which are represented by members of one political colour. It is contended to-day that this monopoly is roughly counter balanced by the fact that all the Aldermen are of an opposite political character. It seems to me that the two-thirds majority and the existence of the Aldermen have no real connection with one another for this reason, that if it came to a question whether the Council should present a petition for re-arrangement of wards, it does not follow as a matter of necessity that all the Aldermen would be on one side in that debate. And again, we can quite conceive the situation—it may even happen in Liverpool—in which all the small and over-represented wards may be upon the same side as the Aldermen, and an absolutely insignificant minority of the citizens might thereby obtain not merely supremacy, but almost permanent supremacy over the majority of the ratepayers. Therefore I must enter here a necessary caveat against allowing that there is any connection between the question of the existence of the Aldermen and the question of the modus operandi of presenting petitions to the Queen in Council. I must reserve myself by saying I am not authorised to give any pledge with regard to any scheme to modify or get rid of the institution of Aldermen, which it may be hereafter sought to tie round the neck of this Bill. I am going to vote for the Second Reading, though I think there is much to be said upon the particular methods by which the proposal is to be carried out. This Bill makes it possible, by a mere party vote, to set going the machinery for the redistribution of the wards. Is that right, or is it not? We are told that there lies behind this power of the Council as a security the responsibility of the Secretary of State of the day, and, further, the impartiality of the Commissioner whom he would send down for the purpose of local inquiries. I do not feel quite satisfied that these are sufficient securities. I suppose that this House will not be less disposed than I am to admit that even Secretaries of State may have their frailties and leanings, and I can quite conceive a situation in which the majority of a Town Council of a particular political colour may take advantage of political relations with a sympathetic Secretary of State, who may be only too ready to forward their political views. I come next to the question of the position of the Commissioner appointed by the Secretary of State; but before doing so let me remind the House what is the nature of the question which is most frequently at issue in these disputes of Town Councils as to the arrangements of the wards and the proportion that each should have in the representation. If hon. Members will turn to the section in the Municipal Corporations Act with which we are now concerned, they will see the Commissioner is obliged to have regard in re-dividing the wards "as well the number of persons represented in the ward as to the aggregate rating of the ward." In other words, in the result there are to be two factors—numbers and rateable value. Now let hon. Gentlemen opposite conceive a state of things in which the composition of a Town Council was fair and equitable under a reasonable construction of that Statute, that numbers and rateable value each in proportion had fair representation—but let us suppose that the existing party majority of the Town Council were what you may call rateable value men as distinct from population men, and let us suppose that a Secretary of State were to take their petition, sent up upon the vote of a bare majority, so far as to proceed to the appointment of a Commissioner. Well, Sir, it is not necessary to impute anything that would not be strict impartiality or anything that would be a reproach, but the Commissioner would be more than human if he did not feel he was bound to do something, to make some alteration in the state of things, and yet that something must be something which—in the circumstances I have imagined to exist—would be an alteration of that which was fair and equitable and in conformity with the intentions of the existing Statute. I have stated what is the position of the Government with regard to this Bill, and I have ventured to indicate my own opinion that though the objects of the Bill are good its proposed methods are faulty, and I think it is right that I should put a suggestion before my hon. and learned Friend in charge of the Bill. I have said that an absolute majority of a Council does not appear to be a satisfactory kind of way of deciding the question whether a re-division of wards should be embarked upon. It is admitted that a two-thirds majority of the Council does not act in many cases when there ought certainly to be a re-division. It would not, however, be correct to say that this requirement of a two-thirds majority has stood in the way to a very great extent in the presentation of these petitions, because I find that since the year 1879 there have been no fewer than 41 petitions granted. I suggest to my hon. and learned Friend that the true solution of this matter would be some provision that the petition should not be adopted except upon a two-thirds or, at all events, some substantial majority, not of the Council but of the rate-payers themselves either by a direct vote—which of course would be extremely difficult, and would require many clauses—or by a vote of the members of the Town Council actually representing two-thirds of the population. I offer that suggestion for the consideration of my hon. Friends; and while I promise my support for what it is worth to the Second Reading of this Bill, I must reserve the fullest liberty, both on my own part and on the part of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on this Bench with whom I usually act, to see that the methods of this Bill are most closely scrutinised when we get into Committee and to take any course which may seem proper to us to render it more equitable and less unsatisfactory than it at present appears to be.

* (5.4.) Mr. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I desire to offer a few words of explanation of the reason why I withdrew the Amendment to the Second Reading of this Bill, which has stood in my name for a few days past. That Amendment was to the effect that no amendment of the law would be satisfactory which did not include a provision that Aldermen should not be allowed to vote in the election of Aldermen.

If that Amendment had stood upon the Paper to-day I understand the House would have voted upon it before it would have given a vote to the Second Reading of this Bill—it would have been necessary in order to arrive at a vote upon the Second Reading that that Amendment should have been decided first. Now, Sir, as I expected, we have heard from a representative of the Government—though he was careful to say he had no right to pledge his colleagues—that he will vote for the Second Reading. That would have put it out of the power of the House to consider at any later period of this Session the question of whether Aldermen should vote in the election of Aldermen. I am of opinion that the probability is that the House will hereafter consent to this Amendment, and abolish the vote of Aldermen in the election of Aldermen in Town Councils, as it has, by a unanimous vote, in the case of County Councils. For that reason, and that reason alone, I withdrew this Amendment of mine. The hon. Gentleman who has spoken for the Government—I beg pardon, the hon. Member who has just spoken from the Treasury Bench—has described the existing method of the law as an imperfect solution of the difficulties of this question of the re-distribution of wards in the boroughs. It is an imperfect settlement of the question, but for a reason which has not been mentioned in the course of the Debate. The reason is this, that whenever there is a large Party majority in a borough, that Party is perfectly content with the distribution of the wards. A large Party majority always wishes to preserve those conditions, and therefore will never alter the boundaries of the borough for fear of diminishing their Party majority. It is for this reason, and it appears to me a perfectly clear one, that the provisions of the law as they exist would be better altered. I have to make, in addition to what has fallen from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stuart Wortley), for the consideration of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Mattinson) representing the backers of this Bill, a suggestion or two, which to my mind will test the bona fides of the proposal as it has come from ~~these four~~

Mr. Brunner

Members for Liverpool. Will he consent that an instruction shall be moved, on going into Committee, that Aldermen shall not vote in the election of Aldermen, and that it shall be accepted by him and his colleagues? Will he consent to strike out of the Bill that very remarkable provision that fifty ratepayers shall be empowered to present a petition to Her Majesty for the redistribution of the wards, and then will he also consent that this Bill—I want the House to understand that, this is a perfectly accurate test of the bona fides of this Bill—shall not come into operation until the 1st January next. The position of political affairs in Liverpool has been aptly and fully described to the House. For the last three municipalelections, I will not say the Liberal Party, but the Party of Purity and Order, in Liverpool, has been gaining seats. I am very glad to acknowledge what has fallen from the hon. Member for one of the Toxteths that the Conservative members of the Town Council, equally with the Conservative Magistrates, have been at one on this question, but it is obvious to both political parties in Liverpool that on the 1st November next the Party of Purity in Liverpool will gain one more seat. The party then will be able to elect one-half the Aldermen. Then there will only remain the majority of elected representatives, the Aldermen being equal on both sides. I would further suggest that the Bill should not come into operation until the 1st January next.

MR. MATTINSON: I should be quite content that the Bill should not come into operation till the 1st January next.

*MR. BRUNNER: I am glad to have drawn that concession from the hon. Member, but I desire to have the Bill amended in another particular.

(5.12.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): It has been said that the Bill has been too much dealt with as applying only to Liverpool; but I would point out that Liverpool has been merely selected as an instance of what exists in other places, although there the grievances are more serious than elsewhere. Now, the Everton Ward which has been referred to, is practically the home of the Welsh in Liverpool, and yet the Welsh voters have only one-twenty-fourth part of the weight of representation that the Irishman who reside in the Pitt Street Ward have. That is surely a great anomaly, and one which ought to be redressed. In the discussion which has taken place, it has been admitted that this is an endeavour to remedy an injustice, but it has been urged that it ought not be redressed unless another injustice is removed at the same time. I desire the redress of this and other anomalies, and it is new to me as an old Liberal to find the Liberal Party opposing the removal of this grievance, on the ground that they cannot at the same time redress another grievance. Supposing they applied that doctrine to the carrying out of the Newcastle programme by attaching to it this condition: that they will redress none of the grievances referred to in it unless they can redress them all at once. I think that is a fair argument to use in the discussion of this question. I always thought that the Liberal doctrine was, "If you have a grievance redress it when you can." Here is, then, this great inequality which exists not only in Liverpool, but in various other places throughout the country. It has been brought before the House in the shape of a Bill, therefore let us deal with it and pass it into law. If also by any Amendment or Instruction it is possible to remedy the grievance in Belfast, I, for one, should be glad to see it done.

Question put.

(5.20.) The House divided:—Ayes 209; Noes 172.—(Div. List, No. 122.)

Main Question proposed.

It being after half-past Five of the Clock, Mr. Speaker proceeded to interrupt the Business:—

Whereupon Mr. MATTINSON rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Main Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Main Question be now put."

(5.35.) The House divided:—Ayes 215; Noes 147.—(Div. List, No. 123.)

VOL. IV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Main Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole House."—(Mr. Mattinson.)

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Committee of the Whole House," in order to add the words "Select Committee,"—(Mr. T. M. Healy,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'Committee of the Whole House' stand part of the Question."

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) LAW AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 261.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): The sole object of this Bill is to apply to Scotland the provisions of the Day Industrial Schools Act which obtain in England. The Government have in two Sessions in the other House introduced a Bill of a larger scope, in which this object is included; but as there seems to be no prospect of such a measure being carried this Session, I hope, under the circumstances, the Government will not oppose the Second Reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Crawford.)

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): I must ask the hon. Member not to press the Motion for Second Reading to-day. The proposal in the Bill was included in a larger measure introduced by the Government two years since, and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is preparing a Bill for introduction this year. I hope the hon. Member will defer this Bill until either the House has had the opportunity of seeing the other, or it has become certain that such opportunity is not to be given.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday.

GAS PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION BILL.—(No. 295.)

Read a second time, and committed.

CORN SALES.

Ordered, That the Select Committee be re-appointed to inquire and report upon the various weights and measures used for the sale of grain throughout the United Kingdom; the desirability of selling grain by weight only or by measure and weight and, in the event of either being considered desirable, the extent to which either might be enforced; the desirability of the adoption of a uniform weight, either for the United Kingdom or any part of it; if a uniform weight is desirable, the standard to be adopted; and whether there should be one standard for all kinds of grain; and, if not, what should be the standard for each kind.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—Sir E. Birkbeck, Mr. Esslemont, Mr. Farquharson, Mr. Gray, Mr. Seale-Hayne, Mr. Lewis, Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Maguire, Mr. Pease, Mr. Rankin, Mr. Halley Stewart, Mr. Mark Stewart, and Mr. Jasper More.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Jasper More.)

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Second Report, with Minutes of Evidence, and an Appendix, brought up, and read.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 180.]

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Ninth Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

MOTIONS.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACT (1882) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Milvain, Bill to amend "The Married Women's Property Act, 1882," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Milvain, Mr. Cozens Hardy, Mr. R. T. Reid, and Mr. Gainsford Bruce.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 337.]

Mr. Stuart Wortley

CORPORATIONS (STAMP DUTIES) BILL.

On Motion of Sir A. Rollit, Bill to amend the Law in relation to the stamping of documents under the seals of Corporations, ordered to be brought in by Sir A. Rollit and Mr. Roe.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 338.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I take the opportunity to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question about the Vote on Account, which the Government intend to take before Whitsuntide to cover the period until after the General Election. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has conferred with the Secretary to the Treasury, which he said the other day it would be necessary for him to do, and whether he can now state when the Vote on Account will be taken, and if any Votes on Supply will be taken before the General Election?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The hon. Gentleman is altogether mistaken as to the answer I gave him to a similar question he put to me on a previous occasion. I said then nothing about taking a Vote on Account over the General Election; in fact, I rather suggested the very opposite to such a proceeding. I said that probably a Vote on Account would have to be taken in accordance with the usual practice at this period of the year before the end of May; but to take a Vote on Account to cover a period of three or six months never entered into my thoughts.

DR. TANNER: If the right hon. Gentleman reads his words as they are reported in the Times, he will see that they bear out the interpretation I put upon them, that the right hon. Gentleman required the assistance of the Secretary to the Treasury in order to come to a conclusion as to the period I have mentioned.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 12th May, 1892.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (ACQUISITION OF LAND) BILL

NOW

MORTMAIN AND CHARITABLE USES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Amendments reported (according to Order); and Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Monday next.

CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PRO-PERTY ACT (1881) AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Order of the Day for the Report of Amendments to be received, read.

Title.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("with reference to leaseholds.")—(The Lord Herschell.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 1.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 7, to leave out ("leaseholds.")—(The Lord Herschell.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment moved,

At end of Clause, to insert as sub-section (3) sub-section (2) of Clause 3, leaving out ("Section two") and inserting ("of this Section.")—(The Lord Herschell.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 2.

Amendment moved,

In page 1, line 21, to leave out ("the before mentioned,") and after ("fourteen") insert ("of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881.")—(The Lord Herschell.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 3.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, at the end of Clause 3, page 2, line 10, I move to add—

"But this proviso shall not preclude the right to require the payment of a reasonable sum in respect of any legal or other expense incurred in relation to such licence or consent."

I move it in conformity with an Amendment made in the Standing Committee when I promised to bring up an Amendment in that sense.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 10, add at end ("but this proviso shall not preclude the right to require the payment of a reasonable sum in respect of any legal or other expense incurred in relation to such licence or consent.")—(The Lord Herschell.)

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: I wish to ask the noble and learned Lord whether, in the case of licences to assign for which the common custom is that a fee is paid, not a large fee, but a fee of a guinea generally, to an agent, would this Clause prevent that?

LORD HERSCHELL: It certainly would not prevent it. If anything had been done it probably would be that in that case the fee of a guinea to the agent for making any inquiry necessary with regard to the charges would not be precluded by this provision. It would be as the Clause stands; but it was to meet such cases that the proviso was put in.

*THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I understand that this Clause will not include the case of a special covenant to pay money in respect to assignment. The Clause as it stands I understand really to say that if there is only a covenant against disposing of land or property leased without licence or consent such covenant shall not carry with it, or be intended to carry with it, the liability to fine; but if there is a special condition inserted that a fine shall be paid I presume this Clause would not prevent it.

LORD HERSCHELL: I am not sure that it would; but I do not myself feel any responsibility in respect of this Clause, because the Clause, as it now stands, is one that was carried in opposition to my contention before the Grand Committee. But if the noble Marquess asks me, I am not sure that there might not be a possibility of its excluding a fine in such a case. If it is desired to preserve a fine probably it would be possible to do so by saying "unless otherwise expressed" in the lease.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think that was the intention, as I understood it, of the Grand Committee, and I did not understand that that by itself was opposed by the noble and learned Lord. I think it would be better to insert words to that effect.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY): My Lords, I have not seen this before, but, as the Bill now stands, there is no doubt whatever that it would prohibit the receipt of any fine or money compensation even where the original covenant had expressly provided it; and, therefore, if it is intended to preserve the right in cases where it is expressly covenanted, it ought to be provided for so as to be beyond doubt.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Would not the best way be to express it in words "unless there be special provision to the contrary"?

LORD HERSCHELL: "Unless special provision to the contrary is made herein."

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Have you any objection to that?

LORD HERSCHELL: None. Although I am responsible for the Clause, that was the intention no doubt of the Grand Committee. I think if the words are adopted in line 7 "unless the lease contains an express provision to the contrary" that will be sufficient.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, there is only one other Amendment that I have to propose, which deals with a case much more limited than that which was dealt with in the Amendment which was rejected by the Grand Committee. It is intended to enable the Court to relieve against the forfeiture in respect of an assignment being made without licence, where the Court thinks it reasonable that such relief should be given, and in such terms as the Court thinks fit. My Lords, a provision of this description is entirely on the lines of previous legislation, because now in numerous cases,—in fact in the majority of cases, where there is a breach of covenant, which is expressed by the lease to give the right to forfeiture, the Courts have been given power by Parliament to relieve against the forfeiture on such terms as they think right, securing to the lessor that he shall not be injured by the act of the tenant.

The Marquess of Salisbury

My Lords, I venture to think that that may well be extended to the present case. No one of course would desire that the Court should relieve in any case in which the landlord's interest would be prejudiced by their relieving against the forfeiture, and I do not believe that if this Clause is passed into law, under this provision any more than under previous provisions by which the Courts have been able to give relief, any wrong would be done to the lessor. My Lords, not only is this Clause confined to power to the Court to give relief where it thinks fit, but it is limited to that class of cases where the lessee has himself a substantial and valuable interest under the lease; because it only applies where there are seven years of the lease yet to run, and where the rent which the lessee has to pay does not exceed one-third of the annual value; so that it only applies where really it is a valuable property to the lessee, and where therefore the lessee may be expected, to say the least of it, not to make any assignment which would be likely to be injurious to the value of the lease; because of course he has, for seven years to come, twice as great an interest in the property leased as the lessor has. Now I may be asked whether such a provision as this is necessary. Have there been cases of hardship, owing to the want of power in the Court to relieve against the forfeiture? My Lords, a case came before the Court of Appeal very recently, which undoubtedly was a case of great hardship, and which they felt to be a case of great hardship; but in which they could afford no relief. A valuable lease of premises in the City of London had been granted, and there was a provision that the lessee was not to assign without licence, but that that licence was not to be arbitrarily or unreasonably withheld. There was an arrangement made by which a portion of the premises was to be leased to a perfectly respectable tenant—that was proved and admitted. The matter was put into the hands of a solicitor to carry out; but, by an oversight of his clerk, permission was not asked of the lessor to make the assignment. There can be no doubt that if permission had been asked the lessor would have given it, and, I think probably, could have been made liable if he had not granted it, because there was no doubt about the propriety of the proposed lessee, and the liability of the original lessee to the landlord still remained; so that his pecuniary interest could not be affected. He kept his liability of the original lessee under the covenant, and would get, in addition, the liability of the new lessee. No licence having been obtained, through an oversight, and the lease having been so assigned, the lessor brought and succeeded in an action to recover this valuable property from the lessee, and the Court held that it was powerless to afford the lessee any relief, although it was a mere oversight on the part of the clerk, and the landlord was in no way prejudiced by the proceedings. That seems to me a very hard case, and I would submit that that is a case in which the Court, not having the power, ought to have the power given it to relieve against forfeiture. I believe that that is not a solitary case by any means, and there is no doubt that there are cases in which, I believe, not infrequently these provisions about assignment are inserted rather in the interest of the solicitor to the lessor than of the lessor himself. There was another case brought before me in which also there was an oversight on the part of the solicitor in regard to asking for a licence. There were proceedings for a forfeiture, but the forfeiture was not finally insisted upon, upon payment of a considerable sum of money. Of that sum of money not half went to the lessor. There was a charge made for an alienation fee, but there were charges made in lieu of preparation of the licence of assignment in further charge, none of which of course had ever been required, by which the solicitor to the lessor obtained something like twenty-five guineas without anything having been done. Now it has been feared that, under a provision of this sort, the landlord might not have complete protection; but I think the Court may safely be trusted to give him that. It is quite clear that a lessee, coming to a Court to be relieved of forfeiture, would be required by the Court to show that the landlord could not possibly be prejudiced, and the Court might, I think, be safely trusted to secure the landlord's interest in that respect, either by way of allowing the responsibility of the proposed tenant, or upon security that the premises should not be applied to any purposes to which they ought not to be applied. My Lords, these are the grounds upon which I ask your Lordships to assent to this Amendment, which, as I have said, after all only gives power to the Court to relieve, and only in a case where the interest forfeited is very valuable to the lessee. I had hoped that the Noble Marquess might have been induced to regard this Amendment, which is of much more limited scope than the one proposed in the Grand Committee, favourably; but of course, if he is unable to do so, although I shall regret it, I shall not certainly, after the Division which took place, propose to ask your Lordships to divide upon a proposal of this description. The main proposal was defeated, and I have made this smaller proposal to your Lordships; but, if the noble Marquess does not see his way to withdraw his opposition to that proposal, I shall not force the matter to a Division.

Amendment moved,

To leave out Sub-section (2) and insert as new Sub-section (2)—“Where a lessor is proceeding by action or otherwise to enforce a right of re-entry or forfeiture under any covenant, condition, proviso, or stipulation in a lease against assigning, underletting, or parting with the possession of the land or property leased without consent, the lessee may apply to the Court for relief, and the Court may grant or refuse relief as the Court thinks fit, and in case of relief may grant it on such terms as it thinks fit; provided that the unexpired residue of that term created by the lease exceeds seven years, and the rent reserved by the lease does not exceed one-third of the full annual value thereof.”—(The Lord Herschell.)

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I think this matter is one of more importance than the noble and learned Lord opposite imagines: And although, after the announcement with which he has closed his speech, I might fairly abstain from troubling your Lordships with any observation, I think it would be more fitting that I should just briefly state why this seems to me to be a very dangerous alteration to make. It is an alteration which was deliberately excluded from Lord Cairns' Act of 1882, the Conveyancing Act. There, while the Court was given power to relieve against several causes of forfeiture, where there was in the lease a prohibition against assignment, there the forfeiture was deliberately maintained. Therefore I think it can hardly be said that this is on all fours with recent legislation; on the contrary, it is directly opposed to the principle which recent legislation has adopted. But what I feel really is that it is applying to English leases the principle of free sale. We know what free sale is in Ireland—we do not want it in this country. Of course there may be grievances; there may be cases where the leases have been improperly framed or improperly administered. I do not for a moment wish to take up the position that on account of the landlords' rights I would resist any inquiry into some malfeasance or the adoption of any remedy that may be proposed. On the contrary, if the noble and learned Lord wishes to press for inquiry, so far as I am concerned, I shall be very glad to assist him in inquiring into the matter; but my contention is that a very wide and far-reaching change, a change of a character we know well by the experience of the sister country, is being introduced into our English law with absolutely no inquiry whatever as to the grievances needed to be redressed, or the mode in which they can be most conveniently met. Now the noble and learned Lord gave us the grounds on which he had acted. I listened to them with great curiosity. What were they? That an attorney's clerk, in drawing out a deed, had made a blunder, and in consequence great injury had accrued to the parties affected.

LORD HERSCHELL: I am sorry to interrupt the noble Marquess; but there was no blunder in drawing out the lease. The lease was drawn out in proper form. The blunder was in the oversight in not asking for the licence.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: But my point is that the grievance arose from the oversight of the attorney's clerk, and an oversight on the part of attorneys' clerks is a cause of human suffering which no action in this House can possibly remedy. It is not that the law was wrong; it is not that the law was unjust; it is not that the deed was oppressive; it is that the attorney's clerk made a blunder, and that really is the summary of the whole case on which this alteration is asked for. Now my Lords, there is something very peculiar about this bit of legislation. It has tried to do good by stealth, and blushes to find it fame. Last year this Bill was sent up to us on the very last day of the Session. It was adopted by the noble Earl opposite (Earl of Kimberley), I think wholly unconsciously as to its importance, and he asked us—I do not complain of his conduct—to pass it through all its stages on a single day. I frankly confess that until he mentioned it I had not seen the Bill. But I earnestly pressed upon your Lordships, and happily with success, not to adopt such an alteration in the existing contracts without examination. This year the Bill passed through the House of Commons in every stage after half-past Twelve at night without the slightest discussion of its details. I do not know what the force is, but there is a very strong and silent force in favour of this Bill. I have no doubt that the noble and learned Lord who brings it forward has adopted it in all good faith, and I think I am merely tracing his action to that confidence in Judges which in him is natural and graceful, though perhaps he may carry it we think to an extraordinary and extravagant length. My Lords, what this Bill does is to put the Judge in the shoes of the landlord. If a landlord inserts into a lease a condition that assignment shall not take place without his consent, he is now the master to agree or to refuse. If this Bill passes he will no longer be the master to agree or to refuse; it will always be in the power of the lessee to go to a Judge and ask the Judge to revise the landlord's decision. Now the Judges, if you tell them what they are to do, are, in this country, absolutely to be trusted. We all of us are prouder perhaps of our Judges than of any other institution in the country; but the Judges have always shrunk from unlimited discretion; they have always asked that the law should tell them what to do, and then they will do it, and invariably do do it. But in this Clause there is no guide whatever to the Judge; he is not told on what ground he is to relieve, or not to relieve; on what ground he is to protect the interests of the landlord, or the interests of the tenant. All that the clause does is, crudely and roughly, simply to put him in the place of the landlord, and to say that the Judge shall decide whether the landlord shall be allowed to refuse the assignment or not. Now my Lords, my fear as to this discretion is that the Judge will treat it simply as a pecuniary question; he will simply ask himself, Is the landlord receiving any pecuniary injury? And I maintain that in the extensive relations which exist, the various and multifold relations which exist throughout this country between landlord and tenant, there are many other questions, besides those of mere money, that are brought up when the landlord is asked whether he likes to change one tenant for another. It does not follow that because the change can take place without any injury to the landlord's purse, therefore it is one that he counted on, or that will be agreeable to him, or that he ought to be properly forced to submit to. Suppose you have let your land for eight years for a very low rent, or suppose, what often happens, that a fine has been paid on entry. Under this clause a tenant will be able to assign his lease, of course for such a consideration that will pay the fine, and absolutely to take no notice whether the landlord cares to have the new tenant or not. I ask your Lordships as men who know the relations of landlord and tenant in the country, being landlords of farms, landlords of houses, and so on, whether it will not be a serious impediment to every kind of lease if this power shall be allowed? Is it not often the case that men will not desire to have a lessee who may be very satisfactory to the out-going tenant who never sees him again, but very disagreeable to the landlord, who will have to live by him for the rest of the term? I ventured before the Standing Committee to name three cases; they are cases which may all arise under this Clause, and they seem to me to be cases in which the landlord has the right to look for protection. I will take the first, the case of a villa owner who has bought a couple of houses, as they often are, semi-detached; he lives in one and lets the other, and has let the other on a fine—on a beneficial lease. It is a matter of very serious importance to him who is his next door neighbour, separated only by a fence between one garden and the other, and he has, no doubt, chosen somebody with whom he thinks he can live out his term very pleasantly. Is it fair, without his being asked at all, without his having any remedy whatever, that somebody wholly disagreeable to him should be put in? In the same way in county society there may be somebody introduced who may cause disunion where union existed before, and who is wholly unacceptable to the people among whom he is placed. Is it fair that the landlord shall not have the power to provide against such an event? And the third, and I think the most serious case is one connected with our laws upon public morality. By the Act of 1865 the landlord is made punishable if he has knowingly permitted his house to be used for an improper purpose. Supposing a lease has been given by fine, and supposing under this Bill it is proposed to assign the lease to somebody who is very strongly suspected of having this intention, under the existing law the landlord would simply refuse it, and there would be an end of the matter. But under the law, as it is proposed to be, he will have to go into court and prove the intention to use the house for an immoral purpose; and there is all the difference and distance in the word between knowing perfectly well that a thing is true, and being able to bring witnesses into court who can prove it according to the English laws of evidence. My Lords, on these grounds I say that prima facie, in the absence of all inquiry, there is no cause for destroying the rights of the landlord; there is no injury shown which we ought to remedy at so great a cost; and that, if there really is any case of abuse, any class of misdeed against which great objection is felt, the proper course is to ask for an inquiry, to bring the cases up before your Lordships' House, and to show that there is sufficient cause for some modification of the law. I have no doubt that when sufficient cause is shown your Lordships' will be ready and willing to modify the law; but I maintain that, as no cause is shown, to do so would be both inexpedient and unjust. I, therefore, move that the new sub-section be not agreed to.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, the noble Marquess has alluded to the course I took last Session, and I wish to say a word partly in my own defence. The reason, as I stated at the time, why I undertook to bring that Bill before the House at what was no doubt the very end of the Session was that I understood, subject to correction, that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack was in favour of the Bill. It being a Bill essentially of a legal character I certainly could not have undertaken on my own responsibility to bring forward such a Bill at the end of the Session, unless I had had the belief that it was sanctioned by high legal authority. The noble and learned Lord has explained exactly his position in the matter, and I have not a word to say in complaint of what he said. I believe he generally favoured the Bill; but certainly he was not prepared to go to the full extent of recommending to the House at that moment that the Bill should pass; and, on finding that the noble and learned Lord had only given a qualified approval to the Bill, I of course did not persevere with it. My Lords, with regard to the present Clause I cannot help thinking that the noble Marquess has taken a somewhat exaggerated view of the whole matter. In the first place he said that we should be introducing free sale into this country. I entirely agree with the noble Marquess in deprecating the introduction of the principle of free sale; but surely this is not in the smallest degree the principle of free sale. That would be to say that in all cases where there was a covenant against assigning in a lease that covenant shall be held to be null and void, and that the tenant shall have the right, notwithstanding, to part with the lease to another tenant. But no such proposition as that is made. The proposition is merely to enable the Court to relieve the lessee from the consequences of what may have been an oversight.

The Marquess of Salisbury

The noble Marquess talks very lightly of the oversight of an attorney's clerk, and says that you cannot prevent the consequences of an oversight. That is exactly what we say you can do; because, if you pass a clause of this sort, you will prevent such an oversight as that. And surely everybody who is concerned with business must feel that it is a very great hardship if, when there is an oversight and nothing more, on the part of a person whom you employ to transact business which you cannot transact for yourself, we do not apply a remedy, if it be possible, to such cases. In the present instance what is the remedy proposed? Simply that remedy which exists in every case with regard to leases, except in the case of assignment, and the case of forfeiture on account of damage. The principle, therefore, upon which the Legislature has undoubtedly proceeded is to prevent the consequences of such an oversight, and to relieve the lessee from the hardship that he will incur. My noble and learned Friend (Lord Herschell) has pointed out to you that this is no imaginary case. A case came the other day as he said before the Courts, and the learned Judges in that case—who I suppose may be considered to be able to form an opinion upon a matter of that kind—gave it as their opinion that it was a case of extreme hardship, and they regretted that the state of the law was such that they could not relieve the lessee from the consequences. Why are we to distrust the Judges so much in a matter of this kind? It seems to me that supposing the proposition was made to sanction that assignment of the lease to such a tenant as the noble Marquess alluded to, who would be likely to misuse the lease, that would be a very valid ground of objection before the Court, and the Court would, I imagine in every case, require clear and ample proof that the tenant to whom the lease was to be transferred was such a tenant as could not do injury to the landlord's interest. My Lords, if the Court cannot be trusted to do that I should like to know what it can be trusted for? I should suppose that the interest of the landlord would be perfectly safe in the hands of the Court in that matter. Why should we refuse to cure this possible hardship? My Lords, I also think that in the interests of lessors it is exceedingly desirable, in the present state of public opinion on the subject of long leases, that there should not be any hardship of this kind to tenants. I feel an interest in the preservation of the rights of lessors; I feel a personal interest in it; but, what is more important, I feel that it is a matter of public interest. I do not wish the rights of property to be injured—on the contrary I earnestly desire them to be preserved; but I am perfectly certain that nothing is so likely to make the preservation of the rights of property difficult as to push the matter to the extreme where hardship arises from the law. We want to preserve the substantial right of property; but we want so to frame our laws that they shall not incidentally produce hardship on those who hold property under a superior lessor. For that reason I regret that the noble Marquess does not see his way to the introduction of this limited and very guarded Clause of my noble and learned Friend. The noble Marquess of course is master of the situation, and therefore there is nothing to be done except, as my noble and learned Friend proposed, not to press the Clause further.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I only wish to say that so far as I am concerned I think the noble Earl has a little over-stated what I said last Session. I did not express any approval of the Bill. I think the qualified approval that I gave was, when I was privately consulted upon the matter, that it seemed to me to exclude from its operation almost every lease whatsoever; and therefore I did not think it would do much harm.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Perhaps I may be allowed to explain that what I meant to say was that I understood that the noble and learned Lord was in favour of the Bill, and that that was the reason why I brought the Bill forward. The noble and learned Lord expressed his view afterwards in the House, which was very different from what I had been told.

Amendment negatived.

Bill reported as amended; and to be read 3<sup>d</sup> To-morrow.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY (EXTENSION TO LONDON, &c.) BILL (by Order.)

CONSIDERATION.

As amended, Considered.

*(3.8.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I rise to move the insertion of the Clause which stands in my name on the Paper, and I do so at the instance of the London County Council. It is, however, desirable that I should correct a statement which I find is made in the papers issued to-day by the promoters of this Bill, in which they say that the Clause I am now moving is identical with that which was submitted in Committee on the Bill. That is an entire mistake. I should not think it respectful to the Committee to propose here a Clause which that Committee had examined and rejected, and I should hardly think it prudent, having regard to the object I have in view. This which I now submit is a materially modified proposal, so much so, in fact, that it may be said to be a new Clause; and I, therefore, ask Members of the Committee and the House generally to give an unbiased consideration to the proposal I put forward. I shall not labour the point that if the Public Health Act and the Housing Act are to be effectually administered in London we must have an ample supply of cheap trains for workmen, in order to make it practicable for those whose livelihood has to be earned in London to live in the suburbs; and to provide, in part at least, for those persons who are displaced by the clearance of insanitary areas. I may quote one sentence from a communication on this subject received from Mr. Beachcroft, the Chairman of the Housing Committee of the London County Council. Mr. Beachcroft is not a member of the Progressive Party, although he enjoys, as I am sure he deserves, the respect of all parties, and therefore I think that his authority will be accepted even by hon. Gentlemen opposite, who are most virulent assailants of the London County Council. Mr. Beachcroft writes—

“While we are waiting for the Board of Trade, London is becoming more and more liable to insanitary conditions from overcrowding. Not only is the work of our Public Health Committee, but the action of Vestries is stopped by the fact that there is nowhere for the people, who are displaced, to go to.”

Mr. Beachcroft adds—

“I am hopeless of doing anything unless enormously increased travelling facilities are offered immediately.”

I do not think I need add anything to insist on the importance of providing a cheap service of trains, nor do I think I need say anything upon what I think will be admitted—that there is at the present time a most deplorable deficiency in the supply. Moreover, it is admitted that this railway will run through a district in which cheap trains for workmen will be specially required. I do not know whether this will be conceded by the promoters of the Bill, but certainly it is one of the findings of the Select Committee, because they say the most ample accommodation for workmen's trains ought to be offered, but they add that the Act of 1883 is sufficient for this purpose and ought to be operative. Now, according to the Act of 1883, how does the matter stand? Prior to that year, and at that time, it had become a tolerably general practice on the part of this House to introduce into Railway Bills clauses providing that workmen's trains should be run at special rates, the usual rate being 1d. per passenger per journey; the distances travelled being six or eight miles, or even more. I need not trouble the House with cases, but I may mention that they were given in detail by Mr. Courtenay Boyle, of the Board of Trade, in reference to the Central London Railway Bill of last year. There is one case I may for a moment refer to—that of the Great Eastern Railway Company. This House placed the Great Eastern Company under very stringent terms with regard to the fares to be charged by workmen's trains; it provided that these trains should carry workmen between Liverpool Street and New Cross, Liverpool Street and Walthamstow and Liverpool Street and

Edmonton at a penny per passenger for each journey, that is to say a penny for distances respectively of five, seven, and eight miles. I have no doubt the shareholders of the Great Eastern Company protested against that Clause as much as those interested in the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Company now protest against this Clause; but let the House notice that this very Company, which we placed under the severest conditions with regard to workmen's trains, have voluntarily gone beyond the statutory conditions we imposed, and to-day the Great Eastern is emphatically the workmen's Company—the one Company which above all others seems to regard the workmen as desirable customers. They make provision for them, and consult the needs of workmen to an extent and in a variety of ways which no other London company does. I submit, therefore, that the policy this House adopted in imposing these conditions has been amply justified in the case of the Great Eastern Company. But the promoters of this Bill say that although it would have been perfectly right before 1883 to move the insertion of such a Clause as this in a Railway Bill, the case is now altered by the passing of the Cheap Trains Act of that year. Now for a moment let me refer to the Report of the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes in 1885, because they have said something very pertinent to the argument on this point. They say—

“Your Commissioners would here endorse the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1882 as to the conditions which should be imposed for the running of workmen's trains as opportunities may offer.”

Now what is the meaning of these words “as opportunities may offer”? Surely it is clear the meaning is that where a railway company comes to this House for new powers this House ought to seize the opportunity to place that company under terms similar to those which have been imposed upon the Great Eastern Company. So I may claim that I am, in moving this Clause, only following the course which was suggested by the Royal Commission of 1885, and this will be recognised as a good authority. Beyond this I can claim in my support a precedent set by this House so recently as last year. I refer to the Central London Railway Act of 1891. In that Act it is provided that the Company shall run three trains daily each way morning and evening at fares not exceeding one penny for the journey, that is one penny for six miles. Now I notice that the promoters of this Bill in arguing against the Clause proposed in Committee upstairs said they would be placed in a very unfair position as compared with the Metropolitan Railway Company and the London and North-Western Company. But that was exactly the objection, or a very similar objection, raised by the promoters of the Central London Railway Bill last year. The counsel for the promoters put his case almost plaintively before the Committee. "You will be putting us," he said, "in a worse position than any other company, and what have we done to deserve it?" Well, the objection was not allowed to prevail in that case, and I see no reason why it should be permitted to prevail in this. Now, with regard to the adequacy of the Clause which the promoters say they have introduced to meet the equity of the case and the unfairness of this Clause, they say that whereas the Metropolitan Railway Company would be permitted to charge fourpence between Baker Street and Neasden, our proposal would only allow the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Company to charge twopence. The Clause in its amended form meets that objection because Neasden is beyond five miles from the London terminus and it would therefore be competent for the Company under this Clause to charge the same fare to Neasden which the Metropolitan Company are required by the Railway Commission to charge. Then it may be asked if we are allowing the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Company to charge the same fare in this case, what object will be gained by passing this Clause? A difference would arise so far as the intervening stations between Baker Street and Neasden are concerned. For instance, take the case of Willesden Green, where I am informed there is a considerable and growing working-class population. At present the return fare between Willesden Green and Baker Street is threepence, and under this Clause the Company will not be able to charge more than twopence. I submit that threepence, having regard to the fares charged for the longer distances on other railways, is an unreasonable fare, and that twopence would be quite as much as the Railway Company ought to charge for the distance which is only about four miles. Then secondly this Clause would require that trains should be run up to a reasonable time, eight o'clock. As a matter of fact at present these trains fall considerably short of eight o'clock, and the Royal Commission in that Report to which I referred a moment ago say that at present—that is some years ago—considerable inconvenience is experienced by workmen who find themselves compelled to travel by trains carrying them to London at seven o'clock when their work only commences at eight o'clock. Thirdly, the Clause requires that the Company shall permit a passenger taking a workman's ticket to return by any third class train. I do not conceal from the House that I make this suggestion for the convenience of the workmen, but at the same time it seems to me it is equally desirable in the interest of the Company. How does the matter stand? Having brought the workman into London, the Company are bound by their contract to carry him back again; and I think it would be an advantage for the Company to carry back as many of these passengers as possible during the hours when traffic is slack, and when, as we know, trains are frequently run almost empty. I may mention that the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company have actually adopted this enlightened policy. In the paper which has been issued by the promoters of the Bill, as well as in the arguments used before the Committee which rejected the original Clause, considerable stress is laid upon the recent decision of the Railway Commissioners in the Neasden case; but, for my own part, I think there is no particular reason to be proud of the proceedings connected with the Neasden case, because, as a matter of fact, the memorial on the subject was presented to the Board of Trade so long ago as 1889, and three years have been required to secure the remedy.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. The memorial was not presented until August last year. The memorial he is referring to was a memorial to the directors.

*MR. PICKERSGILL; No one is better entitled to speak on the subject than the hon. and learned Gentleman, and I accept his correction. But, at all events, this case has been a matter agitated and recommended on many public occasions during a period of three years, and all this time was required before there could be obtained what I consider a somewhat inadequate remedy. The Board of Trade disputes the duty which is laid upon the Department by the Cheap Trains Act of 1883, and the Commission of 1885 in that Report to which I have referred have some very pertinent and stringent observations with regard to the view of its duty which the Board of Trade has taken. They say that the Act mentions eight o'clock in the morning as the limit of the time for running workmen's trains, but that most of the trains were run before seven o'clock. It was contended that the powers under the Act should be exercised with great discretion, but the Commissioners go on to express their opinion that under the Act a bargain was struck between the nation and the railway companies, there being a remission of part of the passenger duty on the one part, and this provision of a certain number of workmen's trains on the other part. The Board of Trade, however, preferred not to look on this as a bargain, on the ground that the repeal of the passenger duty could be justified on public grounds, and the Board does not take the initiative in action for the protection of workmen's interests. But, as the Commissioners say, the opportunity was taken to give increased powers to the Board of Trade which it was intended should be from time to time exercised to put pressure on companies for the increase of this accommodation. The Commissioners found that the powers of the Board had not been extensively, if at all, exercised; that it was not the custom of the Board to take the initiative; and they suggest that the Board of Trade should enter into communication with leading Trade Councils and other representative bodies of working men for the purpose of securing to the working classes the full benefit to which they are entitled, under the Act of 1883, as to hours of trains and in other respects. But I fear the Board of Trade is but a broken reed to rely upon. If the Board of Trade has acted on this suggestion, and has put itself in communication with the London Trade Councils, I am not myself aware of the fact. In these circumstances, I think I may claim the suggestion of the Commissioners as being in support of my proposal, and, at all events, it would be desirable to adopt a clause of this kind in order that this House might set up a kind of standard of fares for workmen's trains, and perhaps the Board of Trade would thereby be stimulated to bring other companies up to that standard. I submit I have made out a strong case in favour of the Clause, for, as I have said, I am following the suggestion of the Royal Commission of 1885, and I am able to claim in my support the precedent of the Central London Railway Act of last year set by this House itself. I beg, therefore, to move the new Clause of which I have given notice.

New Clause—

(Cheap trains for workmen.)

"The Company shall and they are hereby required at all times after the opening of the Railway for public traffic to run cheap trains each way for artisans, mechanics, and other working people between the London terminus and all stations on the Railway within the distance of ten miles thereof. Such trains shall be run each way every morning in the week and every evening in the week (Sundays, Christmas Day, Good Friday, and Bank Holidays excepted.) Such up trains shall be timed to arrive at the London terminus at such times up to eight in the morning as the Company shall from time to time fix. The fares by such trains shall not exceed one penny as between the London terminus and any station within the distance of five miles, and shall not exceed two pence as between the London terminus and any station within a distance exceeding five miles up to ten miles, and the Company shall issue to passengers by such trains daily return tickets at double fares which tickets shall be available for return third class by any train. In case of any complaint made to the Board of Trade of the number of such trains or the hours appointed by the Company for the running of such trains

the said Board shall have power to fix and regulate the same from time to time. The liability of the Company under any claim to compensation for injury or otherwise in respect of each passenger travelling by such trains shall be limited to a sum not exceeding one hundred pounds,"—(Mr. Pickersgill,) —brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

(3.30.) SIR R. PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I do not propose to follow the hon. Member through the various matters he has introduced to the attention of the House and details which, though they are of interest in themselves, raise principles which are outside the scope of the proposal we have now to decide upon. The question the House has before it is, Shall we put aside the Report of the Committee in one respect and adopt in its place a clause which is now, for the first time, brought to our notice, and the terms of which only appeared on the Paper yesterday? The hon. Member has laid great stress on this: that if the House will accept his recommendation, then we shall set up a standard of fairness for the rates for workmen's trains. He invites us upon his ex parte statement to deal with a matter involving figures and questions of finance, we being utterly unacquainted with the details of railway management and the expense of working a railway; that we should accept this proposal, and embody it in an Act as a standard for future railway legislation. Now, I venture to say that is asking the House to do more than it can reasonably be expected to undertake. May I put before the House the following argument? We, the Committee upstairs deliberately, having had witnesses before us examined and cross-examined, having had the whole case thoroughly argued out by able experts having ample acquaintance with details, came to a unanimous conclusion; and I am bound to say the materials furnished by the hon. Member do not enable the House to come to a judgment setting that unanimous opinion aside. The hon. Member has very fairly stated that his proposal now differs materially from the original recommendation of the London County Council, on whose behalf I understand he speaks.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Yes.

SIR R. PAGET: It is so. The proposal does differ from the original excessive demand of the London County Council. He has omitted to mention that the first request of the Council was for the payment of £250,000 by the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company on account of street improvements. Besides this, the request of the London County Council as it came before the Committee was of exactly twice the extent of that now put forward, or, in other words, the clause of the hon. Member will allow a charge of 100 per cent. more on these workmen's trains than the original demand did. But the point in question is, Are we now to accept this clause? I venture to think it is essentially a matter to decide upon details; it cannot be dealt with here; it can only be dealt with in the proper place; and when the Bill goes before the Committee of the House of Lords, there will be the opportunity to raise and decide this question. We could come to a decision here only on the most imperfect evidence. We cannot put the General Manager in the box and examine him as to the possibilities of railway management and finance; we are not a tribunal to deal with such matters of detail, which can be effectually dealt with by a small Committee with the advantages necessarily denied to us here. There is one reason, which I will put very shortly, why the proposal of the hon. Member even in its present modified form ought not to be accepted. The clause would lay down a certain fixed fare to be charged by the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Company. The line will communicate with London through Harrow, whence the distance is ten miles. There is another railway—the London and North Western Company—having connection with Harrow, with powers under the general law, whereas the hon. Member would place this new line under a special law, reducing the amount which it could earn from this traffic. Now, whether this is desirable or not, it is obvious that it would not be just towards this railway and the Metropolitan, which Company would, in some degree, also be affected, that Company not having been heard in respect to the clause. The Company also take exception to the provision that workmen should return by any train. We had evidence from the managers that such an obligation would create such serious difficulties that they did not in all cases see how they could overcome them. This is just one of those matters of detail which can be threshed out before a Committee, but cannot in the House have the attention it deserves. One effect of this clause, also, would be to upset a decision the Railway Commission recently arrived at, a decision which dealt not only with a matter of principle, but with a particular part of the Metropolitan line, which practically will be amalgamated with this new line, or, at any rate, over which the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Company will exercise running powers. Further, the clause would introduce the anomaly of passengers travelling by the same train and class at different rates—the one travelling at the Metropolitan Company's rate, the other exercising the right this clause would give. In short, whichever way you look at it, the proposal is beset with difficulties, and I trust the House will not accept it. The Committee, having fully considered the matter, determined that it should be left to the operation of the general law, and here let me say that the general law is most simple in its application. Some of the evils of which the hon. Member has complained have no doubt arisen from the fact that the people aggrieved have not taken the trouble to use the opportunity given them or the means which the Statute has put in their power. A number of workmen have simply to meet in an informal way, draw up a formal memorial of the simplest character, present it, and the matter will be decided, the fares reduced, or the train accommodation increased. The operation of the Act is most simple. If the Act has not been effective that is because people have not resorted to it. The Committee, as I have said, fully and carefully considered this matter, and arrived at their judgment in no haste; they fully sympathised with the desire of the workmen to get the fullest benefit from the train service; with all the advantage of ample evidence and able argument they arrived at a unanimous opinion, and I hope and believe the House will support the decision the Committee came to, and will not accede to the proposal of the hon. Member.

*(3.41.) MR. LEVESON-GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): As a Member of the Committee, I express the hope that the House will concur in the view of the hon. Baronet who was Chairman. I confess that when Mr. Beachcroft first brought in the Clause proposed for adoption by the Committee, I personally felt inclined to view it with favour; and it was only when I saw that the Clause could not be introduced without causing great harm and injustice to the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway Company and also to the Metropolitan District Railway Company that, as the Chairman has said, I agreed with my colleagues on the Committee that we could not possibly accept the Clause. I am sure the hon. Member who has moved this Clause will acquit me of any desire to thwart the London County Council in any reasonable action. When we consider the two instances the hon. Member has quoted as giving precedents for this Clause, I think we must allow that those cases are not on all fours with this. In the first place, as the hon. Member has said, the Great Eastern Company have voluntarily gone beyond the provisions in their Act requiring them to run certain workmen's trains at fixed rates, and they have done this to the great convenience of the working classes as well as to their own advantage. Surely if the Company find it to their advantage to adopt such a policy we may trust the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Company to find out that it will be to their advantage to provide workmen's trains in the same voluntary fashion. Besides this, the Census Returns show that the County of Essex is one of the most rapidly increasing in population of any in the United Kingdom. Take the Romford Division as an example—the division nearest London—the increase has been from 53,000 to 102,000. In spite of the slight decrease in the agricultural divisions, the whole county shows a considerable increase.

In the case of the Central London Company, to which the hon. Member referred, there is a grave distinction from this case. In the first place, the whole length of the Central London line is to be only six miles, whereas it is proposed under this Clause to extend the fares to ten miles. In the second place, the Central Company's line will at once run through a densely-populated district. I do not think I need dwell upon the objections to the Clause, and I hope the House will confirm the unanimous decision the Committee came to.

*(3.42.) MR. J. BLUNDELL MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich): I add the expression of my hope that the House will reject the Clause. For some time I have taken an interest in this question of workmen's trains, and the House will allow me to state that I have received a letter from the Metropolitan Railway Company signed by their General Manager, Colonel Bell, in the presence of their Chairman and the Chairman of the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Company to the following effect:—

"On behalf of the Metropolitan Railway Company we will undertake as from the 1st proximo to adopt the following scale of fares for our workmen's trains, viz:—For distances of five miles and under, 2d.; for distances from five miles up to ten miles, 4d.; for distances from ten miles and up to 15 miles, 6d.; including the return journey in each case. Daily and weekly tickets on this basis."

Now, this offers far better terms than the hon. Member proposes by his Clause, and it applies to the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Company, because by Clause 105 in the Bill it is provided that the Company shall in respect to workmen's trains between their London terminus and Neasden, including intermediate stations, be entitled to charge no fares higher than for the time being are chargeable and charged by the Metropolitan Railway by their workmen's trains between Baker Street and Neasden, and intermediate stations. So not only will workmen succeed in getting what is asked by the Clause from the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Company, but the rate of twopence, including the return fare for every five miles, will apply to distances up to 15 miles. I submit, therefore, the House need no longer be occupied with the discussion of the proposed Clause.

(3.49.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I think I shall best consult the convenience of the House by not entering upon details after the exhaustive analysis in the speech of the Chairman of the Committee, and after the Committee, upon the result of two days' examination, came to the decision that such a clause should not be introduced. I think it must be clear that it is utterly impossible to entertain the clause, considering that so very recently the rates at which workmen are to be carried on the Metropolitan line over which the Company will have to run, have been fixed by the Railway Commission. We have, then, the security of Clause 105 that the rates shall be identical, and we have the authoritative decision of the Railway Commission. Then, further, after the letter which the hon. Member for Camberwell (Mr. Maple) has just read, I do not think the House can possibly be justified in inserting the clause. The Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Company would not agree to the clause, and the arrangement just referred to will give better terms to those interested than the clause would give. Taking these matters into consideration, I do not think the House will be disposed to revise the decision of its Committee. After all, it must be remembered this is a question of finance; and it is utterly impossible for us here, even if we wished to do so, to form any opinion as to the ability of a Railway Company to carry at any given rate unless we have the evidence of managers and experts to guide us. Such evidence the Committee had, and then their decision was unanimous. If the London County Council are not satisfied with the proposal conveyed in the letter read by the hon. Member opposite, then the Council can raise the question again, and it can be fully and fairly discussed before the Committee of the other House. I think the House may now decide to support the finding of its Committee.

(3.52.) MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I think, probably, my hon. Friend (Mr. Pickersgill) may be satisfied, after hearing the letter read, that the promoters of the Bill are prepared to concede something in the direction indicated by the clause.

MR. BLUNDELL MAPLE: More.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: I do not want to overstate the case; I only want to say that my hon. Friend is justified in the action he has taken. It is a considerable concession, and I do not suppose my hon. Friend will go to a Division. But there remains the question of running these trains up to eight o'clock. These trains run through a district rapidly growing, and already largely populated by people whose work commences not at six o'clock, but at eight o'clock in the morning. I refer to the Willesden Green district particularly. These men are employed in the large houses in the City and elsewhere; they are packers, porters, warehousemen, and so on, and I think it is only right that they should have the means of using these cheap trains at the time they are required.

*(3.54.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I understand that the hon. Member (Mr. Pickersgill) has made some reference to the action or inaction of the Board of Trade. I think it may be of interest to state that the London County Council have made a most exhaustive and searching inquiry into the number of workmen's trains running to and from the different London termini, and matters relating thereto, and certain recommendations for improvements in these matters may be found in the Report. If I may say so, the inquiry does the Council great credit. The Report has been sent to me, and I have taken immediate steps to communicate with the railway companies; but before I express any final opinion I ought to hear what they have to say. I have no doubt that the result will be beneficial.

*(3.55.) MR. PICKERSGILL: Although the proposal, which I understand is put forward with authority, will more than meet the demand in respect to fares, the views of the County Council are not met on the other points—the times of trains and the return journey. Having regard, however, to the concession, which I acknowledge is of a most substantial character, I beg leave to withdraw the Clause.

Motion, and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill to be read the third time.

STANDING COMMITTEE (LAW, &C.)

Ordered, That the Standing Committee on Law, &c., have leave to print and circulate with the Votes the Minutes of their Proceedings and any amended Clauses of Bills committed to them.—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

QUESTIONS.

MACCLESFIELD SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the Macclesfield School Board, which possesses no day school of its own, now proposes to form central classes for the instruction of pupil teachers of voluntary schools, and to subsidise such classes from the rates; and whether the School Board has power to carry these proposals into effect?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am aware that the Macclesfield School Board have propounded some such scheme as that described by my hon. Friend, but the Department have no power to sanction it, and it will be for the local auditor to decide how far any application of public money to such an object is legal.

JURORS IN COUNTY ANTRIM.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that at the Assizes recently held in Belfast 300 special jurors were summoned for the trial of two criminal cases, many of whom attended them at great inconvenience from distant parts of the county on 17th, 24th, 28th, 29th, and 30th March before being finally discharged; that upon the entire jury panel being challenged it transpired that the larger portion of those upon the jury lists for County Antrim are never called upon to serve on any jury; whether the Judge, Baron Palles, when holding that the jury were properly summoned, is correctly reported to have commented upon the state of things in County Antrim, which, owing to the state of the law, he could not interfere with, and to have stated that the Clerk of the Crown had informed him that were all the jurors of the county to serve in rotation the list would not be exhausted for some 17 or 18 years; and whether the Government will introduce a Bill to amend the law under which such an anomaly exists in County Antrim, and thus relieve a small minority of the jurors in the county from having to perform the duties of the entire number?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): My attention has been called to the case referred to, both by the question and by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Antrim. The facts are substantially as stated. I shall be glad to consider whether it would be possible to amend the provisions of the Jury Act of 1871, so as to avoid what is in many cases undoubtedly a hardship.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Can the right hon. Gentleman state the reason why Belfast, the second city in Ireland, has not jurisdiction of its own, while very small towns have distinct jurisdiction?

MR. MADDEN: That, of course, is a separate question, which I shall be glad to consider; but the difficulty referred to arises from the practical effect of the 19th section of the Jury Act of 1871, which is at present in operation, and which does not necessitate the exhaustion of the entire list of jurors. The matter is a complicated one.

GREENOCK PAROCHIAL BOARD.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the facts connected with the election of its Committee of Management by the Greenock Parochial Board on 17th March; whether it is true that, while the Board contains about 1,200 members, and 68 were present at the meeting, 1,547 mandates, purporting to be signed by members, were handed in in support of two competing lists of committee men; whether he is aware that, on a scrutiny, which extended over 21 sittings, and lasted to 25th April, 567 of the mandates were pronounced good and 980 rejected, as being signed in duplicate, or by persons who were not members of the Board; whether he is aware that, after the scrutiny, the whole of the mandates were handed back to the persons who had tendered them as votes, on the ground that the Board had no right either to retain or destroy them; and whether the law of Scotland contains any provision for preventing voting frauds, through vote by mandate, being perpetrated or attempted with impunity?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): My attention had not been called to the election of the Committee of Management of the Greenock Parochial Board on 17th March last; and I have no information as to the accuracy of the statements made in the question of the hon. Member. If he desires to obtain such information I shall be glad to get it for him; but I must point out to him that there is no reason to assume that any fraud was committed as suggested by the hon. Member, even although votes were rejected as stated in the question.

DR. CAMERON: Did I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that there are no means of stopping it?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I said there was no reason to assume that any fraud was committed as suggested in the question, although votes were rejected as stated.

DR. CAMERON: I shall repeat the question, and in the meantime might I ask the right hon. Gentleman to look into the question whether or not there were more votes tendered than there were members?

MISS ROBINSON AND ARMY CHAPLAINS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he is aware that for many years Miss Robinson has devoted herself to mission work in the Army at Portsmouth with much acceptance; if he will explain why Miss Robinson's meetings in barracks at Portsmouth have been forbidden at the request of the Chaplain, and her ladies have been refused permission to visit the hospital at Netley, and whether the Army

Chaplains are trying to stop the distribution of religious tracts in barracks; and whether he is aware that there exists at the present moment among many of the senior Chaplains great dissatisfaction with the conduct of the Chaplain General?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I am aware of the good work which Miss Robinson has carried on for many years at Portsmouth, and inquiries are being made with regard to the alleged interference with her meetings in barracks there. Soldiers of all denominations are treated at Netley Hospital, and the Chaplains of all denominations objected to the distribution of tracts by outside visitors on the ground that the peace and harmony now prevailing would be disturbed. The Secretary of State is not aware that there is among the Chaplains dissatisfaction with the conduct of the Chaplain General. On the contrary, the recent attacks upon him in certain newspapers have called forth spontaneous expressions of confidence in his administration from all classes of Chaplains employed under him.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that this Chaplain General, contrary to the Army Regulations, issued a circular to the Chaplains, in which it was stated that they must not look for any superannuation or any benefit unless they expressed their confidence in him?

MR. BRODRICK: I am not aware of any such circular; but if the hon. Member submits a question, I will endeavour to answer it.

THE NORTH SEA FISHERIES CONVENTION.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the French Government have given legislative effect to the North Sea Fisheries Convention, signed at the Hague on the 16th November, 1887, by the Representatives of all the European Maritime Powers; if not, what is the present position of other Maritime Powers in respect to grog boats sailing under the French flag in the North Sea; and what steps, if any, have been taken to obtain the ratification of the Convention of the French Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): The French Government have not yet, I regret to say, seen their way to ratify the Convention. It has, however, been submitted to the Chamber; and it is hoped that in the interests of the fishermen of all the nationalities which take a part in the North Sea Fisheries, the Chamber may be able to assent to the unanimous conclusions of the Conference. Until the assent of the French Government is given, the Convention does not come into operation. The Netherlands Government, as the Government of the Power which convened the Conference, is charged with the duty of obtaining the ratification of the Convention, and I have no reason to suppose that it will not endeavour to obtain the ratification of the French Government, in order to put an end as soon as possible to the evils justly complained of and universally admitted to exist.

DOCKYARD POLICE.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the members of the Dockyard Police, incorporated with the Metropolitan Police, living in Government quarters are entitled to their quarters free of charge without any deduction being made from their pay in respect of lodgings; and whether this applies to all the members of the Dockyard Police, or to which of them it is confined?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham E.): The Metropolitan Police doing duty in dockyards are not entitled to their quarters free of charge; but a week's deduction according to rank is made in the pay of those for whom quarters are provided. Certain members of the old Dockyard Police who were transferred to the Metropolitan Police 1860 retained free quarters; but the last of these has now been reported to be unfit for further duty on medical grounds, and his papers have been sent for pension.

REMUNERATION OF MILITARY WARDERS.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Department if he can state what steps are being taken to place chief and other warders of Her Majesty's Military Prison Service on the same pay, allowances, and rates of pension as those in local prisons; and when any such change will be made?

MR. BRODRICK: A scheme for assimilating the emoluments of warders in military prisons to those of warders in civil prisons is at present under consideration, and has been submitted to the Treasury.

THE INEBRIATES ACTS COMMITTEE.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it will be competent for the Committee which he has appointed to inquire into the working of the Inebriates Acts to consider whether the penal enactments for drunkenness might not be extended, either as regards the amount of punishment for the "drunk and disorderly," or as regards the application of the law to proved cases of habitual drunkenness, even not necessarily in a public place; and, if not, whether he will extend the Reference to such Committee so as to include such considerations?

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not think it is expedient to extend the order of Reference to the Committee to the first suggestion of my hon. Friend. I think the second suggestion will be within the province of the Committee. The order of Reference relates exclusively to the treatment of habitual drunkards.

THE CALCULATION OF THE FEE GRANT.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the action of the Department in calculating the amount of the fee-grant on the average attendance of the whole year, and to the loss thereby incurred by certain schools which have placed themselves under the provisions of the Elementary Education Act, 1891, before the close of their school year, but whose average attendance is largest towards the end of the year; whether the average attendance, as defined by the Act and the minutes in force at its commencement, is so limited, or is "for any period," and in this case, therefore, for the fraction of the school year during which these schools have been under the Act; whether, on the other hand, the average rate of fees permitted to be charged under Section 2, Sub-section (2), is directed to be calculated upon a whole school year, but, nevertheless, at the end of the first quarter, the Department has ruled the fee-income received to be in excess, and thus these schools have incurred a further loss, in consequence of the fee-grant being further reduced under Section 1, Sub-section (2); and whether the effect of this reduction will be to bring the fee-income of these schools below what it was before the passing of the Act?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: Section 1 of the Act provides that the fee-grant shall be paid at the rate of 10s. a year for each child in average attendance, which is held to mean the average attendance for the school year irrespective of the date from which the school complied with the conditions of the Act, and the Department are advised that in framing regulations accordingly they acted on a correct interpretation of the Act. Upon the other point the case stands on a different footing, inasmuch as until a school year has been completed it is admitted that the Section provides no test for ascertaining with precision whether the conditions are being complied with, and the Department has therefore agreed to remit any deductions under this head, if at the end of the next school year it appears that the fees charged for the concluding months of the previous one were within the limits prescribed by the Act. I may also remind my noble Friend that the question involved in either point is of no permanent importance, as the whole difficulty is incidental to the fact that up to this date only fractional periods of a year have come under the operation of the Act.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE : With regard to the calculation of the average attendance, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has consulted the law officers of the Crown as to whether his interpretation is a proper one ; and if not will he do so in order to save the trouble and expense of litigation on the point ?

*SIR W. HART DYKE : We have not gone so far as to consult the law officers, but we have taken a legal opinion, in which I have perfect confidence. If necessary, I do not object to consult them.

IRISH HOLDINGS.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the tenants of the Belville Estate, County Antrim, purchased their holdings from Lady Harberton at 17½ years' purchase in 1887, and that all applications were lodged with the Land Purchase Commissioners in 1889, and ruled as satisfactory both as to security and title, and yet the matter has not been completed ; what is the cause of this delay ; and when will the purchase date from ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : The Land Commissioners report that the agreements for sales on the Estate referred to were lodged at dates ranging from October, 1889, to October, 1890. The advances were provisionally sanctioned at dates ranging from June, 1890, to April, 1891. Rulings on title were issued on 18th April, 1891. The Commissioners added that the cause of delay is that the solicitors for the vendor have not yet complied with the rulings of title or proceeded under the provision of Section 14 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887. No advance can be made until one or other of these courses has been taken.

MR. McCARTAN (Down, S.) : Seeing the delay is not due to any default of the tenant, cannot the right hon. Gentleman suggest to the Land Commissioners to bring some pressure to bear ?

MR. PINKERTON (Galway) : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that only two cases remain undecided under that decision, and yet that the bulk of the tenants are prevented from purchasing, owing to the informality of these particular cases ?

MR. JACKSON : I am afraid I do not understand the point. As regards the delay, I have stated that it was on the part of the vendor's solicitors. I am not aware that we have any power to accelerate proceedings. I will suggest that one of two courses might be adopted—either by Section 14 of the Land Law Act, 1887, or by complying with the rulings of title.

MR. McCARTAN : Do I understand that if the landlord does not wish to carry out the sale, there are no means by which the Land Commissioners can make him do so ?

MR. JACKSON : That is a legal question.

MR. PINKERTON : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the tenants' solicitor has been writing daily in order to get the sale effected, but that frivolous objections have been put forward by the Land Purchase Commissioners ?

MR. JACKSON : I did not say any delay had been caused by the tenants' solicitor ; I said the vendor's solicitor.

SUPPRESSION OF MEETINGS IN CORK.

MR. SEXTON (for MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN, Cork Co., N.E.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the police were upon last Sunday week, for the second time, furnished with copies of proclamations to be used in suppressing any attempt of the ~~the~~ <sup>the</sup> Member for North Cork to address his constituents at Ballyclough ; and what right the police swear in ~~in~~ <sup>for</sup> (Mr. The particular meetings, of which ~~in dock~~ <sup>in dock</sup> announcement is made, and ~~quarters~~ <sup>quarters</sup> informations for the purpose ~~reduction~~ <sup>reduction</sup> cising a general right of sup ~~the pay~~ <sup>the pay</sup> public meetings in a district ? ~~are pro~~ <sup>are pro</sup>

MR. persons who had taken evicted farms—the responsible authorities forthwith took the necessary steps to prevent such illegal meeting being held.

MR. SEXTON: I desire to know whether the Irish Government claim the right on information with regard to a particular meeting to prevent all meetings in that district whatever their object.

MR. JACKSON: In regard to both meetings, the Authorities acted on information as to each. I think there can be no question about what was intended to be done, because I find the Cork Examiner, in the report of a meeting which had been held, reported that the chairman, in opening the proceedings, said he thought nothing could be of greater importance than the holding of that meeting, which was called for the purpose of denouncing land grabbing. He was speaking the truth in stating that notwithstanding the force on the ground they had successfully held their meeting. The importance of that meeting could not be gainsaid, inasmuch as one of the most glaring cases of land grabbing which had occurred for a period of ten years had taken place in their midst.

MR. SEXTON: Do the Government upon a political speech assume the character of any political meeting summoned in the district?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir. I am speaking of the report of a speech which was delivered after the proceedings had taken place. The opinion they had as to the holding of the meeting was, I believe, correct; indeed, it was proved to be correct by the subsequent proceedings.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Is that the kind of evidence upon which the Government are prepared to interfere in Ireland with the right of public meeting?

MR. JACKSON: I am not confined to that evidence. I had sworn evidence before the meeting took place.

IRISH EVICTION RETURNS.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will assent to a Return of all evicted farms in Ireland from July, 1886, showing how many were at that time occupied by tenants other than the parties evicted, and how many have been since taken by such new tenants?

MR. JACKSON: I find that applications for similar Returns have never been granted, and I do not feel able to assent to the Return.

MR. SEXTON: As the General Election is near I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will not consider the propriety of affording the public some means of judging whether coercionist government has not failed in its object?

MR. JACKSON: I have no doubt the hon. Member and his friends will keep them carefully informed on the matter.

FRANCIS KANE'S FAIR RENT APPLICATION.

MR. PINKERTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland with reference to the fair rent application of Francis Kane in respect of a farm held under the Trustees of the Ballycastle Charities, whether his attention has been called to the decision of the County Antrim Sub-Commission, as published in the Ballymoney Free Press of the 7th April last; whether he is aware that the Sub-Commission avowedly dismissed the application, not on its merits, but on an allegation that the tenant had failed to point out the entire holding to the visiting Commissioners, and that the tenant denies that he had failed to do so, and notwithstanding, and without any notice to him or his solicitor to appear before the Commission, the application was dismissed on the ground of "the unreasonable conduct of the tenant"; whether he will give a copy of the Report so acted upon by the Commission, and also the name of the person who made it; and whether, even now, an opportunity will be given Mr. Kane of answering the charge which was acted upon behind his back, and which he declares to be groundless?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the Chairman of the Sub-Commission in announcing his decision had before him, as he then stated, the personal representation of his colleagues who had inspected the holding that the tenant had abstained from showing the entire holding. It is open to the tenant to appeal against the decision, which I understand as a matter of fact he has entered.

REVENUE OFFICERS AND AGRICULTURAL RETURNS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been called to a letter in the Daily News of the 12th April, signed "A Revenue Officer," regarding the collection of Agricultural Returns without remuneration by Revenue officers, and stating that many competent and zealous Revenue officers have been punished or dismissed for failing in this duty; and whether he will cause such inquiry to be made into the means of collection of such statistics, or suspend the collection of these Returns by Revenue officers until provision can be made by Parliament enabling the police and overseers, as being the best qualified agents, to perform the duty efficiently?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square) (who replied): In reply to the hon. Member, I may refer him to my answer of 26th February to the hon. Member for North Roscommon. When special remuneration for the collection of these statistics ceased, a new and improved scale of salary was introduced, which was considered sufficient to cover this duty as well as all other duties demanded from Revenue officers. As regards the last part of the hon. Member's question, I would refer him to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Agriculture on 25th February.

MR. CONYBEARE: In view of the great dissatisfaction this question is causing both to the farmers and to the Revenue officers, I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the officers have great difficulties placed in the way of collection of these Returns, because, when they step on the farmers' land, they are treated as trespassers? Being unable to obtain the Returns from the farmers, who are not compelled by law to fill up the schedules, the officers have to fill up the Returns by guess-work. Therefore they are valueless.

MR. GOSCHEN: I believe the President of the Board of Agriculture is, on the whole, satisfied with the preparation of these Returns. Of course, it is a question whether it would not be desirable to make the return compulsory. The matter is one of some difficulty, however.

MR. CONYBEARE: I am not satisfied with the matter, although the right hon. Gentleman appears to be. I wish to ask whether he would have any objection to this collection being transferred to the Department of the Minister for Agriculture. As the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) is not in his place, I give notice that I will put a similar question to him when he is here.

DR. KENNY'S SALARY.

MR. McCARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the letter of Dr. Redmond in the British Medical Journal of 2nd April last, on the action taken by the Local Government Board with reference to the increase of the salary of Dr. M. J. Kenny, Medical Officer, Lismore Union, of the Tullow District; on what grounds did the Local Government Board refuse to sanction the increase of £20 in Dr. Kenny's salary, which was recommended by the Dispensary Committee, after careful investigation, and unanimously approved by the Board of Guardians; whether the Guardians, for good reasons stated, requested the Local Government Board in vain to reconsider its decision; and whether, considering that it is the only district in the Union having two dispensaries, the great increase of work, and the fact that his predecessor was paid the increased salary voted by the Board of Guardians to Dr. Kenny, he will now cause the decision to be reconsidered?

MR. JACKSON: I have seen the published letter referred to by the hon. Member. The grounds upon which the Local Government Board felt themselves unable to sanction the proposed increase of salary to the Medical Officer mentioned were stated in my reply to a question put by the hon. Member for Waterford, W., on 5th inst. The Local Government Board have given every consideration to the matter, and it may be pointed out that of the four districts comprising the Union of Tullow, Dr. Kenny's district, is the smallest, both as regards area and population.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Is it not a fact that the local Guardians, and everybody with opportunity for inquiry into the matter, view the case favourably? I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will not request the Local Government Board to reconsider this question?

MR. JACKSON: I have already stated that the Local Government Board have carefully considered this question.

DR. TANNER: I will raise it on the Estimates—when they come.

LARNE WORKHOUSE.

MR. McCARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to Colonel Spaight's Report on the state of Larne Workhouse, in which, among other complaints, he states that the cells for idiots were "awfully cold" during the winter, and were "most dangerous" to the patients, and also complained of the "scarcity of nurses," which was keenly felt in the infirmary; whether his attention has been called to a report in the Irish News of Thursday last of the proceedings at the last weekly meeting of the Larne Board of Guardians, wherein the Chairman is reported to have stated, regarding the last question asked on this subject, that the Clerk of the Union, in reply to the inquiry of the Local Government Board, had said "a whole lot and had given no answer at all," and moreover "that Dr. Rillen did certainly agree with the most of what Colonel Spaight complained of," and whether he will now state what were the complaints made by Colonel Spaight, and what steps have been taken to remedy the same?

MR. JACKSON: The Local Government Inspector reported that the cells for the idiots in Larne Workhouse were wretchedly cold; but he did not describe them as "most dangerous."

He called attention to the infirmary nurse being left without sufficient assistance. The Clerk of the Union supplied the Board with all the information he was required to furnish. The Inspector also called attention to the absence of a bath in the hospital and to certain sanitary defects in the Workhouse. It is the case that the Medical Officer agreed generally with the Inspector. The Guardians have taken steps to obviate the insufficiency of assistance to the nurse and to remedy the other defects complained of, and the only question that now remains open is as regards the provision of a close range for the kitchen and the improvement of the quarters for the idiots. The Local Government Board have addressed the Guardians again on the latter point, and the letter was to have been before the Guardians yesterday.

ULSTER FARMERS AND THE COMPULSORY SALE OF LAND.

MR. McCARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report in the Northern Whig of 20th April last, of a meeting of Presbyterian farmers, presided over by Mr. Carr, J.P., at Killyleagh, County Down, on the previous day; and whether, considering that a resolution was unanimously adopted declaring it to be "absolutely necessary" to have a law passed to compel the landlords to sell to the tenants their holdings at a fair price, and having in view the strong feeling of discontent among the farmers of Ulster, he will now consider the desirability of introducing a Bill to amend the law relating to the sale of land in Ireland? I wish to supplement my question by this inquiry: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the secretary of this meeting declared himself to be a Unionist, and is reported to have said the Government must either pass a Compulsory Sale Bill for the farmers of Ulster or grant Home Rule? Which alternative is the Government prepared to take?

MR. JACKSON: I think it must be obvious that the Government must form their own conclusions as to the necessity of passing a Compulsory Land Bill; and I am not aware of any intention on the part of the Government to propose to Parliament a measure dealing with compulsory sale and purchase.

ESTREATMENT OF RECOGNIZANCES AT RATHFURLAND.

MR. McCARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report in the Newry Telegraph of the 2nd April last, of proceedings at Petty Sessions, Rathfurland, where it appears that two men, named Dubby Smith and Patrick McEvoy, had violated the conditions of their recognizances previously entered into; that Smith, who was bound himself in £10, and two sureties in £5 each, was merely fined in 10s., and his sureties in 5s. each, while McEvoy, who was bound in only £5, and two sureties of £2 10s. each, had his recognizances estreated, and the two sureties had to pay £2 10s. each; and whether he will explain why Smith, who had been bound over in the larger amounts, was treated so leniently, while McEvoy and his sureties were obliged to pay the full amount?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the circumstances of the two cases referred to were wholly different. As regards Smith, he was convicted and fined 21s. for being drunk and disorderly during the period he was under bail. For this offence, in addition to the fine, his bail bonds were estreated to the amount stated in the question. McEvoy was committed for trial for assault and for using a knife, and admitted to bail. He absconded before the holding of the Petty Sessions, and his recognizances were accordingly estreated.

THE ASSAULT ON LEMUEL HUGHES.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the decision of the Bench of Magistrates at the Rhyl Police Court last month in the case where two men were charged with grievously assaulting Lemuel Hughes, an old man of 70 years of age, by kicking him, after knocking him down, until he was completely dazed and almost rendered insensible, for which they were only fined 10s. each; whether he is aware that there were twelve previous convictions against one of them, including a conviction for assaulting the police; while the other defendant had not yet paid the fine for a previous conviction; and whether he will consider the expediency of amending the law so that more severe punishments may in future be inflicted for assaults of this nature?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have received a report from the Magistrates' Clerk concerning this case, together with a copy of the evidence taken at the hearing. I gather from this information that the complainant by no means suffered to the extent mentioned in the question, and that he himself inflicted a violent blow on one of the defendants. The Magistrates inform me that before passing sentence they carefully considered the previous convictions, and that the convictions particularly referred to in this question took place nine years ago. The fine imposed on each prisoner was 10s. and 7s. 3d. costs, or, in default, 14 days' imprisonment, with hard labour. There appears to me to be no sufficient ground for interfering with the sentences in this case, nor for an amendment of the law as to punishment for assaults.

ASSIMILATION OF UNION RETURNS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the Clerk of the Union of Strabane last year published the removals in the Tyrone part of the Union and not in the East Donegal portion; and whether he will be willing to furnish a Return showing the Unions in Ireland in which the English practice as to registration of successive inhabitant occupiers is carried out?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the practice is as stated. The Clerk of the Union in Donegal adopted the course stated, in consequence of an expression of opinion of the County Court Judge on the law relating to qualification by succession.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will take steps to see that a uniform practice is followed in all the Unions of Ireland?

Mr. Jackson

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware that I have any power to interfere.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman favour the assimilation of the practice in Ireland to that in England?

MR. JACKSON: I understand it is rather a question of law and as such could have been easily decided.

THE UNITED STATES AND NEW- FOUNDLAND CONVENTION.

MR. FRANCIS EVANS (Southampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs upon what day he will lay upon the Table the correspondence which has passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Newfoundland, respecting the proposed Convention recently agreed between the Governments of the United States and of Newfoundland?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this question. Papers will be laid as soon as the interests of the Public Service permit.

MR. FRANCIS EVANS: Am I to understand that in a question so closely affecting the immediate welfare of the people of Newfoundland a more definite answer cannot be given by the Government?

BARON H. DE WORMS: It would be contrary to precedent to present Papers while negotiations are in progress.

MR. FRANCIS EVANS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have declined to assent to the Convention between the United States Government and the Government of Newfoundland?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The answer to the hon. Member's question is in the affirmative. Her Majesty's Government have not been able to depart from the position which they have taken up that the negotiation of a Convention between the United States and Newfoundland must proceed pari passu with the negotiation of an arrangement between Canada and the United States.

MR. FRANCIS EVANS: Do I understand the hon. Gentleman to say that the Government have declined to assent to the Convention?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Yes, Sir, they have declined to assent on the ground I have stated.

IRISH FISHERY HARBOUR LOANS.

MR. MALLOCK (Devon, Torquay): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having regard to the terms on which loans may be advanced for the purchase of land in Ireland under the Act of last Session, and to the terms on which it is proposed that loans may be advanced to County Councils under the Small Agricultural Holdings Bill now before Parliament, he will consider the advisability of modifying the Treasury Minute, dated 4th May, 1887, on Harbour Loans so that loans may be advanced to fishery harbours on more favourable terms than are authorised by that Minute?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The rate at which loans can be advanced for various purposes by the State depends not only upon the rate at which the State can borrow, but on the security which can be afforded. Where there is experience that bad debts are incurred, it is necessary to fix the loans with some reference to the ultimate result to the State. The case of harbours, to which the Minute in question applied, shows generally that the rates at which money has been advanced have not been more than sufficient to insure the State against loss, even if it should ultimately be proved that they have been sufficient, which is extremely doubtful.

MR. MALLOCK: Does that apply to loans advanced on collateral security?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Taking all the loans together—and no loans have been advanced without some kind of security—it seems extremely doubtful whether it will not be necessary to write off something as bad debts.

MANUFACTURE OF CORDITE.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any other patents of smokeless powder besides cordite have been assigned to him as being the inventions of officers in the employ of the War Office; whether any other smokeless powder is being manufactured at any of the Government factories which, in the event of cordite not giving satisfaction, could be resorted to; on what grounds he decided that the cordite patent should no longer be secret; in what foreign countries Sir Frederick Abel and Professor Dewar have patented cordite; and whether any arrangement has been made by him with Sir Frederick Abel as to the profits of the foreign patents?

MR. BRODRICK: Cordite is the only smokeless powder the patent for which has been assigned to the Secretary of State, and no other form of smokeless powder is in course of manufacture in the Government factories. It will be necessary to give trade firms licence to manufacture cordite under the patent, and it is not considered necessary to keep the specification any longer secret. It is not known at the War Office in what foreign countries the inventors have patented cordite, and no arrangement has been made with them as to the profits under foreign patents.

THE EXPLOSIVES COMMITTEE.

MR. BAUMANN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War on what date the Explosives Committee was appointed; what were the terms of Reference to that Committee; and when it was dissolved?

MR. BRODRICK: The Explosives Committee was appointed on 10th July, 1888, and was dissolved on 10th July, 1891. The Reference to the Committee was the consideration of questions relating to new explosive agents or to new applications of, or improvements in, explosive agents already known, if such questions were referred to the Committee by order of the Commander-in-Chief.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON VACCINATION.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is his intention to propose legislation to give effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Vaccination?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I must ask the hon. Member to defer the question, as the Government has not had the opportunity of considering the Report of the Royal Commission.

QUALIFICATIONS OF GUARDIANS AND VESTRYMEN.

SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, with reference to an interview reported in the Times of Wednesday, the 4th inst., which a deputation of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Unions Associations had with him, and to suggestions made by that deputation in regard to his assenting to the Second Reading of the Bills now down for consideration, dealing with the property qualification in the case of Guardians of the Poor and Vestrymen, whether he will on behalf of the Government consent to these Bills being read a second time together, and referred to a Select Committee?

MR. RITCHIE: It is the case that a deputation urged me to assent to the Second Reading of the two Bills referred to, on the condition that they should go to a Select Committee. As to the rating qualification for Vestrymen, I do not think it can be maintained, looking to the fact that no similar qualification is required for either Town Councils or County Councils. At the same time, I think the matter is one which ought more properly to be dealt with in a District Councils Bill. The question of Guardians' qualification stands on a different footing. It cannot be considered as quite satisfactory that the amount should vary so much as it does in different Unions; and if the Government consider it desirable, the Government would offer no opposition to the Bills being read a second time and referred to a Select Committee, on the understanding that they must assent to the principle of the qualification for Guardians of the Poor, but merely that the conditions of the qualification be put into effect.

APPLICATION FOR A TELEGRAPH OFFICE AT CULDAFF.

MR. MAGUIRE (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether an application has been made to the Government for a telegraph office at Culdaff, County Donegal; whether the Electoral Divisions of Culdaff, Carthage, and Gleneely, in the Innishowen Union, are asked to give a guarantee to support the same; whether he is aware that the said application has been made without the knowledge or consent of the ratepayers of the said divisions, and that a memorial is being signed by the ratepayers against the giving of the said guarantee; and whether he will grant such application pending the ratepayers being afforded an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon the same at the next election for Poor Law Guardians?

MR. JACKSON: Such an application was received from the Innishowen Board of Guardians, who are the Rural Sanitary Authority empowered to give guarantees for the cost of telegraph offices, and they resolved to guarantee the sum required by the Post Office for a telegraph station at Culdaff, Donegal. A draft agreement was sent to the Board accordingly. The Department has no official cognisance of the contributory Unions, and I have no right to question the competency of the Statutory Authority to conclude such an agreement.

THE REPORT OF THE INSPECTORS OF IRISH FISHERIES.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the cause of the delay in presenting the Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries for the year 1891, which, by the 112th section of 5 and 6 Vic., c. 106, is directed to be laid before each House of Parliament within three weeks after the commencement of the Session: and whether, since such a Return would be of manifest importance to the Select Committee on Salmon Fisheries, it will be given without further delay?

MR. JACKSON: The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries state that the Report for the year 1891 is complete, and directions have been given to the printers to furnish the copies for presentation to Parliament forthwith.

DR. TANNER: What is the cause of the delay?

MR. JACKSON: The reason is that they could not be got ready sooner.

DR. TANNER: Is it not rather incompetence on the part of the authorities, or want of application on the part of the Chief Secretary?

RATHVILLY TELEGRAPH STATION.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a guarantee is invariably demanded from districts in which it is proposed to establish telegraph stations, and whether any guarantee was required for Kiltegan, County Wicklow; and, if not, why a guarantee is insisted upon for the proposed telegraph station at Rathvilly, County Carlow?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): I am sorry to say that a mistake was made in asking for a guarantee for the telegraph station at Rathvilly, and it will be established without guarantee.

THE SHANNON FISHERMEN.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any reply has been given to the representations forwarded by the Shannon fishermen of Limerick to the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries many months ago, in which the fishermen complain of certain byelaws which they seek to have altered; and whether any investigation of the case will be made, or any public inquiry thereinto held?

MR. JACKSON: The Inspectors of Fisheries have received a memorial from certain representative fishermen praying that a bye-law be made permitting the use of nets of greater length than is at present allowed in the River Shannon. The Inspectors propose to hold an inquiry into these matters as soon as practicable.

REVISING BARRISTERS IN IRELAND.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will have any objection to grant a Return giving the names of the Revising Barristers appointed in 1891, the constituencies in which their sittings were held, and the total number of days they were employed in the revision work?

MR. JACKSON: There will be no objection on the part of the Government to grant the Return relating to Revising Barristers of the nature indicated should the hon. Member desire to move for it in the usual way.

SALE OF LIQUORS TO CHILDREN.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to handbills issued by Mrs. E. Holterman, 54, Gold Street, Stepney, offering malt liquors for sale, and stating that "a present will be given to every child purchasing beer on Saturday, 7th May, 1892;" and whether such an offer is legal, or can be lawfully prohibited?

MR. CONYBEARE: Before he answers that question, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman a question of which I have given him private notice? Is he aware of the extent to which the practice prevails amongst licensed victuallers both in London and in the provinces of enticing young children into their public-houses by giving them sweets and other bribes; and whether such practice is an infringement of the law; and, if so, will he instruct the police to take steps to bring the offenders to justice?

MR. MATTHEWS: In answer to the first question my attention has been called to the matter, and although I am advised the offer is not illegal the Commissioner of Police has given directions for the matter to be brought to the attention of the Licensing Justices. My answer to the second question is that the Commissioner of Police is not aware that the practice prevails to any extent; but any case of the kind brought to his notice will be placed before the Licensing Authorities.

MR. CONYBEARE: I should like to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will give me the opportunity of proving cases, and also whether he can see his way to grant a Select Committee on the practice of the Act passed in 1886 dealing with this matter? I shall be prepared to supply ample evidence of the existence of the state of things to which I have referred.

Sir T. Esmonde

MR. MATTHEWS: If the hon. Member will forward any evidence he has to the Commissioner of Police he will act upon it.

MR. CONYBEARE: It is impossible to obtain evidence in every case; but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be possible, considering the evidence we have, to instruct the police to open their eyes to this—I was going to say villany—but I will say this practice, and to prevent anything of the kind being done? They have the entrée to the public-houses.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

RE-DIRECTION OF LETTERS.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Treasury Warrant has yet been issued authorising the re-direction of letters without extra charge; and whether it extends to Members of this House the right of posting from the Vote Office Parliamentary Papers as well as Bills?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I hope that the Warrant will be issued shortly. No charge is made to Members of Parliament for despatching Parliamentary Papers from the Vote or Sale Office of this House.

RECEIVING OFFICES FOR LETTERS ON SUNDAYS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, although in Dublin there are several receiving offices for the postage of letters for the English mail on Sunday, letters for Ireland posted in London after the evening collection on Saturday do not reach any of the provincial towns in time for delivery before Tuesday morning; and whether, considering the very great inconvenience caused thereby, and the little extra cost of having a receiving office in connection with the telegraph office at Charing Cross, he will consider the desirability of establishing one there?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Since the hon. Member put his question I have made inquiry, and as I find that a certain number of persons are necessarily employed on Sunday at the West Strand Post Office, and that letters could be received there for evening despatch as well as at the General Post Office without increasing the staff employed, I have given directions that this shall be done, and it will take effect on Sunday next. I may mention that each letter to be forwarded in this way must bear an extra stamp of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for inland letters, and 1d. for continental letters.

THE REMOVAL OF CONSTABLES.

MR. McCARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the Constabulary investigation recently held at Dromara, County Down, whether he is aware that the immediate removal to another district of constables, against whom charges have been preferred, is always considered a punishment; and whether he now knows of the strong feeling in the district against the continuance of Sergeant Downey in charge of the station there; and, if so, whether he will call the attention of the Inspector General to the matter?

MR. JACKSON: The Constabulary Authorities report that the removal to any district of constables is not regarded as a punishment, and I am not aware that there is any strong feeling in the locality against the sergeant referred to.

THE COLLOONEY AND CLAREMORRIS LINE.

MR. COLLERY (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any final arrangement has been come to between the Treasury and the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company for the completion of the Collooney and Claremorris Line; if any hitch, as reported, has arisen in the matter; and whether, in the event of the Waterford and Limerick Company not proceeding with the work, the Government have in view any further arrangement by which the line may be completed?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot say that there is any hitch at present, but I should say that the negotiations are not concluded.

WALTON-ON-THAMES SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware of the terms upon which the School Board of Walton-on-Thames is allowed to carry on the work of education at Hersham School; whether he is aware that by the terms of the lease the School Board is not permitted to have possession of the school premises till 10 a.m.; and whether, in the interests of education, he will use such influence as he may possess, with a view of obtaining for the School Board a revision of the terms of the lease in question?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The Walton School Board holds the Hersham School under an ordinary agreement which I am not aware is productive of friction or liable to act prejudicially to education. Indeed, no difficulty arose until the present Board came into existence, and I am not prepared to suggest a revision of the terms of the transfer.

MR. SUMMERS: Does the right hon. Gentleman consider it a perfect arrangement?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: It is one that works well in a great number of cases.

THE CONVICTION OF MR. LEWIS LYONS.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a letter signed "H. Whorlow" in the Daily News of the 10th instant, relating to the trial and sentence by the Recorder of London to six months' imprisonment of Mr. Lewis Lyons for a libel published in the Yiddish language on Mr. Charles Tarling, from which it appears that Mr. Lyons, who on account of poverty employed no solicitor, only discovered when it was too late that certain forms of law were essential in order that he might, as he intended, prove justification, and was not allowed to call any witnesses, on the ground that no notice had been given of his intention to plead justification; and whether, under all the circumstances, he will inquire into the case with a view to a mitigation of the sentence?

MR. MATTHEWS: I shall be glad if the hon. Member will be good enough to postpone this question for a few days.

PETROLEUM STEAMERS IN THE SUEZ CANAL.

MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Suez Canal Company have sanctioned Provisional Regulations which propose to permit the passage of tank steamers laden with bulk petroleum through the Suez Canal on and after the 1st July next; whether Her Majesty's Government are aware that in the opinion of the eminent petroleum experts, Sir Frederick Abel and Mr. Boverton Redwood, such proposed traffic will be fraught with danger to life and property on the Canal; and, if so, what steps, if any, do the Government propose to take to prevent such threatened danger; and will he lay a copy of such Provisional Regulations, and of the whole of the correspondence which has taken place relating to this passage of petroleum in bulk through the Suez Canal upon the Table of the House?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The Suez Canal Company have sanctioned Provisional Regulations for the passage of petroleum tank ships on and after the 1st July next. A copy of the Report of Sir Frederick Abel and Mr. Boverton Redwood has only been received to-day, and will be forwarded to the British Directors of the Suez Canal Company. Her Majesty's Government have no power to interfere with the Company in regard to the regulation of the traffic passing through the Canal so long as the Company complies with the provision of its Charter—that the flags of all nations shall receive equal treatment. There is no objection to lay the Papers asked for, but I desire to point out that the Regulations referred to appeared in the Board of Trade Journal for February, and the correspondence with the Shipping Associations, Chambers of Commerce, and others, has already been made public.

STAMPING OF BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can now, with reference to his answer of 3rd May, 1888, see his way to make arrangements for the stamping of Bills of Exchange, &c., in Glasgow?

MR. GOSCHEN: In the answer to which the hon. Member refers, I suggested that the facilities recently granted to Liverpool might be extended to Glasgow, and this extension has been practically carried out. These facilities do not, however, include the stamping of Bills of Exchange. Such bills can only be actually stamped at the four great centres—London, Edinburgh, Dublin and Manchester; but a good stock of forms already stamped is always kept at Glasgow on sale. This is enough, I think, for all practical purposes, and I fear I cannot see my way to granting facilities to Glasgow which are possessed by no other town in the Kingdom except the four mentioned.

H.M.S. "SULTAN."

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.) (for Mr. JOHN REDMOND, Waterford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what was the original cost, exclusive of armament, of H.M.S. Sultan; the sum paid on account of salvage services to that vessel up to her arrival in Portsmouth Harbour; and the probable cost of again placing the vessel in condition as an effective part of the Navy?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. Forwood, Lancashire, Ormskirk): The original cost of the Sultan, exclusive of armament, was £374,777. The sum paid on account of salvage services amounted to £55,260. The cost of repair of the damage sustained by the accident cannot be separated from the expenditure that may be incurred in fitting modern engines and boilers, and the estimates for this work have not yet been completed.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS IN WALES AND IRELAND.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what period of time has elapsed since the last geological survey of North Wales and the County of Wicklow; was the last or any survey ever made with the view of ascertaining the probabilities of the gold-mining industry being carried on profitably, or were the surveys merely formal and general surveys; have any reports ever been obtained by the Woods and Forests Office from any practical geologist or experts respecting such industry; and, if so, who made such reports: and when were such reports obtained, and have they been printed, and are copies available for the use of miners?

MR. GOSCHEN: The geological survey is under the Science and Art Department, and questions with regard to it should be addressed to my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council. Numerous reports on the subject of the gold-mining industry in North Wales were made to the Commissioners of Woods by the late Sir Warrington Smyth at various times. The Commissioners of Woods have also had before them published papers and reports by various experts, with which the hon. Member is, no doubt, acquainted. I may mention publications by Professor Ramsay in 1854, by Professor Ansted in 1858, and by Mr. Robert Hunt in 1866, and several papers of the late Mr. T. A. Readwin. Some of the information in the possession of the Commissioners of Woods with regard to gold mining in Wales and Ireland will be found in the Appendix to the Third Report of the Royal Commission on Mining Royalties.

PROFESSOR LOFFLER'S SYSTEM OF DESTROYING MICE.

MR. THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if his attention had been directed to the following paragraph, which recently appeared in the papers, relative to the operations of Professor Loffler to destroy mice, or voles, in Greece—namely,

“Professor Loffler's method of counteracting the plague of field mice in Thessaly by means of a contagious virus promises to be completely successful, and the farmers who were threatened with ruin are loud in their gratitude;”

and whether, in the inquiry promised by the Department into the mice plague in Scotland, he would give instructions to include in the inquiry Professor Loffler's system, with a view to its adoption, if found to be efficacious?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Yes, Sir, my attention has been directed to the paragraph in question, and I am in communication with the Foreign Office with a view to obtain any further information on the subject which may be available.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A DISTRICT REGISTRY IN BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he can now state what steps have been taken to establish a district registry in Belfast for the issue of writs of summons there?

MR. MADDEN: No steps have been taken for this purpose. The Lord Chancellor has not been made aware of any great desire in regard to this matter on the part of the public or the local practitioners in Belfast.

SUPERANNUATION ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in order to show the cases to which the Superannuation Acts Amendment (No. 2) Bill would apply, he will lay upon the Table a Memorandum showing the estimated number of persons in each of the various branches of the Civil Services who will be affected by the Bill, and the estimated financial burden arising in consequence? I also beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to how many of the seventy persons whose names are given in Return, No. 107, Session 1892, as holding the post of Resident Magistrates (Ireland), is the Superannuation Acts Amendment (No. 2) Bill expected to apply; what would be the consequent increase of financial burden on the public; and what is the reason for thus augmenting the emolument attached to the office of Resident Magistrate in Ireland?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The hon. Member for Rushcliffe has two questions upon the Paper, one addressed to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the other to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Both questions relate to a Bill about which there was some controversy the other night. The hon.

Member asks if we will lay upon the Table a Memorandum showing the estimated number of persons in each of the various branches of the Civil Services who would be affected by the Bill, and the estimated financial burden arising in consequence. Both the Secretary to the Treasury and myself have been endeavouring to ascertain from the various Departments concerned what will be the number of persons affected by the Bill; but I do not think it will be possible to lay the Return asked for on the Table for this reason. One of the Departments to which the Bill will apply is the Post Office, in which there are no fewer than 10,000 officials. It would be necessary, in such a case as this, to trace the public career of each of those officers before the Government could make out whether or not they had previously served in another branch of the Public Service; and whether the service in the other branch made it necessary to pass this Bill, in order to give them continuous service. I think the hon. Member will see that it is not therefore possible to give the particulars asked for. But some kind of estimate can be made of the number of persons in the superior branches of the Civil Service who will be affected by this Bill, and my information is that it is in the highest degree improbable the number will exceed 50, in all probability it will be less than that. I have consulted the best authorities in the Treasury as to the amount of financial burden, and I am sure that there is no probability—I had almost said possibility—of the sum exceeding £2,000 in any one year. This is, as far as the officials—those most conversant with the question of valuation—can judge. I may say that I have made special inquiries with regard to the number of Resident Magistrates in Ireland who will be affected by the Bill. The Bill only applies to those Resident Magistrates who have previous continuous service in the Constabulary, and it does not apply to any Resident Magistrate who has previously served in India or abroad, because in those cases the service is not continuous. The number of Resident Magistrates now in the service of the Irish Government who have continuous service as Resident Magistrates, with previous service in the Constabulary, is 22, and in many of these cases the change only means a few years' additional service. I have not made out what the financial burden on the public of this particular class of officials will be, but the burden will be slight, and there will be no difficulty in giving it if the House or the hon. Member desires it. In the last paragraph of the second question, the hon. Member asks, "What is the reason for thus augmenting the emolument attached to the office of Resident Magistrate in Ireland?" I should like to point out to the hon. Member that this Bill is not intended to increase the emoluments of anyone, but simply to carry out the deliberate intentions of Parliament as expressed in the original Superannuation Act of 1859, as repeated in every subsequent Act, and which was continuously administered by the Treasury until the Auditor General discovered a technical flaw in the Bill—namely, that persons serving under certain Acts were excluded from the benefits that they expected would accrue from their service. And as illustrating the necessity for the Bill, and the difficulty of finding out to whom it would apply, I may state that only the other day a Sheriff Substitute in Scotland was appointed Solicitor to the Inland Revenue. Neither this gentleman, the Inland Revenue, nor the Treasury knew that by taking a new appointment he forfeited all his claim to pension as a Sheriff in Scotland, and this is an illustration of all the cases that come under this Bill. I should not be in order if I argued the merits of the Bill, but I would point out that it would be impossible for any Government in any circumstances not to allow these gentlemen, when their period of service ended, to obtain the pension to which they are equitably entitled. This Bill is the simplest method of remedying an obvious injustice, and it is with that object the Government has brought it forward.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I should like to ask that the House should be furnished in some shape with a definite Memorandum as to the number of persons affected and the financial burden involved. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to remind him that on 5th May the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that this would be a simple matter of £5,000. In these circumstances, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to give us some Memorandum embodying more or less what he has told us this afternoon?

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, I should like to ask him if we are to understand that the 50 cases which he said would probably be the maximum number of superior officers who will benefit under this Bill includes all the Anglo-Indian officers?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Member is labouring under a mistake. A gentleman who serves in India and earns his pension in India, and comes home and looks out for employment here, is not affected by this Bill, because his service is not continuous. It is only the man who passes straight from the Indian service to the English service without a break that obtains any benefit under it.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I should like to ask, in view of the fact that the Royal Commission sat for two or three years and investigated the whole of the pension system, and this alleged difficulty was never brought under the notice of the Commissioners and investigated, whether the right hon. Gentleman would consent to refer the subject to a Select Committee, in order that the question which has arisen may be thoroughly investigated?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not the slightest objection to the whole question being investigated by a Select Committee if such an inquiry does not mean undue delay. On the contrary, I shall be glad to have the question investigated. With regard to the historical point put to me, I think—I am not certain—that this point has been raised by the Auditor General since the Royal Commission sat.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): The right hon. Gentleman said just now that this Bill referred to persons who have continuous service. I cannot find any reference to that in the Bill.

MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I should like to ask whether in the 50 superior officers of the Civil Service the right hon. Gentleman included any officers of the Uncovenanted Service in India, and whether he is aware that three of those gentlemen might take the whole £2,000 mentioned.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have to say that undoubtedly the Bill is intended to apply, and does apply, only to continuous service, and there is no objection to adding words to make that perfectly clear. With regard to the question put by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, it is perfectly obvious that if you choose to consider a series of cases where a man is raised from a small employment to a large one, the £2,000 might conceivably be exhausted; but the same anomaly would occur in the English service. I believe, however, from the investigations I have been able to make, that the cases of continuous service in which Englishmen have been transferred to India are not less numerous than the cases in which Indian officials have been transferred to England, so that the probability is that the English Treasury will not be the loser.

MR. CONYBEARE: May I ask whether amongst those who are to benefit under this Bill are included the 30,000 discharged soldiers who, according to the statement of the Postmaster General, may soon hope to be employed at the Post Office?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

DISTRICT COUNCILS.

MR. GULLY (Carlisle): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce before Whitsuntide the Bill for the establishment of District Councils, referred to in Her Majesty's Speech?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It would be useless to introduce this Bill unless there was some hope of passing it into law during the course of the present Session, and unless the Government make unexpected progress with public business no such hope appears to be likely of realisation. The Bill, therefore, will not be laid upon the Table before any specified date.

ALLEGED FORGERIES BY A POOR LAW GUARDIAN.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Edward Fitzgerald, a Guardian of the Cork Union, who was, in April last, convicted on three charges of forging and tendering proxy voting papers in his own favour in the last election of Guardians, was again, on the 6th instant, convicted on six other charges of forging the names of 13 persons to voting papers and tendering the same also in his own favour in the same election of Guardians; whether the Government intend to take steps to remove Mr. Fitzgerald from the Board of Guardians, and prosecute him for these forgeries; and whether a sworn inquiry will be held to test the legality of the election of a number of other Guardians of the Cork Union, who are alleged to have been elected by forged proxy votes?

MR. JACKSON: The facts are as stated in the first paragraph, with the exception that the convictions number in all eight. The Local Government Board have been informed by the solicitor acting for Mr. Fitzgerald that he has lodged appeals against these convictions. Pending the hearing of these appeals, the Board are unable to express any opinion as to whether the convictions in question disqualify Mr. Fitzgerald from acting as a Guardian. Mr. Fitzgerald and two others were returned as Guardians for the South Ward. The Local Government Board have ordered an inquiry with the view of ascertaining whether the majority in any of these three cases is due to votes recorded in respect of the forged papers.

THE ZULU BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies when it is probable that the Papers relating to the Zulu Boundary Commission will be distributed which it was intimated on 7th April were in preparation?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I hope to present the Papers shortly.

THE SIZE OF POST CARDS.

MR. WEBB: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain why the United Kingdom Postal Union cards, which until recently were the same size as those issued by the principal European States—namely, 5½ by 3½ inches, have now been reduced to 5½ by 3¼, or one-seventh; whether he is aware that the German and some other Continental home cards of the value in United Kingdom money of one half-penny, are 40 per cent. larger than ours sold at 5½d. for ten; and would there be any objection to increasing the size of our Postal Union and internal cards to the sizes of those issued by other countries of equal importance?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Until recently three different rates of postage were chargeable in this country for postcards sent to places abroad—namely, 1d., 1½d., and 2d. In carrying out the scheme of uniform postage to all places abroad, it was decided to abolish the 1½d. and 2d. postcards, and make the 1d. postcard available to all destinations; but it was found necessary to accompany this concession with a slight reduction in the weight of the cards, the payments for the transit of cards through foreign countries and colonies being made by weight. The dimensions of the inland postcards have not undergone any change for the last 20 years, but it is true that some foreign countries employ larger cards in their home service. The new cards for transmission abroad are larger than the inland cards; but the size of both has been fixed with regard to the reasonable requirements of the senders in the vast majority of cases. Both appear to give general satisfaction, and it is not intended to alter the sizes.

SPURIOUS IRISH WOOLLEN GOODS.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware of any practice amongst certain merchants and commercial agents whereby they transfer woollen goods to Ireland, and having there stamped them with a spurious trade mark, export them to Great Britain, and there sell them as being of genuine Irish manufacture; whether such a practice would be a violation of Section 4, Sub-section (b), of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, and an "implied warranty of sale" according to Section 17 of the same Act; and whether, if any such practices as referred to be brought under his notice, he will order a prosecution under the provisions of the above-mentioned Act?

MR. MADDEN: If any such cases as those referred to in the question are brought to my notice, I shall be glad to consider them with a view to directing a prosecution if necessary.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): I should like to ask the Government whether they will take the Budget on Monday, and a second question has reference to a notice which I think has now appeared many times on the Paper without any apparent progress being made. I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to a notice he has given of what appears to be the very desirable object of fixing the relative contributions of the three Kingdoms to the Exchequer, whether he thinks that notice can be taken to-night? I am not aware that it is one that is likely to excite any prolonged discussion.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): We shall be very glad to take the Budget on Monday, if that meets with the views of Gentlemen opposite, because I hope we shall then have finished the discussion on the Small Holdings Bill. With respect to the second question, my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) asks me to say that as soon as convenient after eleven o'clock to-night he will be prepared to submit the matter referred to with a view of bringing it to a satisfactory conclusion before twelve o'clock.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): May the House understand that the Indian Councils Bill will not be taken to-night?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): If the Budget is taken on Monday, I suppose the Irish

Local Government Bill will be taken on Thursday the 19th?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know why we should not take it on Tuesday.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Do we understand that the fourth stage of the Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill will not be taken till after the Second Reading of the Irish Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; it will not be taken till after the Irish Bill.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): With reference to the third Order of the Day, may I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will arrange to take the discussion on it as early as ten o'clock? The matter is a very complicated one, and there will not be time properly to discuss it between eleven or a quarter past and twelve o'clock.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The subject may be a complicated one, but I think it would be rather hard to expect the House to interrupt important Business at such an early hour. I cannot, therefore, adopt that suggestion.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As the right hon. Gentleman is not certain that he will be able to take the Irish Bill on Tuesday, I should like to ask him what notice he will give?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will put that question to-morrow.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): In view of the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has seen fit to make the question for to-night not only a matter of detail, but of principle, I should like to ask him whether he will not give us more than three-quarters of an hour to discuss this question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: While the Government have every desire to meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen opposite, it is impossible to abstract more time than I have mentioned, and I hope the hon. Member will be content with one hour.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Could we not take it on Tuesday afternoon?

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

William Robert Bousfield, Esquire, for the Borough of Hackney (North Division).

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SMALL AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS
BILL.—(No. 183.)COMMITTEE. [Progress, 10th May.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 5.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): There are a number of Amendments put down in my name, in order to remove objections which this clause suggests. I dare say the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) has gathered that I object to the Bill as a whole, and I put down this series of Amendments with a view of mending it to some extent. I do not, however, propose to move them, and perhaps I may be permitted to say that whilst I am quite of the view that the Bill, so far as it enables County Councils to buy land and let it in small holdings, will be an advantage, I think that so far as it attempts to resuscitate the class of yeomen farmers it will be an absolute failure, and in my part of the country it will be inoperative. Feeling that, I do not know that it is any special duty of mine to endeavour to amend the clause in that direction. As I have said, in my part of the country it will be inoperative, and I shall be glad if it is, because I regard this effort to revive the yeoman farmer class as trying to set back the hands of the clock. I do not wish to express my views at length now, because I shall have an opportunity on a subsequent occasion, and I beg to withdraw the series of Amendments in my name.

Amendments, by leave, withdrawn.

(5.15.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): The object of the Amendment I have to move is to alter the payment of the first instalment from one-fifth to fifteen per cent. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will make no objection to that alteration, because in his opening speech he said that the amount he had put down represented a principle rather than the exact amount upon which the Government had decided. I am glad that the Government have stuck to the main principle of the Bill, which is to create owners instead of tenants, or rather as well as tenants; but I think now it is our duty to make it as easy as possible for everyone to become owners. The object of fixing any sum at all to be paid down is, of course, simply to secure the bona fides of the purchaser, and to protect the ratepayers from any fear of loss. It seems to me, however, that one-fourth is a very large sum, and one which would give rise to a great deal of difficulty in many cases. Besides, there is a precedent which will, no doubt, occur to the Government—that is the case of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who in all the sales they have hitherto made have put fifteen per cent. as the sum required to be paid down; and if the right hon. Baronet (Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson) were in his place he would be able to say that they have found the amount quite satisfactory, and that it has worked very well. I am aware that there are other Amendments on the Paper, but I do not think the difference between 20 and 25 per cent. is sufficient alteration to make, and 15 per cent. seems to me to be a fair thing between the ratepayer and the purchaser, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 7, to leave out the words "not less than one-fourth," and insert the words "fifteen per cent."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'not less than one-fourth' stand part of the Clause."

(5.18.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The hon. Member is quite right in saying that on the introduction of the measure I did say that the amount which was put down was a question of degree rather than of principle, and I am very anxious that the views of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, which have been put forward from time to time, should receive every attention; but I am afraid I cannot go to the length that the hon. Member desires. It is necessary that the Government should look after the interests of the ratepayers; and though I am prepared, with a view to meet the wishes of the hon. Gentleman, to make a reduction in this amount to be paid down, I cannot go beyond one-fifth, which I see is the suggestion of several hon. Gentlemen. Beyond that I cannot go; that is the utmost limit. Amendments to the extent to which I am prepared to go stand in the names of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) and the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Channing); and in order to meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and with the object of making progress in Committee, I am willing to accept one-fifth instead of one-fourth, but I cannot go beyond that.

(5.21.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): The right hon. Gentleman seems to be afraid that the tenant will have an opportunity of running away, but to my mind there is no fear of any such thing. The County Council can make an arrangement by which the first instalment shall be paid in advance, and then there would be no risk to the County Council. The most tremendous risk they can undertake is the loss of one year's rent, and I think if the instalment were paid in advance the purchaser might very well be allowed to have the land without any capital sum being paid down, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consent to accept the 15 per cent. It has been said that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners only ask 15 per cent., and why should the County Council be more exacting than the Ecclesiastical Commissioners? No doubt the instalments to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are paid more quickly than we should require, but the right hon. Gentleman must remember that if a man occupies a farm three, four, or five years and pays instalments during that time the security of the County Council is steadily increasing, and I do not see how it is possible for the County Council to lose, at all events, more than the rent for one year, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider his decision.

*(5.22.) COLONEL EYRE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough): The Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who have fixed 15 per cent. as the amount to be paid down, have sold land of no less value than £350,000, and they have conducted their business with success, and have found no reason to go back on the principle which they adopted. I think we may trust the County Council, who are a popularly-elected body, in the matter. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to adopt this Amendment.

(5.23.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): There seems to be such a general agreement as to the 15 per cent., that I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to meet us. If the clause passes in its present form it will make the Bill quite unworkable in many parts of Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman says it is our duty to protect the ratepayers. Surely that is the duty of the County Councils. They represent the ratepayers. Why cannot they be left to bargain with a would-be purchaser in the same way that an ordinary vendor bargains? If they found that a man who wanted land was impecunious, probably they would make him pay more than one-fourth—perhaps the whole of the purchase money, or secure it by mortgage; but, on the other hand, I do not see why they should not be allowed to accept less. If the right hon. Gentleman does not accept some further reduction, I am certain the result will be disastrous to the working of the Bill, and the Government will defeat the object they have in view.

*(5.24.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I should very much prefer that no money should be required from the purchaser at all, and I think the right hon. Gentleman might do something better than 20 per cent. I have a Motion on the Paper that 10 per cent. should be the amount, and I am certain that if you do not come as low as 15 per cent., you will not benefit at all the class which this Bill proposes to benefit. If the average small holder has to provide 20 per cent. of the purchase money, you will leave him nothing to start and stock his small farm. The old land companies used to ask the purchaser to deposit only about five per cent., or half-a-year's payment in advance on the ten years' scale, and they did not consider that they took an extraordinary or any risk. In these cases the County Council will retain the deeds and virtually the land until the whole of the purchase money is paid. If the County Council, or the Parish Council as I hope it will be, use ordinary prudence, there will practically be no risk at all, and we shall prevent these people being driven out of the country or into the great towns.

(5.26.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I should like to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that what is fixed here is a minimum and not a maximum. As an hon. Member observed, the County Council can ask a larger sum if they think fit; if the circumstances demand more than a minimum they can ask it. Why should not the County Council be trusted to exercise their discretion the other way? If they are to be trusted there is no occasion to put in a minimum. The County Council will have to inquire into the solvency of a purchaser, and when you are dealing with these very small men and these very small amounts surely you may believe that 15 per cent. would be enough to ask as security. Under these circumstances, I think there is no danger in the minimum proposed by the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Collings).

(5.28.) MR. GURDON (Norfolk, Mid): I think it would be a most foolish thing if the County Councils were to allow purchasers to take land without paying down a substantial sum. A man who has no money cannot take land, because he will require money to stock his farm; but if a man has money to lay out and is solvent and prepared to pay that is a different matter, and I should like to see a lower amount fixed to be paid down. I hope the Amendment will be pressed.

(5.29.) MR. CUST (Lincolnshire, Stamford): The Government have already gone some way to meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen on the other side, and I hope they will not give way on this point. The right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) says this is only a question of fixing a minimum; if that is so, why not fix it at £1? But it is not a question of that kind purely, and I think the amount that has been fixed will meet all emergencies. The Member for Peterborough spoke of the very small risk to the County Council, but we have to think not only of the risk to the County Council and the ratepayers—we must also think of the risk to that class which we desire to benefit—namely, the labouring class. We must not tempt the small holders to undertake the care of land which they have not the money nor the ability to cultivate with advantage. If we make it too easy for them, and do not take the trouble of finding out by their antecedents whether or not they are thrifty and possess a certain amount of business capacity, they will take the land, and it will be not a blessing but a curse to them. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will stick to the sum he has laid down.

(5.31.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I am myself perfectly willing to accept the Amendment I have put on the Paper, but I think it might with advantage be the maximum as well as the minimum. I do not see why the words “not less than” should not come out, so that the one-fifth should be the statutory sum which should be asked for.

(5.32.) MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead): I would press on the right hon. Gentleman not to give way in this matter. It is true this is only a question of fixing a minimum, but the minimum is apt to become the maximum. It is not merely a question of trusting the County Councils; I think we have rather to protect them. If we put in too low a sum undue pressure will be put on the County Councils to take it.

*(5.33.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): There are two reasons why I gladly support this proposal to reduce the minimum. The first is that the lower the amount of the deposit the greater will be the obligation on the County Council to see that their purchase is a sound and economic one. You have not got compulsory purchase in the Bill, and it is possible that a County Council might be pressed to buy at too high a price. The answer to that would be, “We cannot give the price asked because it will not be safe for the ratepayers, as the security of the deposit is so small.” My second reason for supporting the Amendment is, if the amount is smaller it will be more likely that the holdings will be smaller, and the land will be more likely to go in 10 or 15 acre lots instead of in 50 acre lots, and that smaller class is the one we on this side wish to see get the advantage under the Bill. We believe the smaller the deposit the more likely the County Council will be to give small holdings to the poorer and, therefore, the more deserving class.

(5.35.) COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): May I point out to my right hon. Friend that 15 per cent. would be about four years' rent, and that would be pretty good security to the County Council? I think, if my right hon. Friend could be induced to reconsider the matter in that way, he might be inclined to diminish the amount to 15 per cent., which, I think, would be enough.

(5.37.) BARON DIMSDALE (Herts, Hitchin): I must appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to adhere to the Bill as far as possible. The Bill is one in regard to which we must show our trust in the right hon. Gentleman. I think, if we do so, he will do what is right and proper, and though I do not like the reduction to one-fifth, I would urge the right hon. Gentleman to accept that.

(5.38.) MR. CHAPLIN: I am bound to say I have heard nothing in this discussion to induce me to modify my opinion further than I have already done. I must remind my hon. Friend that in the Report of the Select Committee these words occur:—

“That it is essential that the purchasers of small holdings should provide in cash a portion of the purchase money not less than one-fourth or one-fifth.”

I am not aware that my hon. Friend took any objection to that clause when it was inserted in the Report. Something has been said about the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The money would be paid in a much shorter time under the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—in thirty years, I believe—whereas under this Bill we have allowed fifty years. I would also remind my hon. Friend that, although one-fifth may be too much in those cases where the purchaser cannot find that amount, there the powers inserted in the Bill which enable the County Council to let will come into play. The man will then hold as tenant instead of owner, and over and over again it was urged on that side of the House that the great object and desire of hon. Gentlemen was that the holdings should be let rather than that they should be sold. I cannot see that any good reason has been given for a change, and, while regretting to differ from my hon. Friend, I must adhere to the change from one-fourth to one-fifth.

(5.40.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I regret that the right hon. Gentleman cannot accept my Amendment. The clause in the Report gave 20 or 25 per cent, and the object of that was to secure the bona fides of the applicant, and not to state a principle. The Government have rightly made the purchase of small holdings the great principle of the Bill, and they have increased the amount of land a man may hire if he be not in a position to buy. The carrying out of the principle of the Bill will be most valuable in restoring the class of peasant proprietors, and our object should be to make that restoration as easy as possible; and I contend that 15 per cent. would abundantly protect the rate-payers from loss, because every yearly instalment would increase the security. As to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, I do not see what the shorter period of payment has to do with the question. They have taken 15 per cent. in many cases, and it has been found sufficient. Lord Wantage's Small Holdings Company only ask ten per cent., and there are many other arguments which might be put forward in favour of this percentage. I would like to point out that in the last hundred years this class have been practically deprived of their interest in the land. I am aware that the public has benefited by that, and that agriculture has been improved in every way by that process. But we cannot forget that this class as a class suffered from the operation which has been for the public good, and they have a sort of moral claim on the Legislature that it should make their restoration as easy as possible. We have precedents which have answered admirably, and I regret that the right hon. Gentleman cannot accept my Amendment. The change from 25 to 20 per cent. is something, but I think he would do right to go further.

(5.43.) MR. FULLER (Wilts, Westbury): The only real and substantial security is unquestionably the land, and, therefore, I think we ought to encourage those who are prepared to put their labour into the land, and make it more valuable, for no rent will be got from land not well cultivated. I hope, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman will look at the question in a practical manner, and will look for security to the manner in which the land is cultivated, and will not imagine that 15 or 20 per cent. is likely to meet the requirements of security. We know perfectly well that if land is badly cultivated it soon deteriorates more than 15 or 20 per cent. I hope he will seriously consider the Amendment.

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I would venture to put a little pressure on the right hon. Gentleman on this question. We want men of small means to buy or hire these small plots of land, and it is not worth while to spoil the ship for a ha'porth of tar. I think we should rather let them pay 15 per cent. than call upon them for a larger sum, which in many cases would probably prevent them taking the holdings at all. I do not think the question of risk to the ratepayers is of much importance, but I do know that the main obstacle to the taking of holdings under the provisions of the Bill will be that the people have not the money. If the experiment is to be fairly tried, I think we should strain a point in the direction of the Amendment rather than be steadfast against it.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): There seems to be such a division on this subject among those behind the right hon. Gentleman and such singular unanimity among those who have spoken on the subject, that, perhaps even at the eleventh hour, the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider his determination. The right hon. Gentleman said that we on this side were in favour of leasing, and not of purchase. That is to a great extent true, but the reason we were so much in favour of leasing was that we considered that the very poor class are not sufficiently rich to purchase. If we ask them to purchase, it is obvious that the deposit should be as small as possible. The difference between 15 and 20 per cent. is so small that I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be persuaded to accede to the change.

Question, "That the words 'not less than' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 7, to leave out the words "one-fourth," in order to insert the words "one-fifth."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question, "That the words 'one-fourth' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question put, "That the words 'one-fifth' be there inserted."

(5.45.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 228; Noes 173.—(Div. List, No. 124.)

(6.2.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I beg to move—

In page 3, line 9, to leave out Sub-section (4) and insert the following Sub-section: "(4) A portion representing not less than thirty-five per cent. of the purchase-money shall remain unpaid, and be secured by a perpetual rent-charge."

The reason I move this Amendment is that owing to the strange wording of Sub-section (4) I confess I am not able, as it stands, to understand what it means. It appears to follow the recommendation of the Select Committee in providing for a perpetual rent-charge. But the Bill goes on to say "it shall be redeemable," which to my mind destroys all usefulness with regard to perpetual rent-charge; and, therefore, I propose the substitution of this sub-section in order to carry out in plain language the intention of the Government.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 9, to leave out Sub-section (4) and insert the following Sub-section: "(4) A portion representing not less than thirty-five per cent. of the purchase-money shall remain unpaid, and be secured by a perpetual rent-charge." (Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (4) stand part of the Clause."

(6.4.) MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member says he does not understand the effect of the clause as it stands. Perhaps, therefore, I may say exactly what the intention of the Government is with regard to this clause. Their intention is that on the completion of the purchase a certain portion of the money—one-fourth as the Bill was originally drawn, but one-fifth as it stands now—should be paid down; that another portion should remain as a rent-charge, and that the remaining portion of the purchase-money should be paid by annual instalments. That is the scheme or framework of the Bill, and I think the hon. Member will clearly understand it. He appears to be somewhat confused by the expression in the clause of a perpetual rent-charge, which is to be redeemable in the manner directed by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act. I can only say that the clause has been taken from that Act, and that it would have been presumptuous on my part to attempt to improve upon it. The Amendment of the hon. Gentleman deals with two questions. It deals, in the first place, with the amount that is to remain as a perpetual rent-charge; and, in the second place, it deals with the question as to whether that rent-charge is to be redeemable or not. I think it would simplify the matter very much if we came to a decision upon the first question in the first instance. Let us first settle what the amount of the rent-charge is to be; and then let us decide whether the rent-charge is to be redeemable or not. I hope I have now sufficiently explained the clause to the hon. Member, and that he clearly understands it.

(6.7.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): It seems to me that there are three Amendments now before us. First, there is the Motion proposed by the Government that one-fourth, or 25 per cent., of the purchase-money should remain as a rent-charge; then there is the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bordesley that 35 per cent. of the money should so remain; and there is also the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian that 40 per cent. should remain. Now, I am rather against all these Amendments, although it is very curious that the other day I moved a Motion on the subject, and got only very small support. Let me point out what the result will be if either of the two Amendments of my hon. Friends were adopted. In the North we have no land that will bear one-fourth of the amount in the shape of permanent tax. In Lothian, where the soil is richer, the land might perhaps bear 40 per cent.; but we have no land in Caithness that will bear it. The result will be that our crofters and agriculturists will have a burden placed upon them which their land will not be able to pay. If the improvements made upon the land are to be charged, I do not see why a charge should not also be placed upon other forms of property, such as the stock of the merchant. I think we ought to differentiate between the poor soil in the North which will not be able to bear that burden and the richer soil in the South which might be able to do so. I would, therefore, rather support the Government in keeping the amount down to 25 per cent.

(6.10.) MR. STOREY: I confess I do not understand my hon. Friend's statement. The lowering of the amount of money to be paid down from one-fourth to one-fifth is a diminution of the security of those who have to provide the money, the public at large. That being so, I venture to represent to the House that what we ought to aim at in the remainder of the Bill is to make the security as good as possible. I must say I have an indisposition to accept the wording of the Bill, that one-fourth of the purchase-money may be secured by a perpetual rent-charge. If the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to omit all the subsidiary words about the redemption of the rent-charge, I think it would be an improvement from my point of view. I think where the public are advancing money and giving credit to private persons for specific purposes, unless we are ready to adopt the same principle and to apply it to all other classes of persons who may apply for public money, we ought to take all the securities we can. If we adopt the principle that the public without any advantage are to give a man who wants to become a landlord the use of public money and the use of public credit, I confess I cannot see why the poor pitmen of Durham, at present unluckily on strike, should not come to the House and ask to have money advanced to them for the purchase of coal pits on the same terms. If that proposal were made to the right hon. Gentleman it would be difficult for him to give an answer to it which would be satisfactory either to the persons concerned or many others who are in favour of the nationalisation of all these public values. If the public lend their credit to a man and enable him to become a landowner, I think the public ought to have some fair return for it. The public being able to borrow at a small rate of interest ought to be able to lend that man the money at a slightly increased rate of interest, and with that increased rate of interest in the course of a long term of years his rent-charge would be bought out, not for the benefit of the man, but for the benefit of the public at large. There would then be a newly made landowner or landlord—and I must take the liberty of saying that I am a little surprised at the Liberal Members being so extremely anxious to multiply the number of landlords in this country—this newly made landowner would have paid down 20 per cent. of the money at first; he would have paid during the term of years another 55 per cent. of the money; so that he would remain the absolute possessor of 75 per cent. of the land; and the other 25 per cent. would belong to the public, who had enabled him to acquire the other 75 per cent. by the use of their money. It would remain to County Councils as a perpetual revenue coming to them year by year; and the extent to which men availed themselves of this arrangement, they would enable the County Councils to that extent to be under no necessity to levy rates. Whatever Amendment he accepts, I would impress upon the right hon. Gentleman the necessity there is in the public interest of requiring the rent-charge to be perpetual.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): I would suggest to the Committee that it would be much more business-like if they were to take the issues involved in this question in order, instead of confusing them. There are four issues involved in this question, and they have been all mixed up together.

(6.16.) MR. HENEAGE: The whole question of what should be the amount of the rent-charge must depend entirely upon whether it is redeemable or not. If it is to be an irredeemable rent-charge I, for one, do not think we should make it a very large amount. But, certainly, while I am in favour of it being entirely irredeemable, if the clause is to be left as it is now, I do not care very much about the amount.

(6.17.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I confess I am a little confused by the speeches which I have just listened to. I should like very much to know from the Government exactly what is intended by the reservation of this right of the State to a perpetual rent-charge. I am not dealing now with the question whether it should be redeemable or not, but merely with the question of what is the object of a rent-charge at all. The object of the Committee in recommending that a sum should remain in the shape of a perpetual rent-charge was twofold. In the first place, they desired by this perpetual rent-charge to give the County Councils the power to carry out the conditions of purchase, for instance, to provide against subletting and sub-division, and matters of that kind; and in the next place they intended, as the hon. Member who has just spoken desires, that whatever was to be reserved as a perpetual charge should ultimately belong to the ratepayers. I really want to know whether that is the object of the Government? As the clause reads, the ratepayers would not gain anything. Whether the charge is to be a redeemable charge or not, even if the words were struck out which make it a redeemable charge, still the ratepayers would gain nothing, because all a man has to do is to pay the lowest rate of interest upon this redeemable charge. He pays a slightly increased rate of interest upon the rest of the amount in order that it may be redeemed in 50 years; but upon the rent-charge he only pays the rate of interest which is required for such a perpetual charge. Well, as I say, I do not know what the objects of the Government are, but whether the objects of the Committee are secured by this proposal is another matter. One of these objects is the same as one of the objects of the Amendment, namely, a desire to obtain some profit for the ratepayers. But if we look only to the desirability of giving to the County Councils power over the conditions of purchase, then it does not matter what the amount of the rent-charge is; a rent-charge of five per cent. would do as well as 95 per cent. for that purpose. If that be the sole object of the Government—and so, far as this clause is concerned, that appears to me to be the sole object—I do not think that the object would be attained by taking any amount, it matters not what, but by striking out these words which enable the rent-charge to be redeemable, because if rent-charges were redeemed, the control of the conditions would go with the redemption.

(6.23.) MR. CHAPLIN: The reason why this amount was fixed as contained in the clause was to facilitate as much as possible the purchase by persons of small capital who desired to buy small holdings consistently with security to the ratepayers. In order to afford the ratepayers that security the Bill provides that a certain amount of the purchase-money is required to be paid down. It did not enter into our calculation that the clause is not framed with the view of giving any profit to the ratepayer by a redeemable rent-charge. That, I think, is an answer to the right hon. Gentleman, who seems to imagine that the retention of a rent-charge, that is to say of a rent-charge which is to be redeemable, would render the County Councils powerless to enforce the conditions of purchase. When the right hon. Gentleman rose just now I was about to make an appeal to my hon. Friend, and to ask him whether or not it would not meet his views equally well, and whether it would not be more convenient for the purposes of discussion, if he were to consent to withdraw the Amendment which stands in his name and let us take the discussion upon the three points in order; first, the amount that should remain as a rent-charge; then, when that is decided, let us settle the question as to whether it should be optional with the County Councils or obligatory upon them to insist that there should be a sum left as a rent-charge; and, in the third place, let us take the discussion upon the question whether the rent-charge is to be redeemable or not.

(6.27.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I think the right hon. Gentleman refers to my Amendment as it appears on the next page—Clause 5, page 3, line 9, leave out “not more than one-fourth” and insert “thirty-five per cent.” But my Amendment does not touch the question which my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland dealt with; that is, giving the ratepayers a profit by charging more per cent. to the purchaser than was paid to the Exchequer. I thought that certainly would be raised by a separate sub-section.

MR. CHAPLIN: There is nothing in the Bill to prevent it.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I am aware that there is nothing in the Bill to prevent it, but there is nothing in the Bill to favour it. To facilitate progress, and in order to adopt the course suggested, I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Gentleman (Dr. Clark) wish to leave out the words “not more”?

(6.29.) DR. CLARK: I wish to keep in the words “not more.” In its present form the Clause is permissive. The amount to be paid as a rent-charge is not to be more than one-fourth, but it may be less than one-fourth.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member intend to make any Motion?

DR. CLARK: No.

THE CHAIRMAN: Then the hon. Member has no right to speak.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 9, to leave out the words “one-fourth,” and insert the words “thirty-five per cent.” (Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘one-fourth’ stand part of the Clause.”

(6.31.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I understand from your ruling, Sir, that no one is entitled to move the omission of the limit, and now we are discussing the limit to be accepted. I would, therefore, suggest that 35 per cent. is not sufficient. I was led to understand that what was wanted was to retain as large an interest in the land by the County Council as possible, and that many Members on this side thought it desirable that private ownership should as far as possible be restricted. It will be restricted better by retaining a larger quit-rent, or what we call in Scotland feu duty. And I would submit that, so far as Scotland is concerned, the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly safe in giving County Councils liberty to put what we call feu duty at a larger proportion than 35 per cent. I should like to see 75 per cent. retained, but I hope 50 per cent. may be conceded by the Government. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be prepared to meet us to some extent. I am sure we are all at one in thinking that whilst the County Councils lay upon the rates the obligation and responsibility of buying the land, the more they retain in their own hands in regard to quit-rent or feu duty, the more they will exercise control over the cultivation of the land, and the better it will be for all concerned.

(6.34.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): Although the withdrawal of the last Amendment has in some degree cleared the ground, yet one important point put by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham surely ought to be replied to, or, at all events, comprehended by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture, because, until he gives some declaration to the Committee as to the instalments he is to charge the tenant in respect of his rent-charge, hon. Members are quite unable to judge what amount of the capital should be secured by such a perpetual rent-charge. The right hon. Gentleman, in fact, has put no arithmetic into this Bill; he has left everything in the shape of arithmetic apparently to be settled by the County Councils in their discretion, and, unless they all turn actuaries, it is possible that most difficult calculations will come before them. Anyhow, there is no question that the Committee has not made these calculations. Although the right hon. Gentleman told us one thing—namely, that he did not want to benefit the community by this perpetual rent-charge, yet I do not see how, if he takes a concrete instance, he is to carry out his view. Suppose he secures £25 of a capital of £100 by a rent-charge, unless he knows what the tenant is to pay as yearly rent-charge in respect of that £25, how is he to make up his account with the County Council? The County Council has to borrow the £25 at 3 per cent. It is never to get that back, because it is going to lend it for ever, and the tenant is to pay a yearly rent-charge in respect of it. Yet the right hon. Gentleman does not tell us whether that annual rent-charge will be a sum greater or less than the 3 per cent. which the County Council has to pay to the public creditor. The result is that if not more than 3 per cent. is taken from the tenant annually, the County Council's £25 will never be repaid, or, if more than 3 per cent. is taken, and the £25 are consequently repaid, then the perpetual payment, whatever it may be, from the tenant will eventually go to the community and benefit the community in spite of what the right hon. Gentleman has said. I conceive that point is entirely novel to the right hon. Gentleman, although it is entirely germane to the consideration now before the Committee—which is, whether a large or a small portion of the capital value of the land should be left secured by a perpetual rent-charge upon the holding.

*(6.38.) MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): The effect of this proposal will be to considerably reduce the scope of the operations of this Bill. It may, in fact, lock up one-fourth of the ten millions of money which the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Agriculture proposes to use for the purpose of promoting the establishment of these small holdings. If 25 per cent. remains and is to be secured to the County Council by a perpetual rent-charge, that 25 per cent. will, of course, have passed away as the purchase money to the persons from whom the land was bought, and the result will be that 75 per cent. only will be available. I do not see what benefit this provision is to confer. It certainly must be immaterial to the purchaser, except as a mere convenience, whether he pays the capital down or has a rent-charge secured upon his property. But there is another objection. Our policy in dealing with land has been to get rid of these small rent-charges, for small rent-charges are considered an annoyance and a nuisance. That was the object of the Copyhold Enfranchisement Bill. Now it is proposed to establish in connection with this Bill all over the country a number of small rent-charges. I hope the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) will see his way to drop this clause altogether.

(6.41.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not think there is very much in the objection of the hon. Member (Mr. Bolton) that this proposal will reduce the operation of the Bill, because, although there has been some limit put upon the operation of the measure, that is distinctly because it is an experiment. If the experiment succeeds, I do not think any great difficulty will be felt in proceeding with it further. I want the Committee to see, what I think I see clearly now, that so far as the intending purchasers are concerned it matters very little whether the sum reserved for perpetual rent-charge is one-fourth, one-fifth, or any other fraction. I can best show the Committee what is the exact pecuniary effect of the principle by taking a concrete case. Assume that a man purchased a piece of land worth £200. In that case he has, under the existing arrangement, to pay down £40, which is one-fifth. He may then, if he and the County Council agree, leave one-fourth, or £50, as a perpetual rent-charge on the land; the £110, or what is called the residue, he will have to provide for by annual payments sufficient to pay the interest and the sinking fund. Now, on the £50 which forms the perpetual rent-charge he will only have to pay a sufficient sum to cover the interest. The pecuniary difference, therefore, to the purchaser is a difference between interest and sinking fund and between interest alone upon a sum which, in the case I have taken, is £50. In other words, it is a difference of one-half per cent. on £50, or a difference of 5s. a year. That is the whole pecuniary difference which is made by the introduction of this perpetual rent-charge. If my hon. Friend's Amendment were carried, and instead of one-fourth we had 35 per cent., or one-third, that would make a difference of perhaps a couple of shillings more—that is the whole extent of the difference between the one system and the other. I think, therefore, that as a pecuniary question it is hardly worth consideration. But there are two grounds for the proposal which I think deserve consideration. The first is that by maintaining a rent-charge you maintain control over the holdings. I do not believe there is any other way by which you can prevent the small owners—whom you have gone out of your way to create, you have called in the aid of the locality, you have lent them money at a low rate, and you have taken considerable risk upon yourselves—from the moment you have done all this, turning themselves from a peasant proprietary into a miserable class of landowners with small sub-lettings. Your whole object will thereby have been lost, and you will have created probably the very worst form of tenancy in the world. You are bound to take every possible precaution to prevent that, and it has not been suggested to the Committee that there is any other effective way of doing it except by creating a rent-charge, and maintaining what would then be the conditions of the lease. That, I think, is an important reason for maintaining some kind of rent-charge, although it is no reason at all for any one kind more than another. Now comes the point which has reference to the Motion. I know it is the view of my hon. Friend (Mr. Jesse Collings) that the one dread which we have in regard to peasant proprietorship in this country is that as soon as it is established the money lender will come in, that he will lend money upon these small holdings, and get the owners into his power, so that ultimately their last state will be worse than the first. There is only one way—and I do not say it is thoroughly effective—to prevent it, and that is that the County Council or the community should be the first mortgagee. If it is the first mortgagee to a sufficient extent to make a second mortgage unsafe, then the money lender will be kept out. It will not be worth his while to come in—the risk will be too great. The only money lender will be the County Council, and the objection to its having a lien will not be so great as it would be to that of a private individual. That is a very important point, and the Committee will have to consider whether a rent-charge of one-fourth is sufficient to prevent the money lender from coming in, or whether it would be wiser to raise it to 35 or 50 per cent.

(6.48.) MR. CUST: In answer to what the right hon. Gentleman has just stated, I think I am right in saying that a rent-charge would have no legal effect to prevent a second mortgage or sub-division. A much more effective way would be to direct the Registrar proposed to be set up by this Bill to refuse to accept any mortgages or to register any sub-divisions. With such a statutory declaration you would find very few persons ready to risk their money on such a title. But you cannot look upon a quit-rent as a safeguard. Where a man pays his quit-rent no earthly right will be left to the County Council to interfere to prohibit any treatment of his land the man likes to pursue. I believe the Committee would be labouring under a misapprehension to think that for any purposes a quit-rent would be a safeguard.

(6.49.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I do not quite agree with the hon. Member (Mr. Cust.) The rent-charge is secured upon the land, and, therefore, the County Council, as owners of the rent-charge, have an interest in seeing that the security is kept intact. In order to do so, they will take care that the conditions subject to which it is created, and which are defined in Clause 7, are complied with. That being so, I think the existence of a rent-charge does give security, although not a legal one. The hon. Member is perfectly right that no powers of distress will attach to the enforcement of the conditions; but the moral security is very valuable. For that reason it seems to me that this provision for a rent-charge should be enforced. Then, my right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Chamberlain) has spoken of the importance of this in connection with the provisions which are to prevent the land being diverted from the ordinary purposes for which it was granted; and perhaps the Committee will have observed that in Clause 7 it is only for ten years that the Minister for Agriculture contemplates putting the least restriction upon the use of the land. It is, therefore, doubly important that we should insist upon this provision as to rent-charge, with the view of founding Amendments which we shall bring forward upon Clause 7.

(6.50.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: The discussion, I think, has got into a sort of legal vein, and perhaps I may be allowed to give what seems to me a common-sense or layman's view of the advantage of this provision. Originally, in the Bill I had, my proposal was that three-fourths should always be left unpaid, and a small quit-rent paid in perpetuity. The reason was this; the tenant, we will presume, is a man with not much money. He does not pay the amount of the purchase money, but instead of that he keeps the money, and pays a slight interest in perpetuity, and therefore the capital he keeps is put into the land for the cultivation of it. The second reason is this—I do not know whether it is a legal reason, but it is a reason that I think, will have influence. That reason is this—that the large balance of three-fourths, as I proposed—and I should like to see that proportion adopted now—being a first charge on the holding, there is little or no temptation to the money lender to lend anything further on it. Take the case mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman just now—£200 worth of land, a large unpaid balance of 35 per cent., and a low interest as a quit-rent. That holding would be already mortgaged, so to speak, for £70—the first charge of £70 on it due to the Local Authorities—to that extent that land would be no good to the money lender, and to that extent the purchaser would be saved from the money lender's devices. And here I will ask the House to consider what are the notorious facts. The peasant proprietors all over the world, whether it be in France, Egypt, Ireland, or anywhere else, have failed, so far as they have failed—I am not going to admit that they have failed, but they have been embarrassed—almost solely by the action of the money lenders. I will refer the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture to the results of the Commission of 1882. He was a Member of that Commission, and, if he remembers, there was evidence that went to the uttermost height as to the effect of the money lender on the small owners. Take the Isle of Axholme in his own county; there it was shown that the great trouble of these people was due first of all to paying a high price for the land; that obliged them to borrow the money, and from year to year they were subject to embarrassments from which they never recovered, and from which a man never does actually recover. It is far better, if a man does get into the money lender's control, to sell the whole business and put himself out of torment at once, and pocket what he can, than that he should go on year after year in the utmost embarrassment, knowing that there can only be one end to the thing. I will pass from the evidence taken by that Royal Commission in England, and refer the right hon. Gentleman to the evidence taken by the Sub-Commissioners of that same Commission abroad. Mr. Jenkinson's Report shows that in France the small holders begged, borrowed, or did anything in order to buy more land, and therefore they became permanently embarrassed to the money lender. That is a difficulty which might not be a legal one, but I think it shows that if an unpaid balance remains and is paid off by a perpetual quit-rent—to that extent everyone will see that the holder is relieved from the money lender. There is one other reason, and it is this—that if these small holdings are created to any large extent we shall find them passing from hand to hand in the market. Take the poorer classes of buyers. Is it not much easier for a man, a comparatively poor man, to buy a small holding with only a quit-rent on it and a small amount of purchase money, than it is if he had to pay all the purchase money down? Bear in mind that this quit-rent could never be raised upon him, and these poorer classes of purchasers would be able, in the market, to buy at a much lower price with only a quit-rent than they could if they had to pay the purchase money down. In the latter case they would have a mortgage, and they would have to go to the money lender. With regard to my hon. and learned Friend opposite, who said there was no legal safeguard for the County Council, I think he will admit that by the charge on the land already—say 50 per cent. or 35 per cent.—to that extent, at any rate, the purchasers would be safe from the money lender. But if the plan which he seems to favour is adopted, and you allow a man to pay the whole amount of the purchase, I am advised by lawyers that that man is practically free when he sells, or if it should be sold a second or third time, I am told by lawyers that any conditions which the County Council might like to put into their sale will be inoperative after there have been one or two sales. I am told that by lawyers who are conversant with this question, and what will be the consequence? We shall see a series of holdings in this country with the power of creating life interests, rent-charges, and so on, and we shall have a squalid reproduction of all the evils of our present land system, because you will have, of necessity, the worst kind of landlords. They will sub-let and they will create rent-charges, and it will lead to all the evils of the present land system. But there is a difference in a rent-charge which is private property and which can be sold at a higher and higher charge, and a charge which is sold by the County Council or the community. Let me give a case with which the right hon. Gentleman may be acquainted. I mean the case of Minster Lovell. At the present moment, within a few miles of London, there are 60 to 90 holdings of from two to four acres each. Originally there was a perpetual quit-rent of £9 10s. Some of the holders are the original proprietors of that quit-rent. They are proprietors of the holdings subject to a quit-rent, which cannot be raised upon them, of £9 10s. for the four acres. But the great majority of them are hiring their land from landlords who have purchased those quit-rents in the open market—shopkeepers in the neighbouring towns—and they are charging the poor cultivators as much as £17 a year. That is what we want to avoid. Nothing of that sort can happen in cases where the County Council has the control of these rents. I am sorry to have detained the Committee so long, but I certainly consider that this is one of the most important matters we have had to deal with in connection with this Bill.

(7.1.) MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY: I am sure the hon. Member for Bordesley need not have apologised to the Committee, because everyone knows the great interest he takes in this question. For my own part, I wish to raise a question for the consideration of the Committee. What effect will this Amendment have upon those who desire to purchase? I cannot help thinking that the person who wishes to buy a holding wishes also to have absolute ownership; and if you are going to embarrass him by imposing further conditions, I believe you will do a great deal to prevent peasant proprietors coming into the market at all. I quite agree that we are creating, in the first instance, a different class of proprietors, and that we are laying down certain conditions; but I think that those conditions should exist only as long as some portion of the purchase money has still to be paid. Two arguments have been advanced against this contention. One is the desire to enable the County Council to keep some control over the holdings. I quite agree with my hon. Friend who spoke on this side of the House that no quit-rent that could be imposed would by itself have any effect. The second argument—a very strong one—is that it is desirable to keep the land out of the hands of the money-lender. I quite agree as to that, but I would point out that until the money has been paid up the purchaser will keep out of the hands of the money-lender. The County Council has the first charge on the property, and I do not believe any money-lender could be found to advance money upon it until the whole has been paid up. I should be very sorry if the owner began to borrow money upon the property; but he would then be the absolute proprietor, and I cannot see why you should impose upon him a disability to borrow money that does not exist in the Bill. I do not believe you will keep him out of the hands of the money-lender by means of a perpetual quit-rent of one-fifth. Therefore, although I entirely sympathise with the object of the Amendment, I utterly repudiate the idea of imposing a perpetual quit-rent upon the property.

*(7.6.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I think it would be convenient for the right hon. Gentleman to state what are the conditions of the perpetual rent-charge before it is decided what proportion of the capital shall be represented by that rent-charge. He will see that other Amendments are to be proposed with regard to it. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to consider the financial quandary in which he is placing the Committee in reference to this matter. If he does not tell us what the rent-charge is to be, it will be impossible for us to judge whether it would be fair to the tenant or to the community that it should be more or that it should be less. I will try to make my meaning clear by giving a concrete example. A portion of an estate is to be purchased, for which the landlord is to be paid £100. Under the scheme of this Bill as it now stands amended, the tenant-purchaser will have to pay £20 in cash, consequently £80 will have to be provided from some public source. The County Council go to the Public Works Loan Commissioners and borrow the remainder of the money. Now, we have not been told what the tenants will have to pay on the rent-charge, or whether there will be something in it to pay off the principal, as well as to meet the yearly interest on the £80.

(7.12.) MR. CHAPLIN: I have no desire to place the Committee in any quandary whatever in regard to this matter, and I am somewhat unable to comprehend the hon. Gentleman's figures. The interest payable on the rent-charge is to be a matter of agreement between the purchaser and the County Council, precisely in the same way as the interest on the annual instalments will be. The real effect of the rent-charge will be to make the conditions binding until the rent-charge has been paid off. When that has been done, the land is perfectly free, and the owner is at liberty to do what he likes with it; and I ask why should he not be so? I have been told that in past days small freeholders were greatly injured by the extortions of money-lenders. There is nothing in the rent-charge remaining on the land which will give any safeguard against money-lenders, and I think it will be agreed that we are not called upon to make any distinction between the owner whose property is small and the owner whose property is large. What I am anxious to create is a number of freeholders of free land, and I think that object should commend itself to the Committee, and to the public beyond these doors. I consider it is only right that until the money is paid off we should insist upon the conditions we have laid down in the Bill; otherwise the County Council might run the risk of never receiving payment for their land. The Committee should recollect that if the scheme that we are proposing is a sound one, it will work well; if it is not sound no restrictions or conditions that we can impose will ultimately make it successful. I am sure that my wiser course will be to adhere to this sub-section, and, without wishing in any way to be antagonistic to my hon. Friend, that is the course I propose to adopt.

(7.17.) Mr. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I will not occupy the time of the Committee by entering into the point of difference between the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Bordesley. The right hon. Gentleman wishes to create owners with unlimited power—that is to say, without any restrictions. They may buy up the rent-charge as soon as they can get the money. What some of us on this side of the House say is that we should prevent a process being carried out which has already destroyed nearly all the small holdings. The Committee have reported that the effect of the law as it now stands is to keep out small landowners and to accumulate property in large masses. That is what we wish to prevent. We do not desire to find that, as soon as the public money has been spent for the purpose of creating a large number of cultivating owners throughout the country, they will proceed to sell at what profit they can the property so created for them at a great expense. The same objection would arise with regard to sub-letting. We desire that there should be limitations or restrictions to prevent the property being so dealt with, and it is for that reason I shall go into the Lobby in support of the Amendment.

*(7.19.) Mr. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I should like to ask what it is we are actually going to vote upon? Whether 25 or 35 per cent. is to be paid down is not very material; but whether the remaining charge is to be redeemable or not is quite another question.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): The Amendment now before the Committee is that the words "not more than one-fourth" be left out, and that "35 per cent." be inserted, which the Committee will soon be able to decide. The question that arises is whether a quit-rent is possible or not?

Mr. STOREY: I would point out that the right hon. Gentleman is not quite correct. My hon. Friend proposes to have a quit-rent all over the country.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: When the Committee have divided upon the Amendment, it can then go to the question whether the rent-charge should be terminable or not.

Question put.

(7.20.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 161; Noes 137.—(Div. List, No. 125.)

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS: In my next Amendment I will simply ask the right hon. Gentleman to leave out the words "may if the Council think fit," in page 3, line 10, and insert the word "shall." If these words are not left out it cannot be supposed that the intention will be carried out.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 10, to leave out the words "may if the Council think fit," and insert the word "shall."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Amendment negatived.

*Mr. SEYMOUR KEAY: The Amendment I have now to bring forward is—

In page 3, line 11, after the word "rent-charge," to insert the words "of such an amount as shall include the yearly interest payable by the County Council on loans, in respect of such portion of the purchase-money, and a yearly payment of not less than one per cent. to a sinking fund, which shall be established by the County Council for the purpose of the redemption of such loans."

About an hour ago I did myself the honour of asking the right hon. Gentleman if he would give to the Committee certain information which I suggested would be most valuable, inasmuch as it would enable us to know whether the rent-charge was to be lower or higher than would enable the County Councils to meet their obligations for interest and repayment of principal. The right hon. Gentleman did not give the information. The reason for which I asked for information was this—If the rent-charge is to be paid to the State by instalments fully equal, to pay the interest the County Council will itself have to pay upon the loans in respect of that part of the purchase money, then I should certainly desire that the proportion of the purchase money to be secured by the rent-charge should be high; because, in that case, if there was a sufficient instalment taken yearly both to meet interest and to furnish money for a sinking fund, then, when the County Council was able to pay off the loans incurred in respect to that part of the purchase-money represented by the rent-charge, after the loan had been fully paid, the County Council would still continue to receive that perpetual rent-charge, although the debt incurred in respect to it had been wiped off. I think that was a very reasonable question for me to propound, and I venture to again submit it as essential before this Amendment can be considered. The character of the Amendment will be to insert a provision which will be an injunction to the County Council that the rent-charge which they are to exact from the tenant purchaser in perpetuity shall not only contain the interest which they are themselves to pay, but shall also contain a payment to a sinking fund by which they will be able to extinguish of the principal of the debt. In suggesting this Amendment I would impress upon the right hon. Gentleman that without it, and taking the Bill as it stands, there is nothing to prevent any County Council jobbing away the land at a peppercorn rent. Just before the election or re-election of members some of these things are done by bodies in perhaps less favoured countries than our own. I am not prepared to let the Bill confer on County Councils the indefinite power of borrowing thousands or tens of thousands of pounds and exacting only from the tenants instalments which would not even meet the interest the Council has to pay. I would call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the special clause in the Amendment for the provision of a sinking fund, and I would point out that it will be impossible at the same time to do the two things which he states are done by this Bill. He says he does not want to put anything in the pocket of the County Council on behalf of the general community. On the other hand, the Bill provides that the County Council shall pay off their debts within fifty years. Now, if they are to pay off their own debts in fifty years, they must receive from the tenant-purchaser instalments sufficient to allow them to pay not only the yearly interest due, but to make a sinking fund to extinguish the principal of the debt in that time. If that is so, they must also have a sinking fund for that part of the purchase money to be secured by the perpetual rent-charge. Now, after the whole debt is repaid, there can be no question that they will still be in receipt of the perpetual rent-charge, and that, therefore, a sum will go into the pocket of the community. Consequently, the right hon. Gentleman is not rigidly correct in stating that the making of this rent-charge perpetual was not intended to put anything into the pocket of the County Council on behalf of the community.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 11, after the word "rent-charge," to insert the words "of such an amount as shall include the yearly interest payable by the County Council on loans, in respect of such portion of the purchase-money and a yearly payment of not less than one per cent. to a sinking fund, which shall be established by the County Council for the purpose of the redemption of such loans."—(Mr. Seymour Keay.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHAPLIN: So far as I understand the hon. Member's Amendment it appears to be open to two objections, either of which would be fatal to it. The perpetual rent-charge is to be of such an amount as shall include the yearly interest payable on the loans, and also a yearly payment of not less than one per cent. to the sinking fund. That is to say, that the yearly payment may be unlimited—it may be anything anybody pleases. The second objection is this—that the purchaser is to find the money for the sinking fund to pay off the whole debt, and yet, having found the whole of the money and the debt being paid off, the rent-charge is to remain perpetual. The Amendment then is surely of such a character that the hon. Member cannot reasonably expect me to accept it. The hon. Member said that this Amendment would prevent County Councils from doing “jobs” of a certain description, and which he seemed to expect. In that I entirely differ with him. I have no anticipation whatever of any conduct of that description on the part of the County Councils. If ever there were such an occurrence, the remedy would be in the hands of the electors, and the guilty persons would never be re-elected. I am quite unwilling to accept the Amendment.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: From the right hon. Gentleman’s first sentence, it was perfectly obvious that he does not understand the Amendment, nor the finances of his own Bill. He seemed to think it was an absurdity for me to suggest that the rent-charge should amount to enough to pay the current annual interest of the County Council loans, and that it should also include an amount sufficient to gradually destroy the principal. The right hon. Gentleman was surely not altogether absent from the House when the Land Purchase Bill was before us. The terms I have used were then adopted by the Government as binding the Land Purchase Commissioners to do exactly what I am wanting the County Councils to do by this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman abstained from even reading the wording of the Amendment. He said there was something in the Amendment which rendered it possible for the County Council to charge anything they pleased. Now, I do not think there is any suggestion of the kind. I only desire the Statute to provide what amounts shall be included in the charge, namely, sufficient to meet both principal and interest, and in that I have only followed the precedent of the Land Purchase Bill and of every other Bill dealing with the lending and re-payment of public money. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether the position he should occupy, when the first financial Amendment to his Bill is submitted, is to attempt to ridicule it, or pretend that he does not grasp its meaning? The Amendment is perfectly plain. If I am compelled to detain the Committee, it is only because the right hon. Gentleman stands up and, in consequence of two or three lines appearing recondite to him, at once says it has no meaning whatever, and sits down. I want him to recognise that it has a meaning to every financial Member of the Government but himself, and has also a plain meaning to those hon. Members throughout the House who know anything of the raising of loans or cancelling of public debt. If the right hon. Gentleman will peruse the Amendment carefully, he will find that there is nothing for him to object to, or even to reply to, except one question—is he or is he not prepared to provide that the County Council shall exact from the tenant-purchasers such sums in the shape of annual rent-charge as shall not only enable the County Council yearly to discharge its obligations for interest, but shall also contain the element of a Sinking Fund, which shall enable it to pay off the debt to the Public Works Loan Commissioners in 50 years’ time?

Question put, and negatived.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I beg to move, in page 3, line 11, to leave out from the word “rent-charge,” to the end of sub-section (4). In doing this I shall not detain the Committee, as the question involved has been threshed out. It is a question whether the perpetual rent-charge involved in this sub-section is to be redeemable or not. My object in moving this Amendment is to prevent sub-letting of the land, to enable the County Council to uphold the conditions of Clause 7, and to prevent the purchasers coming into the hands of the money-lender. It has been said that these objects cannot be maintained, but I contend otherwise, because under Clause 7 it is set forth that—not only for the 10 years, but so long as any part of the purchase-money remains unpaid—periodical payments due in respect of the purchase-money shall be made, that the holding shall be cultivated by the owner, and shall not be used for any purpose other than agriculture, and that the holding shall not be sub-divided or let without the consent of the County Council. In addition, we have been promised a registration clause; and I believe that if the County Council have a lien upon the land, they will take care not to allow sub-letting, mortgaging, or anything prejudicial to the conditions embraced in the registration. I feel very strongly on this question, and I am opposed very much to any possibility of a holder, after a certain number of years, becoming pauperised by the money-lenders.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 11, to leave out from the word "rent-charge," to the end of sub-section (4).—(Mr. Heneage.)

(7.51.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I hope the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) will accept this Amendment. I am bound to say this seems a wonderful sub-section. It may be clear to the legal mind, but I should think it is not clear to any other. In my opinion, it is a sub-section that will not at all carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee. If this Amendment is negatived the result will be that those who are better off than their neighbours will redeem the land-charge and then sub-let their holdings and put on a rack-rent, and all this will tend to diminish the benefits of what is really a good Act.

(7.53.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvon, Eifion): It seems to me that if this Amendment is passed it will have directly the opposite effect to that which is intended. I think it would be better to let the words stand, and insert the word "not" after "shall." The clause will then read—

"A portion representing not more than one-fourth of the purchase-money may, if the County Council think fit, be secured by a perpetual rent-charge, which shall 'not' be redeemable in manner directed by Section 45 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, with respect to rent-charges to which that section applies."

My contention is that even if you omit the words proposed to be omitted, instead of inserting the word "not," the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act will still apply to this clause.

*(7.55.) MR. JEFFREYS: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not accept this Amendment. We are going to give land to some of our labourers, and I think they should have it on the same terms as we possess ours. There is nothing more unpopular than to have these charges placed on the land. The whole tendency of present-day legislation is to sweep them away, and I cannot understand why we should legislate to create freeholders and then burden them in this fashion. I quite appreciate what the Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) said about the money-lenders. It would be unfortunate if those men were able to get the freeholders into their power, but I think that is not likely to be the case. I am sure the yeomen of England are not people you can easily get over. They are quite as capable of looking after their own property as we are, and I do not see why we should impose this charge upon them and so prevent them from obtaining the freehold of their land.

(8.0.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): It appears to me that the effect of this Amendment would be to create a new form of tenure of land. Speaking for myself, I do not think that would be desirable. The holdings so affected would be subject to all the restrictions and disabilities contained in Clause 7. It would be necessary that they should be cultivated by their owners for agricultural purposes alone, and they would not be allowed to subdivide or re-sell any of the land to smaller people, even after they had paid off all the purchase-money except the rent-charge. It appears to me that the Bill already goes a long way in the direction of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Heneage), because as long as the rent-charge remains unpaid the land will be subject to the restrictions of Clause 7, and a certain process involving some difficulty will have to be gone through before the owner can get rid of that charge. If the words objected to are allowed to stand in the Bill it will always be possible for the purchaser, by going to the Copyhold Commissioner, to get rid of the rent-charge and secure his freehold. I believe that these small holders will desire to be in the same position as others possessing land, and I shall therefore oppose the Amendment.

*(8.3.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I utterly disagree with the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, and I hope we shall go to a division on this Amendment. We aim at creating under this Bill, by the help of the national credit, a class of men who shall themselves cultivate their holdings, and we object to having a repetition of creating such holdings every generation. If, however, this Amendment is rejected, we shall have to do the same work over and over again. The House has no right to use the national funds for the purpose of creating a class of individuals who directly they have paid their instalments for ten years may go and make a profit by selling their land to someone else, or by becoming landlords. The Select Committee have recommended that a certain rent-charge should remain the property of the community, and that the ownership should be conditional upon the bona fide occupation and cultivation of the land by the purchaser. I hope, therefore, we shall go to a Division upon this question, and try to prevent any need for a repetition of what we are now doing by this Bill.

MR. HERBERT T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture will not accept this Amendment. I believe if this quit-rent is not made redeemable it will be the greatest obstacle to the success of this Bill. As to the question of the money-lenders I confess that that argument had some weight with me once, but I think if these small holders are to fall into the hands of these gentry they will not be prevented from doing so by any quit-rent. If you really believe this Bill is for the benefit of the country, and will create a class of landowners who will continue on the soil and restore again that class of yeomen who are gone, I do not think the House should attach conditions to their ownership which, to say the least, will not make them very grateful.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I do not think some hon. Members opposite quite understand the Report of the Select Committee. That Report is one of great ability, and it goes fully into this question, and for reasons of a most conclusive character recommends that there shall be a different class of tenure from the freeholders in regard to these new holdings. The reason why that Committee—and I am speaking from memory—recommended in substance some form of tenure of the kind proposed is this. Experience shows that there is a great tendency in land to accumulate in some parishes into a few hands, and it is most desirable to provide in some way or other that the land obtained for small holdings by means of the public funds shall be consecrated to that purpose for the future; otherwise this House may be compelled to do over and over again the same work that the right hon. Gentleman is desirous of doing now. The spirit of the Report of the Select Committee is that something should be done to make these small holdings perpetual. This is the very pith of the whole thing recommended by that Committee, as I think the Attorney General will find if he has a copy of the Report with him.

(8.8.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I think my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries a little exaggerates the strength of the recommendation of the Select Committee. I do not, however, propose to deal with that any further, but I should like to say a few words on the principle of the question now before the Committee. The real question is, are you or are you not going to restrict the ownership of these small holders? The view my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) has taken is that if we are going to create this class of proprietor the County Council should be secured so far as instalments of the purchase money are concerned, but that when the purchaser has shown his solvency and comes with his purchase-money and says, "Make me a freeholder," no restrictions ought to be imposed on his ownership. On what principle of equity or right can restrictions be imposed by the County Council which no other freeholder has imposed upon him? It is a mere incident in connection with this question whether or not there is a quit-rent. The mere existence of such a charge will not, I think, prevent the evils which the right hon. Member opposite seemed anxious should be prevented. Certainly experience does not lead me to the same conclusion as he has arrived at. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) has several times laid down the principle, and I support him, and I believe the principle finds acceptance on both sides of the House, that if you are going to create this class of peasant proprietors you must secure to the County Councils the payment of the instalments, and see that the land is not starved and thrown back in a worthless condition on the hands of the County Council. But when a man has shown his solvency and has proved by his industry that he is without doubt the class of man which it is hoped to benefit by this Bill, then you can act differently. It will not do always to keep these small peasant proprietors in leading strings; they must not be prevented from becoming the absolute owners, and we think all that the County Council ought to do is to see that the money will be paid, and having secured that object we fail to see why all restrictions on the ownerships should not be removed. I am very much in sympathy with the Member for Bordesley in the object he wishes to attain; but I think he has shown in this matter that simplicity of character which marks everything he does. Now, I on the other hand belong to a profession which is naturally brought very closely in contact with the troubles of life, and speaking from experience I venture to say that if a man is going to borrow money no quit-rent will save him from the money-lenders. The only effect of this will be that when the money-lender finds that borrowers have a charge upon their holdings he will be all the more exacting in the terms which he imposes, and will get much higher interest. I am glad the House adopted the 20 per cent. instead of the 25 per cent. to be paid down, because that will give all the less room for the money-lender to screw. The real question is, Is it or is it not desirable that the land should be fettered by restrictions? When a man is in a position to become the actual owner of the land you ought not to impose restrictions beyond the payment of the instalments. I care not whether you call it rent-charge or instalment, it is merely a matter of phraseology, but I do say that when a peasant proprietor becomes the owner of the land he ought to be allowed to deal freely with it. Our idea is that this rent-charge, though it is perpetual, shall be redeemable, and that is the idea to which effect is given in the Bill. The hon. Member for Bordesley thought this was a confusion of terms, but it is nothing of the kind. It simply means that in fixing a rent-charge we do not fix it on the basis of a sinking fund. The rent-charge should be redeemable in a way which is found to work well, and we do lay it down as a principle that when the peasant proprietor has become the absolute owner he should be left unfettered and unshackled to deal with the land as he likes.

(8.15.) MR. HALDANE: We on this side of the House say that the reason why we should differentiate this class of owners from any other class is that we are asked to make use of public money in order to create their position. Another reason is that we do not wish to create a class of small proprietors only; we wish to put a certain class upon the land, and to keep them there. If the plan of the Government is adopted the result will be to create a number of small holders, who may deal with the land not as agriculturists or small farmers, but may in the end become a large class of absentee landlords. These are the grounds which this Amendment raises, and upon these we feel it our duty to insist.

(8.17.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Will the Attorney General tell us what is the object of this Bill? I understood it was to create owners of the cultivating class, and I hold that if a man wants to get a small holding with which he can do anything he likes besides cultivate it, he should buy the holding for his own benefit outside of this Bill. I would refer the Attorney General to the fact that this is not a new kind of tenure. It exists in Holland, especially in the northern provinces, where the farmers are the most prosperous. There you find precisely this tenure with a perpetual quit-rent and considerations, and according to the observation of those who have seen the system, the farmers in that part of the country are, as I have said, the most prosperous in Holland. In Denmark you find a precisely similar class, and here, again, there is greater prosperity than in any other class. They consider that for all cultivating purposes they have absolute ownership; and we think that if we go outside this purpose and allow a man to speculate in land, we ought not to use the public money. Further than this, we must look after the interests of the small cultivators. The city tradesman would be delighted to buy a plot of this kind, and put a profit on it, and be the rent receiver, and we want to protect the small cultivator from that. Suppose after some years there is an auction of a small holding which has been made a freehold in the way that is now proposed. How will the poorer class of cultivators have any chance of buying that? But if the holding were sold for a small amount of purchase money with an annual quit-rent, and with the condition of cultivation, the small cultivators whom we desire to put on the land will be able to secure the holdings. If you make these small cultivators the absolute owners, they will be bought out by other people, and the object of the Bill defeated. I had no idea my right hon. Friend (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) was so enamoured of the present system of tenure that he should advocate it as he has done. We think that this Amendment will not at all increase the power of the money lender, and, indeed, if a man has already paid £100, say of £200, he is less likely to want to borrow the money.

(8.24.) MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I should like to call the attention of some of my friends on this side of the House to the fact that they have gone astray from old Liberal principles. There is I know a hope prevailing amongst them that the County Council will be able to acquire for themselves a rent-charge which hereafter will be applicable to the relief of the rates. I think I am right in assuming that that is what they have in view. But how do they propose to attain that object? They propose to do it by taking from the small cultivating owner, the small labouring man, a portion of the interest he is to pay to the State, and to accumulate that money in the hands of the State at the expense of the small holder. Then what is the next step? The persons who will be relieved are the ratepayers, and the rates we know ultimately come out of the pockets of the landlords. That is a fact which is perfectly well-known on both sides of this House. They do not come out of the pockets of landlords during the existence of long leases, and therefore we are anxious to get rid of long leases, but in the end they come out of the pockets of the landlords. Therefore you will be taxing the small cultivator to put money in the hands of the rich landlord, for that is the upshot of the policy. I speak for the small holder, for I know what the small holder wants, at all events in my part of the country. He wants what this Bill unfortunately will not give him—land at an easy rent. It has been objected that these small properties will fall back again into the hands of the big landlords. We are passing this Bill as an antidote to that, and we believe that this Bill will be an effective antidote. With respect to this Amendment, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will stick to his guns.

(8.28.) MR. HENEAGE: The hon. Member was not present when the Amendment was moved. It does not in any way add to the cost of the purchase. The only question is whether the rent-charge should be made for ever or whether it should be redeemable by money. There is no proposal whatever in my Amendment that anything should be added to the costs of the purchaser, such costs to go into the pockets of anyone else. I admit, however, that there is a flaw in the Amendment in carrying out what I desire; and in order to raise the question more definitely, I think it would be better to withdraw this Amendment, and divide on the word "not."

(8.28.) MR. CHAPLIN: I rise for the purpose of making an appeal to the Committee, and asking whether the time has not come for us to go to a division on this Amendment, which has been before us so long. The right hon. Gentleman attaches very much more importance to the point he has raised than I do, and I must say I am honestly convinced that the course the Government propose is the right course to adopt. I cannot conceive anything more deterrent to intending purchasers than the knowledge of the fact that for all time to come their land will be subject to a charge of which they cannot get rid. Englishmen wish to be owners of their land. That may be an old sentiment, but it is perfectly true, and so far as my experience and knowledge go, by insisting on this charge you will be doing much to deter purchasers. I only wish to say one or two words in regard to the theories concerning the future of these freeholders. The Committee must remember that although it is perfectly true that there have been in years past a great number of freeholders who have come to an unfortunate end, they obtained possession of their properties in different times, and under very different conditions to those under which they would obtain them at the present day. They bought when land was dear and the prices of produce were high, and when prices fell these unfortunate people were in a condition of extreme difficulty; but they flourished so long as prices were high. If that is not so, how is it that in past years numbers of freeholders in Lincolnshire existed in prosperity till the depression came ten or fifteen years ago, when my attention was first called to the great trouble and distress they suffered? For these reasons I must, I am sorry to say, oppose the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and I should be glad if the Committee could now come to a decision upon it.

*(9.5.) MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON: I would remind hon. Gentlemen here that there are not only first mortgages, but second, third, and fourth mortgages, and, if you like, subsequent mortgages of estates; and, therefore, the proposition that because you have a mortgage on a property it becomes unmortgageable is nonsense. And then, with reference to the proposition that if you have a rent-charge upon a property you make it less capable of being mortgaged, that is equally fallacious. An enormous amount of property in this country consists of leasehold property. That property invariably is subject to a ground-rent or a rent-charge; and that property, subject to a ground-rent or rent-charge, is the object of continual and repeated mortgages. An enormous proportion of the property of London is leasehold, and all this leasehold property is continually mortgaged, all subject to ground-rent or rent-charge, and various annual payments. To talk about the existence of a rent-charge or fee farm rent, or whatever you please to call it, in connection with these small holdings, as a protection against the power of the proprietor to mortgage is absurd. The truth is that these conditions which you propose should be placed upon the small holders, so far as they have any effect, will be detrimental to them and to the property which you propose to vest in them. We have been told that these people ought to submit to these conditions because they are not getting the land by money of their own, but by the aid of public money. Well, that is very true, but the public money is to be advanced as a matter of State policy. It is not only for individual advantage, but it is a matter of State policy. This is not the only case in which the State has come forward to encourage property for the benefit of a certain class. There have been Acts of Parliament under which public money has been advanced for the purposes of workmen's dwellings and small holdings in towns. An hon. Gentleman, still a Member of this House, I believe, has received a very considerable amount of public money on easy terms to encourage him in erecting artisans' dwellings. If unnecessary and unreasonable conditions are insisted upon, they will work the greatest hardship upon the poorest persons — those whom you most desire to encourage. You should make the holdings as free and attractive as possible, and not put them under conditions which will deter people from taking them, or will, if they take them, place them under very great difficulties. It would be an enormous advantage to create small holdings by free purchase and sale. When the supply increases you meet the demand; it may be that a number of these holdings may be owned by small landlords, but then there will be small holdings in the market; and as there are more, there will be more properties of that kind to offer; and those who rent them will be able to get them at less rent, and, even if what the hon. Member for Bordesley anticipates does happen, still it will not be the disadvantage that he ventures to imagine. The hon. Member seems to think there should be no inducement to the thriving tradesman in the town to lay out his money in acquiring small holdings. If the thriving industrious tradesman in the town lays out his money in this way, it will be a very good thing, because he will increase the number of small holdings and increase the supply of them. I believe there is a considerable demand for small holdings; and if landowners had the means at their disposal, there would be a great many properties cut up. But the fact is, that it is a matter of expense, and that the return received in respect of these small holdings is not sufficient, in a financial point of view, to draw capital into the cutting up of the land. Therefore, small holdings ought to be encouraged by legislation like this. Of course, if the demand for these small holdings should fall off, then you are landed in some difficulty, but that is hardly the basis of any argument used by the hon. Member (Mr. Jesse Collings). I am very much surprised to find that hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, who always pose before the country as men in favour of "free" land—land free from all restrictions—are now proposing to create a class of property in this country subject to all sorts of objectionable restrictions—the very restrictions which they have in the past been endeavouring to get rid of. I hope, in dealing with this matter, the traditional policy of the Liberal Party will be followed rather than the new-fangled notions of some eccentric politicians who have latterly become identified with novel and exceedingly peculiar notions in connection with landowning in this country.

*(9.17.) SIR W. B. BARTELOTT (Sussex, North-West): I give my hon. Friend the Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) every credit for having introduced this question, because I believe he seriously thinks that it would be the best way not only of helping the labourer, but also of protecting the ratepayer; but I will venture to say that that is a great fallacy when you come to deal conclusively with men of the type whom he hopes to place on that land. The first question they will ask is—"Are we to be treated in the same way as other men are treated who are owners of land?" The answer will be "You are not." It will at once appear to them that you are not going to trust them as I think they ought to be trusted; and if you wish to prevent men from becoming occupiers or small proprietors then that is the course that you should pursue. No one who knows anything about the conditions of land at the present time will say that it is a particularly inviting time for a man to take land. I will venture to say, and I will venture to say it strongly, that if I had to advise a man with regard to a little money he had at this particular juncture, I would say: "Don't invest it in the purchase of land at this particular moment. You may depend upon it that if you do, although the land may appear to be cheap, and although you may be in a position now to think you will be able to do well, look at those who surround you and see how many of them at this present moment whom you think in good positions and with money are able to pay their rents." I will say that a man investing at this particular moment in land is more likely to lose his money than he would be to gain anything by it. I say it honestly and openly, because I know it to be a fact; and I am going a step further. Suppose this man finds himself in this difficulty; suppose that, having got a small property, he is anxious, more or less, to get rid of it. In what position is the property placed by being hampered by this restriction? It will not be in the same position for sale in the market with that restriction hanging around it as if it were absolutely free. I venture to hope my right hon. Friend will stand to what he has put in the Bill.

(9.20.) MR. STOREY: The right hon. Baronet who has just spoken is, I think, under a little misapprehension. He said if you want to help the labourer you must do so and so; but what I wish to represent to him is that the precise point to be considered has nothing to do with the labourer at all. The labourer is a man who is going to be provided for under a different clause of the Bill. He is the man for whom the County Council is going to buy land, and to whom it is going to let land. But what we are considering at the present moment is a number of persons who must be better off than any of the agricultural labourers we know in the north or anywhere. They must be better off, because those persons with whom we are dealing now are men who must lay down 20 per cent. of the purchase money of their farms, and who, after providing the money to stock them, must work them at their own expense. Now, the right hon. Baronet will admit that a man of this class cannot be a labourer, and is not a labourer, and is not meant to be a labourer. We are not discussing any question of advantage being given to labourers, because even if we were, even so base a Radical, according to my hon. Friend the Member for South Pancras, as myself would cordially join the right hon. Baronet in doing anything we could for the labourers. We do not object to that portion of the Bill, but what we are considering at the present moment is the proposal of the Bill as to these better-to-do persons. What we have got to say about that very shortly is this—that in our judgment, if you are going to use the public money for the purpose of creating a new class of landowners, common-sense says, if political exigencies do not—Surround these minnows with such restrictions by law as will prevent them from being absorbed by the Tritons around them. What is the tendency of all economic laws at the present moment, and what is our knowledge of the past? A man gets a farm, a little freehold; he lives upon it, and works upon it. By-and-by he has a son—the right hon. Gentleman spoke of Lincolnshire, but I am telling a history which could be repeated a thousand-fold in the further north—the son goes to college, gets a little better education than his father, and gets notions. He may enter into a profession; he goes back to the little ancestral home, but it is not big enough for him, and he lets the farm. Then he goes to the town, and marries a wife, probably, and has children in his turn. Those children have notions, and by-and-by they get out of the father's occupation, and the proceeds of the little farm as let, do not satisfy him. He has to mortgage it, and he changes it and changes it, and at last when he has to sell, and who buys it? Not another occupying owner, whom we should be glad to see in possession. “An Amuranthan Amuranth succeeds.” If after one occupying owner comes out of possession of the land another succeeded, the public would have nothing to complain of. But what the experience of the past teaches us is this. There sits the little owner, and close to him is the great landowner who does not care about the economic value of the land. What he is looking for is territorial position and political power, and he will go and buy out the little occupying owner whom we want to have in possession, and he will add Naboth's vineyard to Ahab's possessions. That may be very advantageous to the limited class, but it is undesirable in the interests of the community at large. We want to build up the ancient occupying owners of the land. And we propose a Bill—not we Radicals; it is not necessary for us to propose reforming or revolutionary Bills now-a-days; we can get it done by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. They propose a Bill, and say it is for the purpose of creating occupying owners—hard-working men who will take off their coats and dig or plough the land and be content with the fruits thereof. What we have to say to the Government is—“Gentlemen, if you are really in earnest in carrying out this proposal—if you really want a suitable proportion of the land of England to be managed and owned by occupying owners who till it themselves, surround your Bill with restrictions which will prevent the rich man from swallowing up the poor. That is the reason—I could not state it with more brevity—why I support the omission of this portion of the Clause. The right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment says, in effect, that unless you surround this whole scheme of yours with sufficient restrictions, economic laws will have their effect; the experience of the past will be repeated, and the large landowners around will gradually swallow up the small ones again; and thirty years hence some other Minister, as convinced as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture is now convinced, will come and re-propose this method, and will take public money again to create occupying owners, only to learn that unless he surrounds the thing with restrictions he will never succeed. There was one objection made on the opposite side to this proposal, and that was that, in itself, it was not of value. I freely admit that. But I think the hon. Member who spoke from the Bench above me put the case very clearly and neatly and sufficiently when he said that although the Amendment in itself is insufficient for the purpose, yet, if viewed in relation to Clause 7, to which, in a week or two, we shall probably come, the Amendment is very desirable and very substantial. It is for that reason that I support the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman will not accuse me of being a supporter of his Bill. I told him frankly from the very first I was not. I think in this respect it is a huge sham. So far as it enables labourers to secure land by letting it will be valuable; but I think, as to the selling of land to occupying owners, it is a huge sham.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: No, no!

MR. STOREY: I am sorry my hon. Friend the Member for Bordesley does not agree with me.

MR. STOREY: He knows very well—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. STOREY: I submit that it is entirely to the question that I should reply to my hon. Friend, who disagrees with me as to the suggestion that the Bill, so far as this sub-section is concerned in the creation of peasant proprietorship, is a huge sham, because the right hon. Gentleman will not consent to omit the words which it is proposed from these Benches to omit, and thus enable the County Council to prevent the occupying owner from being ousted from the land by the great gormandising land owners in his immediate vicinity. If it is thought that a statement like that is out of Order, all I have to say is that I and my father before me have seen the old statesmen of the country—or those you call the yeomen—through their own weakness, and the strength of the great landowners one by one driven from the land which has thus come into the hands of a comparatively small number of persons. What I have to say about this Bill is that the right hon. Gentleman may, with the help of the Liberal Party, pass this clause, and live in the hope—it can be but a vain hope—that by its means he can put thousands of persons on the land as occupying owners; but I venture to say that unless he leaves to the County Councils control over the holdings, he will see the time arrive when the whole of these small landholders will be driven again out of the possession of the land. I hope it will be realised by those who are in charge of this Bill that the objection we take to it is deep-rooted on this point. We are not opposed to the proposal to let land to the agricultural labourers; but we do object to the money belonging to the general body of ratepayers being used in order to benefit a certain number of large landowners. I, therefore, shall support the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

Question put.

(9.40.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 112; Noes 79.—(Div. List, No. 126.)

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I now beg to move—

In page 3, after line 24, to insert (a) "The rate of interest charged by a County Council on all unpaid purchase-money shall be at the rate of one per cent. above the rate of interest paid by the County Council to the Treasury at the date of such advance; (b.) All unpaid balance of purchase-money, and all interest thereon shall be a first charge on the small holding."

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I wish to call attention to the fact that I have an Amendment to move first.

THE CHAIRMAN: It has been already rejected.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I have prepared another Amendment, which I think will be in Order. It is as follows:—

In page 3, line 15, after the word "and," to insert the words "shall include the portion of such purchase-money as is secured by the perpetual rent-charge."

THE CHAIRMAN: It is the same as was negatived on the last sub-section.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: With all respect I would explain that my object in dropping my former Amendment, and of proposing this one—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension if he thinks he dropped the former one. It was negatived.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: What the hon. Member seeks—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Bordesley should confine himself to his own Amendment.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: The object of my Amendment is to secure for the County Council some return for the money which it will borrow for the purchase of small holdings. The Local Authority will only retain that margin which is due to its superior credit, and a consequent advantage is that the ratepayers would be absolutely secured from loss, and this margin of one per cent., if invested as a Sinking Fund would, in addition, in course of time recoup the ~~County Council~~ and leave the authorities in receipt of a permanent income from the holdings. No harm would be done to the purchaser, who would get the money at the lowest rate; and, further, the inhabitants would be interested in this Bill, as they would not only be indemnified against loss, but, as a locality, would also be in receipt of an income from these small holdings. The rural districts would be greatly benefited, and the ratepayers would receive nothing more than justice. I could say a good deal more in favour of the Amendment; but I am anxious not to detain the Committee, seeing that many arguments have been addressed to this particular Amendment, although it was not then before the House.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, after line 24, to insert—“(a.) The rate of interest charged by a county council on all unpaid purchase money shall be at the rate of one per cent. above the rate of interest paid by the county council to the Treasury at the date of such advance; (b.) All unpaid balance of purchase money, and all interest thereon, shall be a first charge on a small holding.”—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member is perfectly correct in saying that we have already had a considerable number of arguments advanced in support of the specific proposal contained in the Amendment. But there are three objections to the Amendment, which the hon. Member will perhaps permit me to point out. In the first place, I believe it to be unnecessary, as the County Councils can already charge the scale of interest he specifies if they are desirous of so doing. If the hon. Member will look two or three lines ahead in the Bill he will see—so that it is clearly within their power to charge the rate of interest he lays down. I also think it is objectionable that the County Council should be compelled by a rigid law to charge a certain interest. My hon. Friend says the ratepayers would get some benefit, but from whom? From the very people in whose interest this Bill is brought forward. And now I come to the third objection contained in the second sub-section he moves. In that sub-section he proposes that the unpaid balance shall be made a first charge. There is here a difficulty which I have endeavoured to avoid in drawing up the Bill. There may be existing charges, as for instance, for drainage or for land improvement or something of that nature, on the land which is purchased by the County Council; and it would be impossible, therefore, to over-ride those and make the first charge in this cost. In addition to these objections, I think every hon. Member will see that the County Councils are the people who must look after their own interest in this matter; and we may depend upon it that they will not advance the money until they have got good security. For these reasons I am opposed to the Amendment.

“That the purchase money is to be repaid by half-yearly instalments with such interest as the County Council may decide;”

MR. BARCLAY: I hope the House will not agree to this Amendment, which proposes that the County Council shall make a profit of 35 per cent. out of these unfortunate people. I hold that the success of this Bill depends entirely upon the small purchaser getting the holding at a reasonable price, and I believe the interests of the measure will be best served by allowing the County Councils to make the best bargain they can.

MR. STOREY: The aim of such criticism as I have offered in connection with this Bill has been to give the Local Authorities as much control as possible. I am sure that in making these advances they will secure themselves against loss; and here I may venture to point out to the hon.

Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) that in Clause 12, Sub-section 3, he will find that the Public Works Loan Commissioners may lend money

"at such rate of interest not less than £3 2s. 6d. per cent. as the Treasury may authorise as being in their opinion sufficient to enable such loans to be made without loss to the Exchequer."

Now, if that be the principle, I think it cannot be denied that the Local Authority would be perfectly justified in lending the money on such terms as would enable them to escape without loss. In doing so, they would clearly have to take account of the chances that some would pay, and that some would not pay, and fix upon such a rate of interest as would cover that possibility. I think it will be found, both as to the residue and as to the rent-charge, that the County Council will take care that the money they advance shall be advanced for such interest as will not only secure them against the possibility of future loss, but also leave a small amount in pocket; and to this I hold that the ratepayers are entitled, seeing that they provide the purchasers with security of position, ownership of land, and all the possibilities of being independent. That is a point on which we differ from the right hon. Gentleman. I think my hon. Friend might safely leave this matter to the County Councils; and, speaking for the North, I know those bodies will view the security of the ratepayers as their first duty. I hope the Amendment will be negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member's Amendment would not be consistent with the words of the previous subsection, and, therefore, is not in Order.

(10.5.) MR. HALDANE: I beg, Sir, to move the following Amendment:—

In page 3, after line 37, add—“(9) The County Council may repurchase a small holding or determine any existing lease thereof at any time by agreement; and they may repurchase a small holding or determine any existing lease thereof at any time compulsorily for any purpose of public improvement, or local utility, or for building purposes, or because the land is capable of being used more profitably than as a small holding; and the price to be paid on any such repurchase or determination of an existing lease of a small holding shall be based upon the value of the land as land held as a small holding, together with all unexhausted improvements made thereon, and ten per centum for compulsory purchase, and a proper allowance for loss of fixtures, or acts of husbandry, deducting therefrom any sums due to the County Council: Provided that nothing shall be paid by the County Council for any increased value of the small holding which has accrued since the time when it was sold or let by them, and is due to the increase or movement of the population in, or to the industrial or other developments of any town or other populous place in the neighbourhood of the small holding, and not to any improvements or acts of management made or done by the owner or lessee of the small holding or any previous owner or lessee thereof.”

We are by this Bill creating a new form of tenure which applies only to the future, and it seems to me only reasonable that the County Council shall have the power to compulsorily buy the land by paying compensation.

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

(10.7.) MR. CHAPLIN: I can quite understand that circumstances may arise under which it will be desirable that small holdings which have been provided should be acquired for purposes of public improvement or utility. But the County Council have the power to do so now by precisely the same method as other land can be taken by them for various purposes. I think, therefore, that the Amendment is quite unnecessary. I can conceive nothing more likely to make the Bill a dead letter and deter people from the purchase of small holdings than a provision giving the County Council the power to step in and take away, by giving a miserable compensation, the small holding of a man on which he has established a home for himself and his family, and to which he has been looking for the future. I can imagine nothing that will more effectively prevent the Bill coming into force.

MR. HALDANE: I do not wish to take up the time of the Committee by a division on this matter, if as I think there is a general feeling against me. (“No, no!”) In that case I will leave the matter to the Committee.

*MR. MORTON: I consider, Sir, that the part of this Amendment which relates to the compulsory acquisition of land for public improvements is of considerable importance. As long ago as 1817 an Act was passed giving the authorities in London power to take lands for public improvements, so far as widening or lengthening of streets is concerned, and that has been of great value. I am certain that the improvements which have been carried out in the City of London could not have been done but for that Act, because the expense of coming to Parliament each time an improvement was decided upon would have been too costly. If the hon. and learned Member would limit his Amendment to that part which refers to public improvements, I think it would be a very useful one indeed.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I beg to move the following Amendment:—In page 4, line 5, to leave out from the word “shall,” to the word “be,” in line 7. The clause as it stands runs thus:—“Every small holding sold by the County Council under this Act shall for a term of ten years from the date of the sale, and thereafter so long as any part of the purchase-money remains unpaid, be held subject to the following conditions.” It will be seen that the object of this Amendment is to make the conditions permanent. As the clause stands now all the conditions provided will cease after a certain time and the holders will be then able to subdivide their holdings, build on them, or do anything they like with them.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 5, to leave out from the word “shall” to the word “be,” in line 7.

(10.12.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: This is really a very important Amendment, and I hope the Government will carefully consider it. When we were discussing at an earlier part of the evening the necessity of applying certain conditions to the creation of these holdings, I think there was a universal feeling in the House that such conditions were necessary. But it was stated by my hon. Friend opposite that legally speaking it was not possible to secure these conditions by the establishment of a rent-charge. As I understood him a rent-charge would not give the legal power of enforcing the conditions, but he said all that is necessary is that there shall be statutory conditions which could be otherwise enforced. Well, I need not say that the argument of my hon. Friend involves the admission that the conditions are desirable, and I certainly understood him to speak from the position of one who supported the conditions. The important conditions in this clause are that the holdings shall be cultivated by the owner, and shall not be used for any purposes other than agriculture. Now, what is going to happen under this clause as it stands? A slice is to be taken out of the landlord's estate for the purpose of creating small holdings. Ten years after this sacrifice has been made the small owner may sell his land, and a factory may be erected upon it by the persons who would have become the successors in title. That is a state of things which Sub-section (b) is intended to prevent. I think it would be intolerable that the land given up for this national purpose should hereafter be used so as to be a nuisance to the whole neighbourhood, and especially to the estate out of which it has been created. The next sub-section was that the holding should not be sub-divided or let without the consent of the County Council. Is it really the intention of the Committee to create a congested district upon the estate? because that is a possibility we should keep in view. We know it has often been said that the great danger in connection with small holdings is that when the original small holder dies his estate may be cut up into holdings too small to satisfactorily provide for the subsistence of a number of families, and that you would get a pauperised population on the ground. That is prevented by the sub-section for ten years, but why should it not be permanently impossible? If it is right for ten years it is right permanently, and the whole public purpose Parliament has in view would be lost if after ten years the holding might be cut up into an indefinite number of smaller holdings perfectly incapable of supporting the families residing upon them. The same remarks apply to the other conditions, which I am quite sure everyone will agree are necessary to secure the comfort of the people who are hereafter to be small holders. I think that the Government having devised these very skilful and satisfactory securities against the abuse of the privileges, should make them permanent statutory conditions, and should not limit them to a period of ten years.

(10.20.) MR. BARCLAY : This Amendment deals with a very important question—namely, the tenure on which these holdings are to be held. I should be extremely sorry if this Bill were to create a new class of small landlords, with all the powers possessed by the present owners. The present system has already broken down in Ireland, and though hon. Gentlemen opposite would, perhaps, not like to admit it, it is fast breaking down in England, and I hope Parliament will not sanction the creation of a new class of small landlords, which would be still more objectionable than the large landowners. There are now a number of small landlords who let on yearly tenancies or for a period of years, and I am informed that the tenants of these small landlords are in a most miserable condition, and far worse off than the tenants of the large landowners. I hope, therefore, the House will very carefully consider the conditions on which these small holdings are to be held. My proposal is that if the small holders do let, the tenants who occupy shall be placed in the position of the Irish tenants under the Irish Land Act. The objections to the present system are that the landlord can turn out the tenant at will, he can appropriate the tenant's improvements and he can raise the rent. We must place the tenants in such a position that they will be protected from the landlords, and I have on the Paper a new Sub-section which proposes that if the new landlords let their holding, it shall be let on perpetuity of tenure, that the rent shall not be occasionally raised, and that the lease shall be assignable. With these conditions I think we should achieve the object we have in view, and we should give the cultivator what he wants—perpetuity of tenure and a fixed rent.

*(10.25.) MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON : Most people will sympathise with the object which the Member for West Birmingham has in view, but I hardly think he has considered the effect which these conditions will have upon the property. It is suggested that if the property is to be sold by the peasant owner the original owner and the County Council are to have rights of pre-emption. To that I object altogether. The holding is not to be used for any purpose except that of agriculture. That is all very well for the first occupier, who perhaps is an agriculturist; but his son, to whom he may leave the property, may not be an agriculturist and could not carry on the cultivation of the land. Is the owner to be debarred from leaving his holding to whomsoever he pleases? If the holder wants to let, the consent of the County Council must be obtained. I must say that though I have a good opinion of County Councils, I doubt very much whether the control of the County Council in a matter of this kind is calculated to add to the value of the land. Then we are told that there is not to be more than one dwelling house upon it. It may be a very desirable thing that there should be more than one dwelling house; but if a second is erected, the Local Authority may interfere. That, again, is not calculated to improve the value of this property, or to make it attractive as an investment. The object of the Bill is professedly to induce careful people, whom we want to benefit, to put their savings into the land—as the President of the Board of Agriculture expressed it, we want to make a ladder by which the agricultural labourer can climb into the position of a small farmer. I say that the man who cultivates must have the inducement that he can dispose of the land if he wishes with the tenant right put into it; and if you hamper him with conditions, you will discourage both investment and cultivation—if you impose all these conditions, you will tie the land up more completely than under a settlement. We have often heard from these Opposition Benches of the iniquities of settlement and restrictive covenants; and here restrictions are proposed from this side of the House which are practically more offensive than any restrictions of settlement. The small holder would be almost in a condition of servitude to the land. All this is opposed to the principles which have influenced men on this side of the House in the past, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman, instead of extending the clause, will see his way to modify it. I can quite understand that while the County Council has money upon the land they should keep the control, but when the purchaser has paid off the County Council, it is monstrous that he should have to submit to these arbitrary and unfair restrictions.

(10.33.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has made a speech which can hardly refer to the Motion before the House. He attacked all the conditions of this clause and made a speech against the clause as a whole, but except in a very small part of his oration he did not deal with the Amendment at all. It seems to me that under this Bill we are creating a new tenure in land altogether, and we are creating that tenure for a special purpose—the purpose of setting up a number of small holders on the land with a beneficial effect from an agricultural point of view. It does seem to me if we are to undertake this work—good work, I believe—at the expense of the ratepayers, we are justified in saying that the land which the ratepayer provides for these small holdings for agricultural purposes shall be restricted to those purposes. If any benefit is to be got from the land, we have all along contended that the County Council ought to get it, and that is why we wished them to have power to lease or feu the land. It has been decided that they shall sell these small holdings; but I think if the holders use it for other purposes, such as building, the increased value should be for the benefit of the ratepayers, and not be handed over to the small holders who got the land for agricultural purposes. For these reasons, I shall certainly support the Amendment.

(10.37.) MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment, because I am sure it will provide more facilities to the County Council in dealing with the owners of land. If the Amendment is accepted, the clause, as amended, will offer great security to the landowners that the land which the County Council is buying expressly for agricultural purposes will not, after a period of ten years, be turned to other purposes, such as the erection of a factory or dwellings. I think that is a fair security to offer the landlords, who will possibly part with their land to their own loss and the injury of their estates. We are going to assist the small holders with money from the State, and they must expect that some conditions will be attached to their holdings; and for that reason the proposal of the Government, especially if amended as suggested, ought to commend itself to the Committee.

(10.39.) MR. CHAPLIN: I do not think my hon. Friend behind me has been in the House during the whole of the evening, or he would know that the course he recommends would be absolutely inconsistent with the very argument which we have been using in the course of the debate. We have been contending that when the money has all been paid for the holdings the land ought to be held on terms not different from those on which other freehold land is held, and ought to be free. It is quite true, as the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. J. Collings) stated, that a great many arguments have been addressed to the Committee in reference to this: but the Committee has already discussed whether or not a certain portion of the money should always remain unpaid, and the question has been disposed of. I regard the conditions as desirable so long as any of the money is unpaid, but the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) must have misunderstood me if he gathered from what I said that I thought the conditions desirable after the money had all been paid. I want to call the attention of the Committee for one moment to some words in the Bill which I think they have overlooked. The Bill provides that the small holdings shall, for a term of ten years, at all events, be held "subject to the following conditions." Now, one of the reasons why these words were inserted was in order to prevent some speculator who is a better judge of the value of land than the owner, going to the owner and buying the land at a perhaps increased price and then using it for other than agricultural purposes.

I think this term of ten years will prevent any transaction of this kind. But I should not object to extending that term for a certain number of years, if that would meet the objections of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) pointed out that there might be cases where the property of the landlord was acquired under the Bill, and devoted afterwards to the erection of a factory, if the conditions were not permanent. But I would observe that that would be the landlord's own fault, for he is not compelled to sell land under the Bill in its present form. If he thinks it desirable to sell the land he must take the risk of the purpose for which it will be used. It appears to me that the arguments put forward in favour of the Amendment—if they are arguments at all—are arguments which tell rather against the Bill altogether; and one of the main objections in my eyes to adopting the Amendment is that it would remove another of the great inducements to people to take advantage of the Bill, and become owners of small holdings. I contend that, as the holdings are held for a number of years under economic conditions, if they become more valuable after that term than at first, the holder, and nobody else, is fairly entitled to the increased value. If we imposed all the conditions we are asked to impose on the small holders, I am afraid we should find the Bill in such a shape that all inducement to become owners would be taken away. For these reasons I hope the Committee will not accept the Amendment.

(10.44.) SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I agree with the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House. The Amendment appears to create an entirely new tenure of land. The object of all land reform in recent years has been to free land from fetters and restrictions of any kind. I understand the Amendment imposes on land sold by the County Councils under the Bill the restriction that it should only be used for one particular purpose. That is contrary to what land reformers have been struggling for ever since I have had the honour of taking part in the question of land reform; their object has been to free land from every fetter and restriction imposed on it. The Copyhold Acts were based on the policy of freeing land from every restriction on its cultivation, the timber on it, and the uses to which it could be put. If the Amendment is accepted you will create a tenure unknown to the law. The law does not allow perpetual restrictions to be imposed on land by contracts between parties; but the effect of the Amendment will be that land dealt with under the Act will be for all time subject to the restrictions in the sub-sections of Sub-section 1. I look forward to that with great apprehension. I join with hon. Members in desiring to see land held in smaller parcels than at present; but I do not think it consonant with sound policy that the land so held should be subject to restrictions which will prevent the owner making the most beneficial use of it. For these reasons, I think the Bill is right as it stands, and that ten years is a reasonable term. To make the restrictions perpetual would be an entire mistake, and contrary to the principles which land reformers have always held.

(10.47.) MR. HALDANE: For, I believe, the first time in my life, I find myself not quite in agreement with my hon. and learned Friend who has just sat down. We are proposing to create a new form of ownership through the medium of public money; to advance public funds to help individuals to become owners of land. Why should we assist them? Not merely for their own sake, but because we believe it is in the public interest; and, that being so, it is within our moral as well as our legal compass to put certain restrictions on the land we help them to obtain. We were anxious to put leasing powers in the hands of the County Council, because we thought that then the County Council would have a more complete grip on the land than by the creation of freeholds. The Government have refused to give those leasing powers; and that, surely, makes our case stronger when we come forward and say, If you do create a freehold tenure it ought not to be the old unrestricted freehold tenure, but one which will subserve the only purpose by which this Bill is justified. I agree that the restrictions of the Amendment are unknown to the law as it is at present; there is a sub-section against sub-letting which would be treated by law as void without this clause. It would also not be competent for the County Council to impose these restrictions by contract with the holders, and if you do not take advantage of the fact that Parliament can mould the law as it pleases, you are put in a difficulty. Landlords are not compelled to part with land for the purposes of the Bill. Now, I am bound to say if I were a landlord I should hesitate very much before I parted with my land under this Bill; and I will tell the Committee why. For ten years, it is quite true, the landlord has certainly parted with his land for the purpose of creating small occupying owners; but at the end of ten years what may happen? When the landlord has parted with perhaps a good part of his estate, some nuisance may be put up, or some factory. A number of the small holdings may be got together under one owner, who may do what he pleases with the property and make himself obnoxious to the persons living in the neighbourhood. It seems to me, therefore, if you pass this clause in the form in which the Government have proposed it, you will put strong deterrents in the way of landlords calculated to prevent them from taking the course which we all desire them to take. That being so, it seems to me that we have to choose between two evils—we have to face the evil of unrestricted ownership of land, or the possibility of altering the old tenure and creating a new form of tenure. To my mind it would be much better to take the latter course. I do not think I am travelling beyond the views of my hon. Friends here when I say that we should not be satisfied with what the right hon. Gentleman has suggested. What we want done here, and what we are aiming at, is a new form of tenure which will carry out the purposes of the Bill. We are not interested in the matter at all if you are going to create a new ownership which will be unrestricted. If you do so, you may bear the responsibility; but if we are to be consulted, we want something different. It is not a matter of detail; it is a matter of principle. Upon that footing, while recognising the desire of the right hon. Gentleman to meet us where he can—and I think he has shown particularly to-night a desire to facilitate the passage of this Bill—I am bound to say, speaking for myself, that I cannot regard the offer which he makes as one which I feel called upon to accept.

(10.52.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Perhaps I may be permitted to express the hope that the Committee may come to a conclusion on this point without very much further delay. The Government are under a pledge that at as early an hour as possible, they should commence the discussion of the next subject which stands on the Paper to-day—namely, the Motion of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the financial relations between England, Scotland, and Ireland, and that they should not delay the hour of Adjournment for that purpose; and it would be very convenient if the Committee would settle this question before that subject is proceeded with.

*(10.53.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I think it would be in the interests of the labourers that this Amendment should be adopted. A County Council might go to a landowner, whose land lay in the neighbourhood of a village or a town, and say to him, "We want 50 acres of this land for small holdings." He might say, "If you want 50 acres of land you must go half a mile or a mile off and take it there, because you see after ten years are passed I have no guarantee that this land will not get into the hands of a speculator or a gombeen man; and they may have a lot of speculative cottages put there. If this land is to be used as building land, I, as the landlord, claim a right to reap the benefit of it; and you have no right to take it from me for the purpose of agricultural holdings, with the risk of the land being taken and covered with buildings after ten years are passed." In result, the County Council would probably be offered other land a mile distant from the village or the town instead of the particular land which would be of real benefit to the labourers or smallholders, because of its situation close to the population.

*(10.54.) SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Haddington in his regret that the principle of feuing or leasing has not been recognised in this Bill. But I cannot support the proposal to introduce an entirely new form of tenure by imposing these restrictions upon the land for all time; for that is really what is proposed by the Amendment. It would be contrary to the principles advocated for years by every reformer of the land laws. And it would bring about a most inconvenient state of affairs by creating a number of holdings with which it would be impossible to deal when public improvements were necessary. In the county in which I live it is impossible to foresee how soon such land may not be needed for cottages or a factory for a growing town. The impossibility of dealing with these holdings for all time owing to the imposition of these conditions would be a very great public inconvenience, and I must utter my protest against imposing such permanent conditions, although it is quite necessary to impose them for a short time.

(10.55.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I wish the right hon. Gentleman had given us some reason why he would not accept this Amendment. I cannot see why we should impose these restrictions for ten years more than for any other time. As we have heard, almost the chief argument on the part of those who oppose this Bill altogether is that it deals unfairly with other classes. Why, they ask, not give the same advantages to the miner and the tradesman, as well as to the cultivator? The answer is, because we want the land cultivated. It is for the public good to have a number of cultivators, to make the land produce more than it does, and articles of a different kind from those it does; and in that respect the trade of the cultivator is different from any other trade. But the right hon. Gentleman seems himself to take away that argument, for he is really allowing and encouraging land speculation at the expense of a public fund. I maintain we have no right to do that. As to the argument that this is a new tenure, of course it is a new case—the acquisition of land for one purpose, and one purpose only; that is, cultivation. That being so, we have a right to have such conditions imposed, even if the old tenure were satisfactory. If this land speculation is beneficial, why put in the ten years at all? Why not say to a man, “It is quite true we have advanced you money at wonderful terms which you could not have got from any private source; it is quite true we intended it for the public good, but you are at liberty at the earliest moment possible to put it to any other purpose you choose for your own particular benefit, and not for the benefit of the community”? Why not say that? If the object in putting in ten years is to secure that the land should be cultivated, then the argument holds good at the end of ten years. I am really at a loss to conceive why the right hon. Gentleman, after having brought in a Bill to create a peasant proprietary, a yeoman proprietorship, for the cultivation of the land, and for all those purposes connected with cultivation which we have heard so much about, will positively invite a class of people—for they will spring up under his invitation—who will acquire land at the public expense, and then use it for their own private speculation. Really, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give us some better reason why he cannot accept this Amendment. (“Divide, divide!”)

(11.1.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to move that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MOTIONS.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS (ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND).

SELECT COMMITTEE.

(11.5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the financial relations between England, Scotland, and Ireland, and to report—

(1.) The amount and proportion of Revenue contributed to the Exchequer by the people of England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively;

(2.) The amount and proportion of Revenue which under recent legislation is paid to Local Authorities in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively;

(3.) The amount and proportion of moneys expended out of the Exchequer (a) upon civil and local government services for the special use of; and (b) upon collection of revenue in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively;

(4.) The amount and proportion of State Loans outstanding, and of State Liabilities incurred for local purposes in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively;

(5.) How far the financial relations established by the sums so contributed, paid, advanced, or promised, or by any other existing conditions, are equitable, having regard to the resources and population of England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively."—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

(11.7.) MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer comes on at such a late period of the evening, and I am afraid I shall have to trespass on the time and attention of the House, some little time at any rate, in order to lay before the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the House the reasons why we say he ought to adopt the Amendment which is down in my name. The appointment of this Committee has been delayed now for a considerable time, I think for two years. The reason for that is that Amendments have been placed down by us; and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that we put these Amendments down not in order to delay the Committee and prevent an inquiry being extended to Scotland, Ireland, and England, but because we had a very deep interest in the extension of the inquiry to that other portion of the United Kingdom which up to now has been left outside the purview of the Committee. I should have preferred that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have given some reasons why the Committee should not inquire into the case of Wales as it is inquiring into the case of the other portions of the United Kingdom, because we take our stand first of all upon this—that the onus of proving the propriety of exclusion of that part of the United Kingdom, generally called the Principality of Wales, lies upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, rather than that the onus of proving the right of the inclusion of Wales should lie upon us. I suppose the answer of the

Chancellor of the Exchequer—if I may anticipate for a moment—is that up to the present Wales has not been treated as a separate financial entity of the United Kingdom. We do not say that it should be, nor is it necessary to go to that extent in our deliberations on the operations of this Committee. What we ask is that, inasmuch as the Government have thought fit, at the request of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), to appoint a Committee to consider the financial relations of the various parts of the United Kingdom, we should not be excluded, but that inquiry should be made into the facts as they concern us, as the inquiry will be made into the facts affecting the other portions. But inasmuch as I am driven, by the course which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has thought fit to pursue, to prove to the House that Wales should be included, I shall submit to the House two reasons why we are entitled to be considered upon this Committee. In the first place I shall endeavour to prove that the inclusion of Wales as a separate portion of the United Kingdom is a feasible matter, that there are no insuperable practical difficulties in the way, and that there will not be a very great increase in cost or expense by the inclusion of the Principality. And if I go further and show, as I think I shall be able to show, that Wales is not treated fairly or equitably in the matter of these financial relations with England, I think we shall have made out a case—and a very strong case—in favour of this inquiry being extended. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may be able to dispute the figures which we produce here to-day, and if I may make one answer to any argument which he may use upon that point, it is this: that I do not think, in order to establish our case for the inquiry, it is necessary for us at all to prove that we are unfairly or inequitably treated at the present time. It is one of the objects of this Committee to inquire into the question whether Scotland or Ireland or England is equitably or inequitably treated in the matter of finance. But I think I shall be able to produce such figures as we are able to collect from the Returns which are separately made now, to show that in various matters

we are unfairly and inequitably treated. Upon the first point I will endeavour to show that there is no very great difficulty in the way of getting the necessary particulars to inquire into the financial position of Wales any more than there is in ascertaining the financial relations of Scotland or Ireland. For the convenience of the House, I shall take the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer head by head. The first head is this—the Committee are to inquire and to report as to the amount and proportion of Revenue contributed to the Exchequer by the people of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Now, the Revenue of this country is derived from several sources, the principal of which are Customs, Excise, Stamps, Land Tax, House Duty, and Income Tax. I will go shortly through some of these the most important heads of Revenue, in order to show that particulars can be easily and without cost obtained with reference to Wales as well as to other portions of the United Kingdom. Take the head of Customs. The chief sources of revenue under this head are derivable from cocoa, chicory and coffee, dried fruits, foreign spirits, tea, tobacco, and wine. Referring, as I shall have to do a good many times, to a Return which was presented to this House on the 10th July, 1891—a very valuable Treasury Minute, No. 329 of the Returns of 1891—I find various particulars with regard to this matter. For instance, I find that although it is impossible now to say exactly what the proportion of revenue derivable in respect of cocoa, chicory and coffee, and dried fruits is from Scotland, Ireland, and from England, the Treasury say that for Treasury purposes it will be sufficiently accurate to take the receipts of revenue in respect of those matters and apportion them according to population. If that is so, of course it is merely an arithmetical problem, which can be worked out in two or three minutes, to ascertain how much revenue is derivable from Wales in respect of those articles which I have named. The next important item of Customs is foreign spirits. Now, with reference to that the Treasury say that since July last permits are necessary for conveying spirits from one place to another in the country. Therefore, they say, that for six months they are able to tell the proportion of foreign spirits consumed in various parts of the United Kingdom, and they say it is sufficient for the purposes of accuracy to base the revenue from foreign spirits as calculated by the Treasury officials for that six months. Therefore, upon the head of foreign spirits, the Treasury have, through the Inland Revenue officers, sufficient information to tell us what proportion of foreign spirits are consumed—they have that information by means of these permits—in Wales. Therefore, upon that head, as well as upon the other sub-heads which I have mentioned, they can give the necessary particulars. The other is the very large item of tea. It appears it is impossible to find out what is the exact proportion, as between England, Scotland, and Ireland, of revenue derivable from tea. The authorities say that the average consumption of tea is very much the same over all portions of the United Kingdom, and that it may be taken according to population. They say that 4·91 pounds of tea per head was consumed all over the United Kingdom in 1889. Therefore, from that source you can say, by means of an arithmetical problem, what portion of the Customs Revenue derivable from tea is derivable from Wales. With reference to tobacco, they say there is some difficulty on account of the raw leaf being sent to Ireland to be manufactured there. But they come to the same conclusion with reference to the consumption of tobacco as with reference to tea. They say that for all practical purposes the consumption is the same all over the United Kingdom—about 4s. 8d. per head per annum. With regard to wine, which is the last item of Customs with which I shall deal, that raises some difficulty. They say that arises from the fact that the duty is collected on the alcoholic strength of wine, and that it is very difficult to say for any part of the United Kingdom how much that duty may be. But they have a very rough and ready method. They average the rates of duty, and they apply the average rates to the quantities conveyed from one part of the country to the other. Therefore, for practical purposes, you can ascertain the necessary particulars with regard to wines. I shall not go into other sources of revenue, but I think I have shown that on all sub-heads of Customs you can ascertain sufficiently accurately for all practical purposes the amount of revenue derivable from Wales just as you can from Scotland and from Ireland. The next head of revenue is Excise. The sub-heads in this are four: British spirits, Beer, Licences, and Railway Passenger Duty. With reference to British spirits, I think you can have the same information as with reference to foreign spirits from the permits which the Excise authorities require. And I believe you can have accurate information with regard to the consumption of beer from your collectors of Inland Revenue all over the country. The revenue derivable from licences is divisible into two parts. The first is a small portion of this revenue which goes for Imperial purposes. With that I need not deal because the same considerations apply to England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales. It is not necessary with reference to the Imperial portion of the revenue derivable from licences to have any inquiry into the relations of the different parts of the Kingdom. The second part has reference to local taxation. I wish to inform the House on this head that there are already sufficient particulars in the various Returns to be found in the Library of this House. The amounts of revenue derivable from licences, are entered according to Counties, and therefore we can see what is the amount which goes to the relief of local taxation. I take it that there would be no difficulty in getting the Railway Companies to show how much of the Passenger Duty is payable in Wales and how much in England. With regard to Excise, the record made of domicile on the payment of Death Duties will render it possible to state the proportion paid by the Principality; whilst as to general stamps, the Treasury has struck a percentage which is sufficient to indicate the amount paid within the metropolitan area in respect of the expenditure of persons who reside in other parts of the country. Of Land Tax and House Tax, every penny paid by Wales can be traced. Different considerations apply to different schedules of the Income Tax and some present difficulties, but they are not insurmountable. As to income derived from national and municipal securities, the Treasury has some data upon which to distinguish incomes derivable within the metropolitan area; and for trades and professions the Returns are made by counties. Of non-tax revenue from the Post Office, the Telegraph Service, and Crown Lands, the amount derived from Wales can be easily distinguished. The same is true of the miscellaneous items. The Returns of Imperial Revenue paid to Local Authorities are already made in counties. As to the amount of money expended upon Civil and Local Government Services, the sub-head does not in my opinion deal with those items of expenditure which are Imperial, but merely has reference to the expenditure in localities, and so inquiry as to how much is incurred in reference to Wales will be very much simplified. As the expenditure on the collection of Revenue is a certain percentage, the amount of money expended upon the collection of Revenue in Wales can also be ascertained. With regard to the amount and proportion of State loans outstanding, and of State liabilities incurred for local purposes, these have been incurred chiefly in reference to Ireland. Wales has not been able to extract any money for this purpose, and therefore the inquiry as to Wales will take no time. From the information which we have been able to extract with difficulty, it appears that Wales is very badly treated in respect to taxation, contribution and expenditure of Revenue, having regard to the population of the country. No doubt there is a difference in the principles various Members would like to apply to the question of the resources of the people; but some little idea is given by the Treasury on page 26 of the Minute which they say may be a guide to the Committee in its deliberations. Having regard to the resources of the people, the Committee might inquire into, first, the Probate Duty payable in the Principality, and as I have dwelt on that I need now say no more upon it. Then the Committee should have regard to the Income Tax payable; and I hope the House will allow me to show, by a few figures, that the resources of the people of Wales are not so great as are the resources of England, and that the wealth of Wales is small in comparison with the larger country. Of course this cuts two ways. The Chancellor of the Exchequer I know will say that if the contribution of Wales to the Exchequer under the head of Income Tax is small, then, of course, Wales ought to expect less in something like the same proportion in the way of subventions. This is not the time to go fully into that matter, but I do not think—and I am prepared to combat the principle on the proper occasion—I do not think it is right to say that a country is only to cost the Imperial Exchequer in proportion to the poverty of that country. I am afraid I do not make myself understood on this point. If a country is poor you have no right to say you will give it less on that account in aid of local taxation, for the need must be greater. Now, on the question, Is Wales poor? let us take a year's Return of the Income Tax. I take figures from Returns which will be found in the Library, and I give the results shortly under the various Schedules. Taking the year 1883 and last year, I find that, under Schedule A of the Income Tax, England, without Monmouth, contributed in 1883 per head £6 4s. 2d. per annum, while Wales, including Monmouth, contributed £4 8s. 1d., a difference of £1 16s. per head. Strange to say, under Schedule B, Income Tax on the rental of agricultural lands, the contribution of Wales is very much more per head of population than the contribution from England; and here, digressing for a moment, let me say the figures establish very clearly the correctness of the contention of my hon. Friend in proposing the Second Reading of the Land Bill for Wales a few days ago that rents are very much higher in Wales than in other portions of the United Kingdom. Under Schedule B, on rentals and agricultural lands, Wales contributed very much more per head than England did, for England contributed £1 16s. 7d., Wales £2 5s. 6d. These, I venture to submit, are very startling figures, and require the careful attention of a deliberative assembly. I need not trouble the House with the figures under Schedule C and I come to Schedule D, Income Tax derived from trades and professions, and held by us to fairly gauge the comparative wealth of a country. Here the result is remarkable. Under Schedule D England contributes the sum of £9 11s. per head, but Wales only £4 7s. 8d., less than one-half what England contributes.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Will the hon. Gentleman say where he derives these figures from?

MR. S. EVANS: From Return 25 of the year 1884-85, from Volume 45, No. 269, of that year. I see that these figures have startled even the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. GOSCHEN: Pardon me; I am not startled at all. I only wished to know how the hon. Member arrives at his proportion per head.

MR. S. EVANS: It is a simple question of arithmetic. I have gone carefully into the figures, and have no hesitation in saying my results are correct. The proportion per head is, as I have said, England, £9 11s.; Wales, £4 7s. 8d., or, in other words, to put it plainly in respect of Income Tax, under Schedules A, B, and D, taken together, England contributed 8s. 1d., at the rate of 6½d. in the £1, and Wales paid 4s. 2d., or about one-half of England's contribution, in the year I refer to. Then I will give very shortly the last figures I have from Return 39 of the year 1892. The result is practically the same. This Return, dealing with the financial year 1889-90, shows per head of population—Schedule A, England, £5 14s. 10¾d.; Wales, £4 6s. 9¾d. Schedule B, England, £1 8s. 3¾d., for incomes from agricultural lands; Wales, £2 1s. 2d. Schedule D, England, £10 1s. 3½d.; Wales, £4 18s. 1d. Given shortly, the result is that, in respect of Income Tax, England contributed at the rate of 6d. in the £1 in the year 1889-90, 7s. 5d. per head, and Wales 3s. 11¾d. per head. These figures have an important bearing on the consideration of the question of the comparative resources and contributions to revenue in the two countries. Then we can ascertain from another source the comparative resources of the two countries. The gross rental of England, including the Metropolis, is £6·31 per head of the population, and the rateable value £5·27 per head; whereas the gross rental of Wales is only £5·13 per head, and the rateable value £4·43. Here exactly the same contrast is shown as in the Income Tax Returns. That is as far as I have gone in the estimate of the resources of the two countries, and now let me say a word on the amounts of Treasury subventions paid from the Exchequer in aid of the poor rates. The amount per head of the poor rate paid in Wales is higher than in England. In the Principality the proportion is 10s. 11½d. per head, in England it is 10s. 3½d. per head. The Treasury subventions in aid in the year 1888-89 were to England, total £803,668, to Wales £36,624. Now these figures are very difficult to follow, but the House may be interested to know how they work out per head of population. You have in England assistance from the Treasury at the rate of 7½d. per head, and in Wales 5½d. per head, a difference of twopence on every head of population. I have the figures in reference to the licence duties collected, but I will not go into these, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer may say the amount goes back in aid of local taxation, and the figures should be discarded as having no reference to this present matter; but I will give the figures in respect to the share of Probate Duty under the Act of 1888. I take the financial year ending 31st March, 1890. The total amount of England's share of the Probate Duty was £1,742,226, that of Wales £69,295. This share of the Probate Duty was given back in aid of local taxation notwithstanding certain arguments of ours to the contrary based upon the proportion of grants made in times gone by. But, without going into that matter, let me give the figures per head. England gets as her share of the Probate Duty 1s. 3½d., Wales 9½d. I have not been able to verify my surmise in reference to this matter; but I think I am right in saying that Wales generally contributes almost as largely in respect to Probate Duty as England does, and, if so, is it not monstrously unfair that we should have only 9½d. per head as our share, and that England should get 6d.

per head more? In the following year, 1891, England had for her share of the Probate Duty £1,857,071, and Wales £73,863; in other words, England received 1s. 4½d. per head, Wales 11½d. The difference is not so great as in the year before, but is still considerable. In other words, if we were entitled to this Probate Duty according to population, which I think is the right principle, we should receive exactly 1s. 4d. per head, and should have been in receipt last year of £101,260, while we actually received £73,863. If we are right in our claim as to what we ought to have had as our share of the Probate Duty, there was a deficit last year of £27,397. We should have this amount annually to meet our wants for intermediate education and our Universities if the Probate Duty were more justly distributed. And now I apply the test of the Beer Duty, the additional duty laid on the country in 1890, 91, and I take the figures from Return 373 of 1891. The share England had of the new tax was £712,054, and Wales had £28,321. England received per head 6½d. and Wales a fraction over 4½d.—that is to say, 33 per cent. more went to England than to Wales in proportion to population. One observation I may make on this point. We must admit, and we do so with a blush, that the contribution of Wales in respect to the Beer Duty and Spirit Duty has in late years been quite equal in proportion to population to the contribution from England. If that is so, then it is wrong that we should have only 4½d. per head of this, while England receives 6½d. On a fair distribution we should be entitled to 6½d. per head, amounting to £38,760 for last year, while we actually received £28,321 under the head of Beer and Spirit Duties, having lost £10,440. Having gone through these figures, let me in a few words give a résumé of the result. In the first place, if a Committee were appointed to inquire into the financial relations of the different parts of the Kingdom, Wales should not be excluded. I have shown that the facts as regards Wales can be ascertained without much difficulty and at very little extra expense. If it had been—which it was not, for the object of the Committee is inquiry—necessary for me to show that Wales has been inequitably treated in past financial arrangements, I think, having regard to the resources of the two countries, that that could be established. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has up to now been adamant in excluding Wales from this inquiry. I am told that the Committee can do little in the short time remaining for the present Parliament; but I do ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that in this first appointment of the Committee Wales shall be included. The onus of proving the exclusion of Wales lies with him.

Amendment proposed, in line 2, after the word "England," to insert the word "Wales."

Question proposed, "That the word 'Wales' be there inserted."

*(11.51.) MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member has left me about as much time for my reply to him as he has occupied with his preliminaries and the résumé at the end of his speech. I am sure he will not think me wanting in courtesy to him if I condense my remarks into the briefest possible space. Pleasantly and plausibly the hon. Member has spoken, and he has made out the best case his materials would admit of; but in the same pleasant and plausible way he has slurred over all difficulties and made light of most serious objections to his proposal. The hon. Member says—and I might rest my case on that—that the onus of proof with regard to the exclusion of Wales lies with the Government, and those who oppose his Amendment. Now, I say distinctly the onus of showing why Wales should be separately treated lies with the hon. Gentleman. He did not offer in his long and interesting statement one single argument why Wales should be treated differently from any other part of the country. Wales is excluded from the inquiry, says the hon. Gentleman; but Wales is not excluded. Wales stands in the inquiry side by side with England, as she has stood by the side of England throughout the whole of her fiscal history, in all her fiscal arrangements. I cannot understand why the hon. Gentleman can think there is greater cause for treating Wales separately than there is for treating Lancashire separately or Yorkshire separately, or, as an hon. Member opposite suggests, for treating Ulster separately from the rest of Ireland. (An hon. MEMBER: Or London.) Yes; it would be quite as reasonable a proposal to treat the Metropolis separately, and when treating London separately there would be an equal claim for treating Glasgow separately from Scotland and Belfast from Ireland. Then we might have an inquiry, which should range over all counties, to determine which are the richer counties and which the poorer, and which contributes more and which less to the Imperial Revenue; and when we have done that, when we have arrived at the result, when we have the information if we could get it, what then is to be done? Are we to have a separate fiscal system for each county? How would it be possible to raise our taxation or analyse our expenditure if every comparatively small division should have a right to claim to be separately treated? If Wales has a grievance, is it more severe than that of any of the poorer counties in England, Scotland, or Ireland? Is it possible to adjust taxation and expenditure throughout the United Kingdom in such a manner that each county or group of counties shall contribute equally to and receive equally from the Imperial Exchequer? You cannot do this; you would destroy the whole unity of our fiscal system. I will not follow the hon. Member through his discussion of the means of meeting the difficulties of collecting the information which he desires. I do not deny that it might be possible to procure much interesting information on a good many of the points suggested by the hon. Gentleman. I do not deny that as regards some articles of consumption—I make full admission, and say as regards the main articles of consumption taxed—it would be possible to arrive at some result; but when we come to the Income Tax, the difficulties will be much greater. The hon. Member has tried to minimise these difficulties to a scarcely justifiable extent. I do not see how the hon. Member knows how much per head is paid for Income Tax in Wales, for the way in which Schedule D is assessed makes it difficult to localise it so distinctly as to say precisely how much is paid in each part of the country.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS: The Returns are given county by county.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, I am aware that the counties are given in which Income Tax is paid, but that does not represent the amount arising in each county. For instance, a wealthy man dies at Bristol, but he has property scattered all over the Kingdom. I do not see how the tax can be localised. From want of time I cannot follow the hon. Member through his speech. (An hon. MEMBER! Adjourn.) No, if we adjourn I do not know when we can resume. We cannot agree to accept Wales in this inquiry as a separate financial entity in our fiscal system. On this broad ground I must resist the Amendment, and I hope, now that the hon. Member has had the opportunity of making his excellent speech, he will not further stand in the way of the appointment of this Committee, whose labours may result, I hope, in the collection of much interesting information and furnish valuable materials for the study of future Chancellors of the Exchequer.

*(12.0.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I think no case was ever made out more clearly and irresistibly than that made by my hon. Friend to-night, and I will venture to say no Minister ever made so poor a reply as the right hon. Gentleman has just made. At every turn my hon. Friend supported his case with figures.

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

DUBLIN BARRACKS IMPROVEMENT (re-committed) BILL.—(No. 218.) COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Instruction of which the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has given notice is not in order, inasmuch as it involves a public charge.

Mr. Goschen

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): With all submission, Sir, permit to say that I distinctly, in the terms of my notice, guarded myself from anything involving a public charge, and on a true construction I think the Motion will be found not to do so. My Motion runs in this form—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert provisions to enable the Dublin Corporation to establish the amount expended by them on the Wellington Barracks, and also enabling the Secretary of State to recoup the same to the ratepayers of Dublin.”

It will be observed that this does not involve a charge—it simply enables the Corporation to establish the amount expended, and enables the Secretary of State to make proposals to recoup the same. It does not say that he shall do so.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. and learned Member's explanation does not make the Instruction the more in order. The Secretary of State can only recoup the ratepayers of Dublin from the public funds.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: May I ask you, Sir, if I would be in order in moving the Instruction down as far as the word “barracks,” leaving out the last line and a half so that the Corporation may establish the amount they have expended? We have a fair claim in the Main Drainage Scheme as a kind of set off for this amount.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member may proceed so far.

(12.5.) MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I do not object to the Bill, and do not raise any objection to the Government acquiring the building for barracks; but my objection is to the Government appropriating the building, built and intended for a prison, to military purposes, without giving any compensation to the ratepayers of Dublin. I will make a suggestion. I do not want to violently press this Amendment. I move it to raise this point. Why are the barrack extensions necessary now? Because typhoid fever prevails in the city in the neighbourhood of the Liffey. You have in the case of the Royal Barracks, expended hundreds, probably thousands, of pounds, and why? Because of the unsanitary state of the barracks due to the pestilential condition of the Liffey. Very good. Now you have got a barracks free of all charge to the State, without the cost of a shilling to the State. Very good. There is now before the Government a proposition for the main drainage of the City of Dublin, and nobody will benefit more from the carrying out of that scheme than the troops in Dublin. In your Royal Barracks your soldiers die from the position of the building, near what is little better than an open sewer, and the stench of it goes up to the detriment of soldiers and civilians in the city. I do not think that it is an unfair thing that we, through the Corporation, should establish what is the value of these new barracks to Her Majesty's Government, and that the value should be contributed by the Government towards the drainage of the city. Next to the soldiers, who would benefit most from this improvement? Dublin Castle, every man in which must feel the effects of the condition of the Liffey. Who next? The Judges and Law Officers of the Government, for the Four Courts are on the banks of the river. This is in no sense a Party question. I venture to think that we on this occasion will have the support of the Conservative Members in making this reasonable claim. I must say it is not a handsome thing for the Government, simply by discontinuing the place as a prison, saying it is no longer necessary to appropriate it for military purposes, instead of devoting the site to public purposes as is done in England. When you abolished Millbank as a prison what did you do?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. and learned Member is now speaking to the Amendment as a whole. He is arguing in favour of compensation being given from the Imperial Exchequer, and such a proposal, as I have informed the hon. and learned Gentleman, would not be in order.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: That very elastic fund, the Church Surplus, might be used, and that would involve no charge on the Exchequer; but so long as the Liffey is improved I do not care from what fund the expense of drainage comes. But I do not intend to go any further into the matter. I put the suggestion before the Government, and I say it is not a reasonable thing that the Government having got hold of this building for the purpose of a prison should divert it to a wholly different purpose, and that it is only reasonable that the Corporation, on behalf of the ratepayers, should have the opportunity of establishing the amount expended. I move the Instruction down to the word "barracks."

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert provisions to enable the Dublin Corporation to establish the amount expended by them on the Wellington Barracks."—(Mr. Timothy Healy.)

*(12.10.) THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The hon. and learned Member, in his desire to do justice to the Corporation of Dublin, has not considered the circumstances under which the prison was originally handed over.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: It was not handed over—it was seized.

*MR. BRODRICK: The hon. and learned Gentleman was not, I think, in Parliament at the time, in 1877, when the Act was passed, I think I may truly say, with the object of relieving to a large extent Corporations and Grand Juries of a heavy charge for the maintenance of prisons, and the Richmond Prison came under the category. That relief was accepted at the time and the transfer to the Prisons Board was felt to be a great advantage to the ratepayers. For ten years the building was used as a local prison and administered by the Prisons Board. Under Section 31 the Prisons Board had power to abolish the Prison if they found it unnecessary to continue it, and to apply it to certain other purposes under which section the building was used as a barrack. As the hon. and learned Member knows, great difficulty was found in securing barrack accommodation in Dublin. The Royal Barracks, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has rightly observed, were in a bad, insanitary state, and it has been found necessary to reduce the accommodation there by one-third, and accommodation had to be immediately found for the soldiers removed. As the hon. and learned Gentleman knows, a very large sum has been spent, and is being spent, in building new barracks in Dublin; and we propose by this Bill to adapt Richmond Prison for further accommodation. I do not think that any purpose will be served by calculating the sum expended by the Corporation for wholly different purposes, and under circumstances provided for in the Act. I do not see how we can go behind the Act which provided for the transfer; the interest of the Corporation terminated with the transfer. I hope the hon. and learned Gentleman will not think it necessary to press this Instruction. Questions in relation to the Bill have been fairly considered by the Committee upstairs, from whose deliberations the hon. and learned Gentleman was absent. No petitions were presented against the Bill, and it is absolutely necessary that new buildings should be erected. It is not possible for the hon. and learned Gentleman to move the latter part of his Instruction, and I cannot see how it is possible to introduce the Instruction he has now proposed into the Bill nor what purpose it will serve.

(12.15.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I do not find that the hon. Gentleman has made out any case against the Instruction in its limited terms, though undoubtedly in its original form it would propose a public charge. But as submitted in its amended form it is simply that the amount expended by the Corporation in the erection of the building now known as Wellington Barracks should be ascertained. The convenience of this course will be apparent, if at any future time the claim of the Corporation to be recouped for this expenditure should be recognised. The Act of 1877 is no bar to any such Instruction. No doubt by that Act Local Bodies were relieved of the burden of maintaining the prison as part of the general arrangement of items as between local rates and the Exchequer. The local rates were relieved, but the cost of maintenance was thrown upon the Imperial taxpayers, the persons who contributed to the local rates contributed to the Imperial taxation, the burden was renewed in another form. This question of the amount expended by the Government on the barrack is different from the amount expended as upon a prison. I can assure the hon. Gentleman, as a member of the Corporation, that the Corporation never assented to the idea that the passing of the Act of 1877 disposed of their equitable and undeniable claim to be recouped the amount expended on the prison. I am sorry the Government refuse to allow this opportunity to be availed of to ascertain the amount expended, for undoubtedly it will be the duty of those interested to press this question from time to time, and endeavour to secure an equitable settlement. If my hon. Friend presses his Motion now, I am sure every Irishman will support him.

(12.17.) MR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): I think a little further debate will show that the Dublin Corporation have a good claim. As bearing upon the question, I may mention the transfer of Kirkdale Prison near Liverpool. In the same way this prison was taken over from the Justices as Richmond Prison was taken from the Corporation of Dublin; but then the Treasury gave the Grand Jury of Lancashire £14,000 for Kirkdale Prison. This illustrates the question whether the Treasury ought to pay the Corporation of Dublin. I think the Local Authority in Lancashire had no better claim. In any case I do not see why there should be an objection to ascertain the amount expended on the building.

*MR. SPEAKER: I have allowed the discussion to proceed, seeing that the Instruction in terms indicated the object as being to provide that the Dublin Corporation should show the amount expended upon the building. The last section of the Instruction given notice of I have ruled out of order, as involving a charge upon the Exchequer; but I now see, and it is evident from the speeches that have been delivered, that the same objection applies to the earlier part of the Instruction. With the interpretation put upon it, I am bound to say that the Instruction is not in order.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(12.20.) MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I beg to move that Progress be reported.

I can assure the Government that so far as I am concerned they will have no chance of getting the Bill through as an unopposed measure unless we get some satisfaction for the citizens of Dublin for the robbery, for that is what it amounts to, of this building. I was anxious that the Bill should go through. I think it is reasonable that the troops in Dublin should have a better chance of life than they have in the Royal Barracks; but as my hon. Friend has reminded us, in other instances when a building has been taken by the State compensation has been given to the Local Authority. Why should we in Dublin be robbed more than the people in Lancashire?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."
—(Mr. Timothy Healy.)

(12.21.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I may say that what has been done has been strictly in accordance with the Act. I do not think the hon. and learned Gentleman will deny that. I understand his desire is to obtain information as to the cost which has been incurred by the Corporation on the building as a prison. If the hon. and learned Gentleman will move for a Return giving the information, I am sure my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the War Office will carefully consider the Motion with a view to giving the information if it is possible to do so.

(12.21.) MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I do not like to oppose a Bill which is recognised as necessary for the health of the troops, but I should like to have something more definite than a mere suggestion. The right hon. Gentleman has thrown out the hope of a Return, but that is a small matter. Will the right hon. Gentleman go a step further and say that if he finds that Kirkdale is a precedent for giving compensation to a Local Authority, and this is a similar case, then the precedent shall be followed? The building might be used as a museum, it might be turned into a play-house, it might be used in many ways if not converted into barracks. I think we are quite entitled to ask that if precedent justifies it we should have the benefit in Dublin.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If any precedent can be shown under the Act referred to I shall be very glad to examine it.

(12.22.) MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman said that if a Return is moved for he will consider it, but I think we are entitled to hear in unmistakable terms that the Return will be granted. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that there will be no trouble about getting the information, for the City and County of Dublin have unquestionable records of the amount expended by the Corporation in the erection of the prison. This will enable him to say that the Return will be granted.

(12.22.) MR. BRODRICK: I have not the least objection to granting the Return. The difficulty is that what the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes to get at is what has been the amount expended by the Dublin Corporation upon the prison, and it is not in our power to say if the Corporation can and will furnish that. We will endeavour to supply the Return.

(12.23.) MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: There is an alternative in case of any failure in obtaining the information from one source, and that is that the Government should say what has been the gain to the Department—what is the value of the building for military purposes. On the undertaking that the Government will endeavour to supply the information, I have no objection to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

MR. BRODRICK: There seems to be no objection to the Bill, perhaps the House will now allow the third reading to be taken?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a third time."

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: As the Irish Members allow the Bill to go through, I hope that we shall be treated in the same spirit when next we raise the question.

Motion agreed to.

SUNDERLAND'S CHARITY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD SANDFORD: My Lords, the object of this Bill is to confirm the provisions of a scheme framed by the Charity Commissioners for the better appropriation of the funds of a Charity for the poor in the parish of Bingley in the County of York. Parliamentary confirmation is necessary, because the present administration and distribution of the funds of the Charity are limited by an Act passed in 1853, whereby they are taken out of the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners and even of the Court of Chancery, and no diversion of this Charity can be carried out without the Bill which I ask your Lordships to read a second time. The last Report of the Charity Commissioners, to which reference is made in the Preamble of this Bill, contains a short paragraph relating to the subject, and, as it states very concisely and clearly the object of the Bill, your Lordships will perhaps allow me to read it—

“We have, during the past year, provisionally approved a Scheme, to be laid before Parliament, for The Charity of Samuel Sunderland, in the Parish of Bingley in the West Riding of the County of York. The Scheme is fully set out in Appendix C. to this Report; and we now proceed, as directed by section 60 of the Charitable Trusts Act 1853, to state the grounds of our approval of the Scheme. The Charity of Samuel Sunderland is regulated by an Act of Parliament, ‘The Bingley School and Charity Estate Act 1853’ (16 and 17 Vict. c. xiii), under which the income of the poor’s share of the Charity must be distributed and paid to the poor of Bingley, upon two days named in the Act, in the porch of Bingley Church. The Trustees are desirous of appropriating out of the poor’s share of Sunderland’s Charity a sum of £3,000

New Consols as an endowment of another Charity at Bingley, known as the Cottage Hospital, founded by Indenture dated 15th August 1889. As the end which the Scheme has in view cannot, regard being had to the requirements of this Act, be attained without the authority of Parliament, and as it seems to us that the Scheme is desirable, and that all parties interested are anxious that it shall be established, we have provisionally approved it. No objections have been made to the Scheme.”

Pursuant to the recommendation of that Report, the Bill was introduced in another place under the auspices of the hon. Member for the Division of the county in which Bingley is situated, and endorsed by Sir Stafford Northcote, the Parliamentary Representative of the Commissioners in the House of Commons. I do not think it is necessary to say much in advocacy of the Bill, because those who are locally concerned have shown a great interest in the diversion of these dole funds to the institution and maintenance on a proper footing of a far better charity than that at present established—namely, a cottage hospital. They feel that it will be more for their permanent interest to have such an institution in their midst, than that they should receive half-yearly sums of money which they may spend, or perhaps mis-spend, as soon as they receive them. Your Lordships will appreciate the wise conduct of these canny Yorkshire folk. At the same time, in case of any charge being made that this is spoliation, and that no money assistance from the Charity will be henceforth available for the deserving poor, I may say that some money will still be left; the purchase of £3,000 of Consols will not exhaust the present funds of the Charity, and there will moreover be the annual rental of a farm which, under the scheme, is henceforth to be let out in allotments. As every one concerned in the parish, after full notice of the intention of the Commissioners has cordially acquiesced in the scheme, I need do no more now than ask your Lordships to read the Bill a second time.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.”—(The Lord Sandford.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (PURCHASE) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD BALFOUR: My Lords, this Bill is a very simple one, to which I think your Lordships will have no hesitation in giving a Second Reading. Its object is to enable the county councils of either counties or county boroughs to purchase any existing manorial rights which may be in the possession of the lord or lady of the manor in the matter of weights and measures. The Bill is not compulsory—it creates no new offence of any kind, and imposes no new penalty; it presumes a willing purchaser and a willing seller, and gives the Parliamentary sanction which is required to the bargain which these persons may make between them. The immediate necessity for the Bill arises from the fact that such a bargain has been made between those who own rights in the matter of weights and measures in the Manor of Wakefield and the County Council of the West Riding of York. Under the Acts of 1878 and 1889 referring to weights and measures, with which no doubt your Lordships are acquainted, the County Councils are the Local Authority for weights and measures; but there are some few instances (they are not many, and, with the exception of this one of Wakefield, I think I may say they are not of any real importance) in which these rights remain in private hands. The sole object of the first clause, which is the main clause of the Bill, is to give Parliamentary sanction to the bargains for the transfer of these rights which may be completed; and it is obviously in the public interest that Public Authorities should have the appointment of those who are to enforce these Acts and not a Private Authority. The effect and purpose of Clause 2 is to provide for the adjustment of expenses between boroughs and counties, should any borough desire to obtain their share of the rights which the County Council may have purchased in the first instance. The Bill is not intended to apply to Scotland or Ireland; the Scotch Office and the Irish Office, having been consulted, say there is no occasion for it in either of these countries. The Bill has passed through the other House of Parliament without any amendment, and although there is one small Amendment which I shall ask your Lordships to insert, I do not think there is any further explanation which it is necessary for me to give, and I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."—(The Lord Balfour.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES PROVISIONAL ORDER (CAMBRIAN, &c.) BILL.

QUESTIONS.

SWAZILAND AND THE TRANSVAAL REPUBLIC.

MR. AINSLIE (Lancashire, N., North Lonsdale) (for Mr. ISAACS, Newington, Walworth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies is there any truth in the statements made by the Colonial Press that notwithstanding the undertakings in the various Conventions of 1881, 1884, and 1890, made with the South African Republic, each containing a declaration that the Swazis should remain independent, and in view of the necessity of further repressing the sale of female slaves still carried on in Swaziland, Her Majesty's Government have made a promise to the President of the South African Republic to cede Swaziland to that Republic before the expiration of the Convention of 1890; is he aware that about six millions sterling of British capital have been invested in Swaziland on the strength of the statement made in the House of Lords on the 4th August, 1890, that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to hand over Swaziland to the South African Republic; and is he also aware that Mr. Cecil Rhodes, Prime Minister of the Cape of Good Hope, has proposed to obtain the consent of the South African Republic to join a Customs Union of all the South African Colonies and States in exchange for Swaziland?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Her Majesty's Government have made no promise to the President of the South African Republic to cede Swaziland to that Republic. The Secretary of State is not aware of the amount of British capital, if any, which has been invested in Swaziland since August, 1890. As regards the last paragraph of the question, the Secretary of State has no knowledge of any such proposal.

EXCISE OFFICERS' EXAMINATIONS.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the supervisors of Inland Revenue, who are generally between 45 and 56 years of age at the time, have, in order to obtain promotion to the position of Inspectors, to submit themselves to competitive examinations lasting three days, six hours each day, and consisting of the writing out of statements in the nature of essays; whether at such an examination recently held at the Custom House in Dublin, the late supervisor of Middleton, County Cork, who was 52 years of age, after having been for a short time in the examination room, fell dead in one of the corridors attached to it, and left a widow and family; whether it is necessary to subject this class of public servants, at such a period of their lives, to competitive examinations, in order to ascertain their fitness for promotion to Inspectorships, or whether there is any other method; and whether, in such latter event, he will consider the desirability of abolishing a system which involves competitive examinations of the kind five years only, in some cases, before the compulsory retirement, on the ground of age, of those who have to submit themselves to them as the only means of obtaining promotion?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The examination is a pass and not a competitive one. The essays which have to be written are on subjects connected with the official duties of the candidates. The unfortunate death alluded to in the second paragraph was the result of natural causes, and in no way connected with the examination. The system has been in force for 50 years with satisfactory results. It is acceptable to the members of the Department generally, and I cannot suggest any improvement upon it.

COUNTY GALWAY INFIRMARY.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state at what date the County Galway Infirmary Bill will be introduced, in pursuance of public notice given in December, 1891, and in accordance with the Report of the Commission of Inquiry appointed by the Lord Lieutenant; if he is aware that through that advertisement no steps were taken to elect a surgeon in the usual way, and, as a consequence, an election is now impossible owing to the death of a governor this year, which renders the number of qualified electors below that of an official quorum, and leaves the Infirmary derelict at the present moment; and whether he is aware that, in support of the proposition that the Bill should be passed as an unopposed measure, resolutions were passed by the Grand Jury of the county, the Town Commissioners, and by the citizens of Galway, at a public meeting convened by the Lord Bishop?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The hon. Member will probably have noticed that I have put down a Motion to bring in the Bill to-day. The only thing I can say in regard to the question is, that no steps were taken to elect a surgeon in the usual way not because of any advertisement. The appointment was not made in consequence of the impossibility of making a quorum.

THE MCKINLEY TARIFF.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) (for Mr. P. STANHOPE, Wednesday): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Foreign Office have requested and received from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, as promised in answer to a question put in this House on 9th April of last year, a Report showing the effect of the McKinley Tariff Act upon the wages, employment, and cost of the necessities of life of the working classes in the United States of America?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): Her Majesty's Minister at Washington informed us last year that the Commissioner of Labour, Mr. Wright, a gentleman of high reputation for fairness and intelligence, had been directed by the Senate to report,

"On the effect of the tariff laws of the United States upon imports and exports, the growth, development, production, and prices of agricultural and manufactured articles, and upon wages, domestic and foreign."

Under these circumstances it was not thought necessary to call upon Sir J. Pauncefoot for another Report. Mr. Wright's Report was only presented to the Senate yesterday, but as soon as it is received here a copy of it will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Pinkerton

THE TUBERCULOSIS COMMISSION.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Royal Commission on Tuberculosis may be expected to issue its Report?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am informed that it is hoped that all the experiments will be completed by the autumn, but then some time must elapse before the whole of the information obtained by the Commission can be fully examined and reported on.

SILVER CURRENCY CONFERENCE.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the delegates appointed to represent Her Majesty's Government at the Conference invited by the United States "to consider by what means, if the use of silver can be increased any, the currency system of the nations," in the current year, will be permitted to treat the adoption of a legal fixed ratio between gold and silver as an open question?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I think I may inform the hon. Member that it would be contrary to a precedent and also to expediency to make as to declaration should be made as to delegates instructions to be given to represent this country. I am that instructions will be given, and I must add Her Majesty's Government the precise terms of the instructions. right hon.

MR. PICTON: Will the Gentleman kindly say whether I might with propriety ask the question? When the instructions have been given, will he allow the question to be asked?

MR. GOSCHEN: I think past the Member will find that in the practice has been observed no delegates known the instructions to give. Suppose negotiations were going on in some particular solution, the realised if this solution might be compro those taking part in the Conference knew precisely the instructions given to our delegates. Confidence must be reposed in Her Majesty's Government, the House, of course, being at liberty to disallow any arrangements that may be come to.

CONVICTIONS FOR DRUNKENNESS.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will consent to amend the Return of the hon. Member for South Oxfordshire (Mr. Francis Parker) on convictions for drunkenness, by adding a column to be filled in by the number of convictions in each locality of publicans for supplying intoxicating liquor to drunken persons, or permitting drunkenness on their premises?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied): The Return of the hon. Member for South Oxfordshire has been ordered and could not conveniently be extended in the way desired. Moreover, the information which the hon. Member speaks of in his question appears already in the annual volume of judicial statistics. In the volume for 1890, issued last year, he will find this information on pages 25 and 32.

MR. SUMMERS: Do the statistics make distinction between districts?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: They show by districts in counties and boroughs the number of persons proceeded against, but of convictions they show only the totals. I may say the whole question of the form of these judicial statistics is under consideration, and the subject raised in the question of the hon. Member will not be lost sight of.

RENT-CHARGE OF SMALL HOLDINGS.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn) had notice of the following question:—To ask the President of the Board of Agriculture, as the perpetual rent-charge payable by a tenant purchaser under Clause 5 of the Small Agricultural Holdings Bill is to be only of an amount to include the yearly interests which the County Councils have to pay on the corresponding debt which they have incurred, but is not to include any yearly contribution to a Sinking Fund in repayment of the principal of such debt, from what source are the County Councils to provide the sum needful to repay the whole of the principal of the debt within 50 years, as provided by Clause 12 of the Bill; and if the said perpetual rent-charge is to include a yearly contribution to a Sinking Fund for the gradual repayment of the principal of the debt, what will be done with that yearly contribution after the whole of the debt incurred in respect of the sale of a holding has been paid off?

MR. SPEAKER: The question of the hon. Member for Elgin is not in Order, inasmuch as it is of an argumentative character, having reference to a Bill now before the House and actually in progress in Committee.

LABOURERS IN THE ROYAL PARKS.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works what reply he is prepared to give to the memorial addressed to him from workmen employed in his Department in St. James's and Hyde Parks and in Kensington Gardens, praying that wages, hours of employment, and holidays may be granted to them on similar terms to those granted to the employees of the London County Council?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The memorial from workmen employed in St. James's and Hyde Parks and Kensington Gardens referred to in the question is receiving my careful consideration, and I am making inquiries on the subject; but the hon. Member is doubtless aware that only two years ago we added £1,000 to the Estimates for the purpose of improving the pay of labourers employed in the Royal Parks. When I have been able to reply to the memorialists I shall be happy to answer his question.

ALIEN IMMIGRATION.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is now in a position to fix a day upon which the Government will place the House in possession of the results of their consideration of the question of alien immigration into this country?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): A Bill on this subject is in charge of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and I believe he will be in a position to introduce it soon.

THE EIGHT HOURS BILL.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can fix a day for the discussion of the Eight Hours Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid it will hardly be possible to find time for the discussion of this measure, which, however, I the less regret, as a very full discussion on the same subject, though in a less comprehensive form, took place in the House a short time since on the question of eight hours for mining labour.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman might it not be possible for him to find some time—I will not say a day—after the Whitsuntide Recess?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot give any promise. If once we begin to give way in favour of any particular Bill we shall day after day have other appeals from other hon. Members in favour of measures in which they may be interested, and it would be impossible for the Government to attempt to distinguish between the relative value and importance of the different claims put forward.

INFANTS (BETTING AND LOANS) ACT.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Attorney General if he is aware that, since the passing of the Infants (Betting and Loans) Act, numerous advertisements have appeared in the newspapers, inviting the persons to whom they are addressed to borrow money from the advertisers, and that many of these advertisements are directly addressed to minors, clerks, and reversioners; and whether it is an offence under the Act for any person to send, or cause to be sent, to infants newspapers containing such advertisements?

Mr. James Lowther

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I am not aware of the circumstances mentioned in the first paragraph of the hon. Gentleman's question. I cannot say whether the sending of a newspaper containing such advertisements as the hon. Gentleman refers to is an offence. That would depend upon the circumstances of the case.

THE NEW COINAGE.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is true, as stated by the Staffordshire Evening Post, that—

“The reforms so persistently advocated in some quarters of stamping the value of all coins upon them has not been adopted in the new designs which the Coinage Committee have recommended for adoption”;

if so, what are the coins on which it is proposed to omit any expression of value?

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not think it would be quite fair to disclose the recommendation of the Coinage Committee on one point before the Report generally is ready for publication. That Report is in an advanced state, and very soon it will be possible to lay it on the Table. So far as I am acquainted with the views of the Committee on the question of indicating the value on coins, I feel sure they will commend themselves to practical persons of banking experience. There are three bankers on the Committee, who no doubt will give the fullest attention to the question of having the value indicated on coins where confusion is likely to occur.

GUNBOATS FOR LAKE NYASSA.

SIR A. BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, seeing the great influence that the presence and movement of the two torpedo vessels on the Zambesi belonging to the Navy has exercised in maintaining order and assisting in the stopping of the slave trade, it would be possible to transfer those vessels to Lake Nyassa where their operation could be even more useful?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman for his suggestion, but there are great difficulties in giving effect to his wishes in the way he suggests. The gunboats maintained for service on the Zambesi are only adapted for river work; they cannot be taken to pieces and carried overland; moreover, their services cannot yet be dispensed with on the Zambesi. The Government have, however, decided to build two gunboats specially for service on Lake Nyassa; orders have been given for their construction, and arrangements have been made for sending them out as soon as the depth of water in the river permits of their ascent, which will be early in the autumn. The presence of these vessels on the Lake will, we are confident, be of material assistance in arresting the slave trade at one of its sources.

SPANISH IMPORT TARIFF.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the United Kingdom, under existing Treaties with Spain, is entitled to its imports into that country coming under the Most Favoured Nation Clause until 30th June of the present year; whether the tariff on linen yarns imported into Spain from Austria-Hungary is equal to 27·42 pesetas for Nos. 1 to 20, and whether a Circular issued by the Director General of Customs in Madrid on 11th April last ordered that such numbers of linen yarns must pay 45 pesetas, not only in future, but retrospectively on all imported since 1st February last and which had been cleared at the lower rate of duty, whereas the notice which appeared in the Gazette of 10th February last stated that

“The Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Spain and Austria-Hungary of 3rd June, 1880, is prolonged and shall remain in force until 30th June, 1892, except as regards spirits and alcohols,” and in a telegram sent by the Minister of Finance at Madrid on 1st February to the Collectors of Customs at Barcelona and other Spanish ports it is stated that goods from Austria-Hungary should enjoy the tariff annexed to its Treaty, subsequent to which up to 11th April British yarns were admitted at the same rate; whether it has been brought to the knowledge of the Government that British merchants, acting on the notice in the Gazette and the telegram of the Spanish Minister of Finance, entered into contracts and transactions which have involved serious inconvenience and loss, consequent on the sudden and retrospective increase of the duty on linen yarns imported from this country into Spain since 1st February; and whether, in the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government will endeavour to obtain compensation from the Government of Spain for the injury British merchants have suffered, or will press for the admission of British linen yarns until 30th June at the Austria-Hungary tariff rate, in accordance with the Gazette notice and the instructions of the Minister of Finance in February last?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The answers to the first and third paragraphs are in the affirmative. As to the series of questions contained in the second paragraph, the Spanish Government state that the special rates for linen yarns, stipulated for in the Austro-Hungarian Treaty of 1880, ceased to exist on the 14th March, 1887, at the termination of the period agreed upon for the duration of those special rates. The general tariff for linen yarns then came into force and remained in force until the 1st February, 1892 when the present tariff became operative. Her Majesty's Government have not found themselves able to accept the contention of the Spanish Government, and they have consequently adopted the second alternative suggested in the last paragraph of the hon. Member's question.

LONDON STREET ACCIDENTS.

MR. COGHILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can state what was the number of accidents occurring in the streets of the Metropolis during the year 1891; whether there was any increase or decrease on the number recorded during the year 1890; and how many accidents resulted in death and how many in personal injuries?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The total number of street accidents during the year 1891 was 5,784, being an increase of 56 as compared with the total number in 1890. The number of fatal accidents in 1891 was 147, being an increase of three as compared with the number in 1890.

MR. COGHILL: Has the right hon. Gentleman taken any steps to diminish the number of accidents since his attention was called to the matter a year ago?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is not easy to take any steps to efficiently diminish the dangers that must necessarily attend such crowded streets as we have in London. The number of points at which the police do their best to check and regulate the traffic have been increased during late years.

POLYNESIAN LABOUR IN QUEENSLAND.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies a question of which I have given private notice. Is it true, as reported in a Times telegram to-day, that the Royal Assent has been given to the Bill lately passed by the Queensland Government for the resuscitation of the traffic with Kanaka, which has been called the "White Slave Trade"?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I have seen the telegram, which is substantially correct. A telegram has also been received through the Agent General of Queensland, which I will read—

"Governor of Queensland out of reach of telegraphic communication. Act has been assented to. Merely repeals prohibition of issue of licences after '90. Present regulations remain in force until amended. Revised regulations, still more stringent, ready. Will be issued immediately on Governor's return. Government fully recognise necessity stringent regulations. Fully determined to prevent infringement. Many return Islanders waiting passage to Islands. It is proposed to issue recruiting licences under conditions of revised regulation to ships taking them. Sugar industry already shows great revival. Matter of importance to afford every facility for supply of labour as soon as possible."

MR. WINTERBOTHAM: Considering the deep interest taken in the country on this question, will the right hon. Gentleman not telegraph for these revised regulations, and have them laid on the Table of the House?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I cannot promise to do that. The hon. Member will see from the Paper which I shall shortly present that, as I have already stated, immigration has for the last five years been carried on without any complaint. Before licences can be issued, the regulations are to be made still more stringent. Under these circumstances, and having regard to the assurances contained in the telegram I have read, Her Majesty's Government do not entertain any doubt as to the efficiency of the safeguards proposed by the Queensland Government.

MR. PICTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not stated whether or not the Royal Assent has been given. He said the Governor's assent had been given. I suppose that can be overridden by the Royal Prerogative? Has the final assent of the Crown been given?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member is under a misapprehension. The Bill has become law; and unless it is disallowed, it is in force.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the High Commissioner of the Pacific will look after the recruiting? Will the recruiting outside of British dominions come within the cognisance of our Agent?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I think the explanation I have given to the House is satisfactory. I have no reason to doubt for a moment the sincerity of the assurance given us by the Queensland Government.

THE ISSUE OF WRITS AT BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, with reference to the establishment of a District Registry for the issue of writs of summons in Belfast, whether the conference of the Judges, as promised before the Recess, has yet been held on the subject; and whether he is aware that the Belfast Chamber of Commerce, and all other mercantile bodies in Belfast, desire the immediate establishment of such a registry there?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am informed by the Lord Chancellor that he has conferred with the Judges on this subject, and so far as they are aware there is no practical inconvenience under the present system. He has not received any communication from any body in Belfast, either mercantile or legal. Of course, if the Lord Chancellor does receive such a communication he will give it his careful consideration, and it may be necessary afterwards to communicate with the Treasury on the matter.

MR. SEXTON: Has not the Lord Chancellor received a communication from the Belfast Chamber of Commerce on the subject?

MR. MADDEN: So far as I am aware, the Lord Chancellor has not received such a communication. If he did, it would of course be a communication of great importance, and would receive his very careful attention.

MR. McCARTAN (Down, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that copies of the resolution passed by the Chamber of Commerce were sent to hon. Members of this House; is it not a fact that in England there are eighty district registries; and does the right hon. Gentleman know there is great inconvenience in Belfast owing to the absence of a registry, as at present it takes three days after the issue of a summons before service can be obtained?

MR. MADDEN: The Lord Chancellor did not express any opinion on the merits of the question, but he is giving the matter his careful consideration. I may point out that the Lord Chancellor is not a Member of the House.

MR. MAC NEILL: He was a Member.

THE COLONISATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's); I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Imperial Government have arranged to advance £150,000 to the Government of British Columbia for the purposes of colonisation in that country; if so, at what rate of interest, on what security, and for what period; in what sums and at what dates will the said principal sum be advanced; what will be the constitution of the authority to be appointed to carry out the details of the work; from what part or parts of the United Kingdom will the families to be colonised be chosen, and when is it proposed to commence to send them out; on what principle will such families or persons be chosen, and by whom; and is the work to be carried out entirely under Government supervision, or will the organisation of any private commercial company be utilised in any way for this purpose?

MR. GOSCHEN: We have been informed by the Government of British Columbia that an Act has been passed by the Legislature of that Province to authorise the acceptance of the offer made by Her Majesty's Government of an advance of £150,000 for the purpose of crofter colonisation in that country. It is proposed that this sum should be lent in three instalments of £50,000 each, the second and third instalments not to be advanced until the first and second instalments have been spent. The rate of interest will be three per cent., and the security will be the guarantee of the British Columbian Government. Repayment is to begin after five years and to be spread over a period of twenty-five years. It is proposed to commence colonisation under this arrangement as soon as possible. The Government of British Columbia contemplate sending a Representative to confer with Her Majesty's Government upon the details of the scheme. The hon. Member will understand, therefore, that the details of organisation about which he asks are not settled yet. Legislation will, of course, be needed before the proposed advance can be made, so that the House will have full opportunity for considering the scheme when it is complete.

MR. SETON-KARR: I wish to ask whether any families will be sent out this year?

MR. GOSCHEN: That will depend on the representation of the British Columbian Representative who is coming over, but who has not yet arrived.

MR. SETON-KARR: Will the right hon. Gentleman give me some information as to the last clause of my question?

MR. GOSCHEN: On that I shall have to confer with the Representative of the British Columbian Government. The point is not yet settled.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Will the First Lord say when he proposes to take the Indian Councils Act Amendment Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If there is time I shall take it before seven.

MR. MAC NEILL: Is the First Lord of the Treasury now able to fix a definite time for the Second Reading of the Irish Local Government Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The progress of the Local Government Bill for Ireland will depend upon the advance we make with the Bill we are now engaged upon—the Small Holdings Bill. We cannot take it before we finish the Committee stage.

MR. PICTON: Are we to understand that the Budget Bill is definitely fixed for Monday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps I ought to qualify my previous answer. I understand it would be inconvenient to many gentlemen to begin the discussion of such a Bill as the Irish Local Government Bill on Tuesday or Friday, and therefore I cannot pledge myself on the point. Supposing business so fell out, some other business might have to be taken in order to commence the discussion of the Bill on Thursday or Monday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SMALL AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.—(No. 183.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 12th May.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 7.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 5, to leave out from the word "shall" to the word "be," in line 7.—
(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): When Progress was moved last night we were discussing this question, which really is one of very great importance; and now that I have had an opportunity of still further discussing it, I am more than ever impressed with the seriousness of the mistake the Committee will make unless something is done to meet the possibilities of the case we suggested last night. Let me remind the Committee that there are two interests we have to protect: the interests of the County Council—that is to say, of the ratepayers—and also the interests of the landowners who are concerned in this matter. I shall later show where we are all interested in protecting the interests of the landowners. In the first place, I will deal only with the case of the representatives of the community, who, under this Bill, are asked to run a very considerable risk and to expend public money for a great public service. That public service is the creation of peasant proprietors; and we pointed out last night that under the clause as it stands, after the peasant proprietors have been created by this Bill, it will be perfectly possible, after the expiry of ten years, for the owner of the land to sell it to speculative builders or other people, and to turn what was intended to be a great social reform into a mere speculation, which would in no degree fulfil the objects and intentions of Parliament. Therefore, I say in the interests of the ratepayers, we are bound to see that their sacrifices secure the object which we have in view. Now, Sir, I turn to the interests of the landowners, and I have said we are interested in protecting them. If we do not, what will be the result? If the landowners are to be injured or to run the risk of injury in selling their land for this purpose, of course—at all events so long as the Act is voluntary—no landowner in his senses will dream of selling his land for the purposes of the Act, and the measure will become a dead letter. The Minister for Agriculture, answering our objections last night, said that if the landlord feared any such possibility as I suggested, he had the remedy in his own hand—that he need not sell his land. Well, I may say, having thought the matter over carefully, I am of opinion that any landlord who does sell land, if the Bill remains in its present form, will be a very imprudent and a very foolish person. I must repeat what I said in order to make this perfectly clear. The owners of large estates may—and I hope will—in some number of cases be extremely willing to sell portions of their estates for the purpose of creating peasant proprietors. Having done so, ten years later, if the small owners either can themselves, or with the assistance of any other person, pay off the remaining instalments, they will then become absolute owners of the land; they can do with it what they please, and the conditions which we insert in the Bill against sub-dividing, sub-letting, or using the land for any other than the agricultural purpose which the Bill has in view—all these conditions fall to the ground, and the small owner is absolute owner. He can put up a factory, a row of small cottages; indeed, he can use it for any purpose, however objectionable to the owner of the estate. Is it likely that any landlord in his senses is going to put himself entirely at the mercy of a possible absolute owner of land which he might be willing to part with for the purpose of small holdings? What we have proposed is that the conditions, which I think everybody will admit to be reasonable—although, if we were to discuss them they might be capable of some variation—shall be made permanent, and that when the County Councils have advanced money for these purposes, they shall have the satisfaction of knowing that the purposes shall be fulfilled; or, if from any circumstances it is found impossible to work the land at a profit, or the land becomes necessary for an extension of the towns or villages, then, in that case, the profit ought not to go to the small owner, who has been created by the money of the State, but ought to go either to the County Council which has afforded him this opportunity with the funds of the ratepayers, or to the landowner who would otherwise have been entitled to it, and who has abandoned all the prospects of an improvement in value for a public purpose which has ceased to be possible. We propose, therefore, to omit the words which make the small owner absolute owner, without any condition, at the expiry of ten years, or so soon as the instalments have been paid up. The Minister of Agriculture could not see his way to accept our view of this question last night. But he was not able—perhaps for lack of time—to show that I had in any way exaggerated the possibilities of the Bill as it now stands. I have been endeavouring to find some possible compromise or arrangement of this matter which might meet with the approval of, and at the same time not be inconsistent with what has fallen from, the right hon. Gentleman. Before coming to that, however, let me say that what we are now discussing is not a Party question. It has been to me a great surprise that a proposition which is made primarily of course in the interest of the ratepayers, and secondly in the interest of the landowners, should hitherto have received so little support from the other side of the House. The only difference between my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) and myself is as to the best way to accomplish the same thing. I understand he fears that a person desirous of becoming a small holder will be deterred from doing so if his ownership is clogged by any conditions, and that for that reason he opposes the Amendment. I do not understand that he is blind to the extreme possible inconvenience of the clause as it stands. Let me say in answer to his objection that I do not think it has any force, because, what is the position of the person who wants to be a small holder? At that time he has no conception of building speculation. He does not enter upon the land with any intention of making a profit by a probable increased value, nor does he intend to be an annoyance to the present landowner. If any idea of that kind ever arises in his mind it will be probably suggested to him by some outsider, by a jerry-builder, for instance, or some speculator in land, at a later period. But at the time he is desirous of taking advantage of this Act it will give him everything he can wish for—absolute ownership for the purpose of cultivation. The only way in which it restricts him is that it prevents him from changing his intention of being a cultivator of the soil and becoming a land speculator or builder. Now I come to the suggestion which I respectfully submit to my right hon. Friend, and it is this: if he does not see his way to maintain these conditions in the Bill permanently, he should, at all events, follow what has been suggested to him as the usual course where land is allowed to be taken by railway companies and by other public bodies, namely, that whenever a small holder, who has obtained land for a particular purpose, wishes to sell it for a different purpose he shall offer the right of pre-emption to the landowner of whom he has bought it, or to the County Council, who have also a claim since they have assisted him to buy it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Or to the adjoining owner.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Quite so. If something of that kind is done—and I think it will be possible to introduce a new clause on Report—all temptation would be taken away from the small holder to do the thing which otherwise I think he will be tempted to do. Take the case of Birmingham, where the County Council might be willing to carry out this Act. At the present time you can buy land in most directions at a small distance from Birmingham at £100 an acre, and yet land almost contiguous is worth £500 or £1,000 an acre. It all depends upon accident, or whether or not large works have been established in the immediate neighbourhood. Now, all this land which could be taken for the purpose of creating small holdings at £100 an acre may in the course of a few years become the object of ambition on the part of some speculating builder, and the price may rise to £500 or more an acre. In such a case as this I think the small owner should not be allowed to part with his land for other than agricultural purposes. If he wants to give up his agricultural holding, undoubtedly he should offer it to the County Council or to the landowner from whom it was bought, or to both. My suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, is whether it would not be possible to introduce a clause of this kind in the Committee stage, or possibly in the Report stage.

(2.58.) MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): Before my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) replies to the speech which has just been made, I should like to say that I am not desirous of hurrying him into a reconsideration of the draft of this Bill, and I think the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. Chamberlain) that the subject should be carefully considered with the view of bringing up an amended clause is, perhaps, the best method of getting out of the present difficulty. I must say that I entirely agree with what has fallen from my right hon. Friend opposite as to the great danger we run of neutralising the objects of this Bill by the retention of the words now proposed to be omitted. As I understand it, the intention of Parliament is to enable small holdings to be created for agricultural purposes. It is no part of our duty to assist British labourers or mechanics to acquire eligible plots of land in order that they may make a profit by selling at an enhanced price. What we desire is that the land shall be held permanently upon the conditions now laid down; but as far as I can see, there is nothing in the Bill as it now stands to prevent serious injury being inflicted upon the adjoining property. It seems to me that the fairest way of approaching this matter would be to follow the course adopted by railways when they cease to use land for the purposes for which it was obtained, but with some modification, because if I recollect aright, the adjoining owners have the right of pre-emption at a valuation. But a valuation must include other considerations, such as the possibility of enhanced value, and towards which the small holders may not in the least contribute. I therefore think that if a small holder wishes to sell his land for purposes other than agriculture, the owner from whom he bought it, or the owner of the adjoining property, should have the right of pre-emption at a price not exceeding that which he gave for it in the first instance, plus compensation for any obvious improvements. That seems to me to be a just method on which to proceed. I do not think the County Council would have any claim to the enhanced value of land in cases of this kind. Now, I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill, that while he is right in resisting any proposal that would have a tendency to discourage the acquisition of land, and while I agree with him that the purchaser should have a freehold for the purposes of agriculture, still I think he should not go further in that direction, and I hope he will not be hurried into any decision, but give this matter his careful consideration with the view of bringing up an amended clause.

*MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I should like to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) to the effect of his proposal, that either the landowners who have sold the land to the County Council or the County Council itself should have the right of pre-emption in accordance with the usual rule that prevails when railway companies take land for their undertakings. Well, the effect of that would be that these landowners or the County Council would have the power to buy back ten years hence the land with the improvements. (An hon. MEMBER: Subject to compensation.) The hon. Member says, "subject to compensation" but only for improvements made by the tenant. But has he considered the difficulty of settling the difference between the improved value attributable to unearned increment, and that attributable to improvements made by the tenant? Has he considered the expensive law-suits he will land every one of those unfortunate people in who attempts to enforce his right to compensation against the right of pre-emption of the County Council, or the landowner who many years before sold his land to the County Council? If the County Council is to appropriate the whole of the unearned increment, it will be doing exactly what was decided in this House a few days ago it should not do when the Local Authorities (Purchase of Land) Bill was rejected. I contend that if you are going to import questions and considerations of unearned increment into dealings with these small parcels of land you will certainly terrify persons from having anything to do with land under the Bill. And I appeal to the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (the Attorney General), who has had probably more experience in compensation cases than any professional gentleman in this House, whether the introduction of a clause of this kind will not hold out a future prospect in connection with every one of these small holdings of litigation of the most troublesome and difficult and possibly most expensive kind? The Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) artfully appealed to the sentimental feelings of the landowners who sit on the opposite side of the House, and he welds the two things together—the right of the landowner to have his land back, and the right of the Council to take land upon which public money has been risked, and to use it for public purposes. And he also associates with it the desire of gentlemen on this side of the House that this Bill should be used only to create and perpetuate a peasant proprietary. If the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman is embodied in the Bill, the landowners may be sure that they will never be allowed to seize the unearned increment. The first instance of anything of the kind would result in such an expression of public feeling that the law would have to be altered. The proposition would absolutely deter any man of foresight and common sense from having anything to do with land to be acquired under the Bill. The proper course is to give the small holder the land as free from restrictions as possible, so that when he has paid for it he may do what he pleases, and look upon it as a property in which he has invested his savings for the benefit of himself and his family, and be encouraged to improve it. I think you ought to leave the question of whether any of this land may hereafter be required for cottage building or other purposes to be determined by the future necessities of the locality. I do not see such terrible consequences in land being used for cottages, nor even for the purposes of a manufactory. But these are special cases, and not once in five hundred times will any of the land be required for these purposes. The land will, in the main, continue to be used for purposes of agricultural or market garden cultivation, and the man who buys in the first instance will cultivate or sell the land to someone else who will also cultivate. These terrible instances of the possible appropriation of the land to other purposes are mere inventions conjured up by the fertile imagination of people who are either ignorant of the effect of what they purpose, or who do not desire the Bill to pass, or who want to so injure it as to render it inoperative. I think the Government deserve every credit for having brought this Bill forward. The Bill is a good Bill, and will be very useful; and though it will not remove agricultural depression, it will provide a ladder by which the labouring man may climb into the position of a small farmer. It is, of course, an experiment, but if it is successful it will be extended and we may confidently hope to see considerable benefit from it accrue to a very large number of thrifty, industrious, and deserving people.

*(3.12.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has met the objections of the Government to the Amendment that has been moved in so reasonable and temperate a spirit that I cannot do otherwise than attempt to meet him in the same spirit. The objections of the right hon. Gentleman are twofold. He wishes to guard against the object of the County Council and of the Bill being defeated, and he wishes to protect the landlords against some of the future consequences which he apprehends from the Bill, if it should pass in its present form. For my own part, I think the dangers are to a great extent exaggerated. It may be the case that when small holdings are created builders and speculators will go into the market and buy them with the object of devoting them to other purposes than those of agriculture. But if that is to be so, why is it that these same builders and speculators, being men of wealth and in a position to buy land at the present time, do not buy up land for those purposes now?

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): The landlords will not sell it.

Mr. Thomas H. Bolton

*MR. CHAPLIN: That I do not agree with. I am a landlord myself, and I should be very glad to sell a great deal of land. As a matter of fact, there are large quantities of land in the market which would be available if there were any demand. That is one ground which makes me hesitate, and another reason, I think, diminishes the ground for any Amendment whatever. As a matter of fact, I think we may be fully certain that the payment for all these small holdings or the major part of it will not be made or completed until the expiration of fifty years from now. Most of them will be paid for by instalments, if not all; and fifty years is quite long enough for us to look forward to now. On the other hand, I own that there is something attractive in the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, and he has not asked me to give any pledge on the subject or to do more than consider the matter; and I am bound to say I could not give a pledge because, attractive though it may be, I have some sort of suspicion, especially after listening to the hon. Member opposite (Mr. T. H. Bolton), that the proposal may be surrounded and encumbered with difficulties that have not been apparent to the right hon. Gentleman, and are not at this moment apparent to me. I am afraid these difficulties may exist, and therefore, in anything I may say upon the subject this afternoon, I cannot go further than this: that I will willingly undertake to consider with the utmost care the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, and if I see my way to give effect to that proposal I will introduce a clause at a later period. More than that I cannot say this afternoon, and I make no pledge more than this: that I think the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion is worthy of every consideration, and that consideration I am prepared to give to it before coming to a final decision. In the ordinary course, therefore, the clause would be carried as it stands, and any Amendments which would have been moved may be introduced when the clause comes up afterwards.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: After the speech of the President of the Board of Agriculture, who has at last seen the importance of these Amendments, and has promised to consider the matter fully, I beg leave to withdraw my Amendment. With respect to the fear entertained by the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton), that money will be wasted in legal proceedings as to the settlement of the value of the holdings, they should bear in mind that the value would be as an agricultural holding, without any value for buildings or anything else, and would, therefore, be a very simple matter, and need involve but very small expense in the case of a transfer. With respect to compensation for improvements, the whole thing is quite clear, and I fail to see where the difficulty would come in.

*(3.20.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I hope the Committee will think very seriously about this question of ten years. If this were a Bill to create small land speculators I could understand the contention of the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton), but it professes to be a Bill to create small agricultural holdings; and if we are going to create them, and at the end of ten years turn them over to land speculators, all the trouble that we have taken over this Bill will have been thrown away. We ought, I think, to take care that the Bill does not lend itself to the schemes of speculators and jerrymanderers. We ought, I think, to take care that there should be a pre-emption; and that so long as the County Council can use the land for the purposes of this Bill, they should have the pre-emption; and if they fail, by all manner of means let the pre-emption in the second instance go to the landlord who parts with his land voluntarily for the sake of this experiment and for no other purpose. A good deal has been said about this Bill being a ladder. We do not want to raise a ladder by which a few men may climb up and then kick the ladder away, and that is what will happen if this alteration is not made.

*MR. ABEL SMITH (Herts, E.): This question is of the greatest importance to every landowner. I do not think the cases which have been put forward are exceptional; it is quite possible that a public-house or a factory might be erected on one of these holdings, as after ten years there will be no control over them. In the words of a correspondent, a landowner may have on the edge of his property erections for Atheistical, Papistical, or Salvationist purposes. Therefore, I think the landowner or the County Council ought to have a right of pre-emption at the end of ten years. Without this security, the Bill will discourage owners from selling to the Council. I should like to press upon the right hon. Gentleman the importance of this Amendment most earnestly.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): As one of those who had a strong objection to creating a new system of tenure applicable for ever to a particular class of holdings I may be permitted to say a few words. It appears to me that the present proposal is of a very different character and not open to the objections that many of us felt to the previous proposal. I think it is worthy of very serious consideration; and without committing myself in any way to details, I am certain that nothing will be lost by giving the matter full consideration. I presume it would be necessary to determine at what price these holdings should be taken—whether it should be the price originally paid by the Local Authority or the present price. I suppose it would be the price paid to the Local Authority by the purchaser, but I do not imagine there would be much difficulty about that, and there might be an Arbitration Clause by which the improved value could be ascertained with as little difficulty. I would point out that this right of pre-emption only applies in the case of land bought by compulsory purchase, and I think the right hon. Gentleman opposite will not be surprised if we ask for the right of compulsory purchase.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I seldom trouble the House on this Bill, because I am anxious to see the end of it. I am not one of those who conceive it to be their business to better the Bills of the present Government. When I discovered that the Government were not prepared to put in compulsion I thought it a mere waste of time to discuss or even to vote on the subject; and so far as I remember, with the exception of the compulsion question, I have not even voted once on any of these Amendments. But I have remarked that since yesterday a curious change has come over the Members for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) and West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage). These Gentlemen have been complaining of obstruction, but who have been obstructionists during the last two days? They have obstructed Public Business to their hearts' content, aided and abetted by the Minister for Agriculture. I counted in the Times this morning no fewer than nine speeches delivered yesterday by the Member for Bordesley.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Short speeches.

MR. LABOUCHERE: No doubt they were short, but they were supplemented by long speeches by the Member for West Birmingham. What is the meaning of all this? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) says it is to improve the Bill. The Liberal Unionists need not come here to improve the Bill; they can talk it over quietly with their friends opposite instead of wasting the time of the House by long discussions. Why do not I do the same? I do not pretend to have the ear of the Government. They would not listen to me. I have not the advantages of the Member for Bordesley. I am not a persona grata with the Government. The right hon. Gentleman said he did not wish to legislate for fifty years hence. I object to come down here and waste time in legislating for three months hence.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is making observations which hardly have reference to this Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I will not continue; they were somewhat general.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I move, in page 4, line 10, to leave out the words "by the owner." If these words are retained it will be impossible for the owner to let his holding.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 10, to leave out the words "by the owner."—(Mr. Barclay.)

Mr. Labouchere

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): If the Amendment were carried the holding could be cultivated by anyone who was not the owner.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): The next sub-section says that the holding shall not be let without the consent of the County Council.

Question put, and agreed to.

*MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): My Amendment is to insert after "used," in line 11, the words "as building land or." The object of the Amendment is twofold. First, to make a clear prohibition of the use of this land for building purposes mainly; and, in the second place, I want to get rid of the restriction in the second part of the clause that no dwelling-house shall be erected on a small plot of land. I believe that restriction will be found objectionable in practice. Of course, the view of the Committee is that these holdings should not be used for building purposes mainly; but where the holding is bona fide used for agricultural purposes, we should do nothing to prevent the owner making his home thereon. I think the limit of an annual value of £25 for a holding on which a dwelling-house can be erected will be most unsatisfactory. That annual value might represent 50 acres where land is of small value, and surely in such a case the owner should not be prevented from erecting his home on the land.

MR. CHAPLIN: I think the object of the hon. Member is met by the clause as it stands. Sub-section b provides that the holding shall not be used for any purpose other than agriculture, therefore the insertion of the words "as building land or" is unnecessary. With regard to the second point, I propose, when we come to Sub-section d, which provides that no dwelling-house shall be erected on a holding not exceeding £25 annual value, to make a suggestion which will abolish that limit altogether, and I hope, to some extent, meet the views of hon. Members opposite.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BARCLAY: I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name. Hitherto we have discussed the conditions under which the owner of the land shall hold it; this Amendment deals with the conditions under which a sub-tenant shall hold the land if the owner lets it. I propose that if the owner lets the land the tenant should have perpetuity of tenure at a fixed rent, and the right to assign the tenant right.

THE CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. Member for Forfarshire that we have already passed words making the limitation only apply to ten years, or so long as anything remains unpaid. It would be inconsistent with that to insert a limitation which provides that a sub-tenancy or sub-lease should be in perpetuity.

MR. BARCLAY: Do I understand that it is not competent to move the Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member will have to modify his Amendment to make it consistent with the words already passed.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I think the right hon. Gentleman appreciates the remarks I made on the Second Reading with regard to the point dealt with by my Amendment. As far as Scotland is concerned, if the limit of £25 is retained, it would make the Bill entirely inoperative, which I am sure is not intended. I do not take exception to the restriction to one dwelling-house, though in a holding of 100 acres at 10s. an acre a workman's cottage in connection with the house would be an advantage. I think it would be well to hear what concessions the right hon. Gentleman will make, and then discuss them.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 14, to leave out Sub-section (d.)—(Mr. Esslemont.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'No more than one dwelling house shall' stand part of the Clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman for giving me an opportunity of stating at once what I suggest. He is perfectly right. I do recognise the objections to this clause he pointed out on the Second Reading of the Bill, and I have considered the matter and come to this conclusion. I think the first part of the sub-section—

"Not more than one dwelling-house shall be erected on the holding" commends itself generally to the Committee. The main objection is to the proviso which forbids the erection of any dwelling-house upon a holding not exceeding £25. I am bound to say there is no good reason that can be assigned for any specific limit, and what I would suggest is that the clause should run in this form. I should propose to divide the sub-section into two—

"Sub-section (d)—not more than one dwelling-house shall be erected on the holding.

"Sub-section (e)—Where the County Council declare that in their opinion a small holding is not sufficient to enable the occupier thereof to maintain in comfort himself and his family by the cultivation thereof, the holding shall, during the period aforesaid, be held subject to the condition that no dwelling-house shall be erected thereon without the consent of the County Council."

That, I think, ought to meet the views of many hon. Gentlemen who raised objections on the Second Reading, and it appears to get over the difficulty I was anxious to avoid, that buildings should not be erected all over the country on small plots of land on which it was impossible the owner could maintain himself and his family.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I am prepared to accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, as I think the question is one which should be left to the County Council. Congestion has been caused by the erection of houses on small holdings where there was not sufficient to keep the family, and no other work to be got, and the consequence was that the places became, to a certain extent, pauper settlements. I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I would point out that, so far as I caught the words, the question is not left in the discretion of the County Council. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman means that it should be left to them, and it would be more satisfactory; but there are words binding the County Council.

MR. CHAPLIN: The County Council will have full discretion.

*MR. SHAW LEFFVRE: I fully recognise the spirit of conciliation in which the right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to meet us, but I do not think his proposed Amendment is altogether satisfactory. It appears to me to raise a very strong presumption against the erection of houses. As I understand the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, the County Council will have power to prohibit the erection of dwellings if they think the occupier cannot live on the land. I think it would be better to say that no dwellings should be erected on holdings under £25 without the consent of the Local Authority, and give them no other direction whatever. I can imagine nothing more likely to make labourers and artisans remain in the rural districts than to encourage them to erect houses on these holdings. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will go a little bit further and remove the instruction to the County Council, saying merely that dwellings shall not be erected on holdings under £25 without their consent.

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): It seems to me it would be rather difficult for the County Council to say whether a house is really desirable under the words suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. I would suggest, rather than throwing on the County Council the duty of determining whether the family could be properly maintained on the holding, that the question should be put in a negative form—that the house should be erected when the County Council were convinced that the non-existence of the house would be a serious obstacle to the successful cultivation and occupation of the holding. I think that would make the task of the County Council less difficult.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: Will not the right hon. Gentleman leave it further to the discretion of the County Council, by omitting the words "in comfort"? The idea of comfort in agricultural districts varies, and occasionally clergymen tell my constituents that with eleven shillings a week they should keep a wife and family "in comfort" and be contented. I do not want differing views as to what is "comfort" to be discussed by the County Council, and we may trust the County Council on the matter.

COMMANDER BETHELL: Might not my right hon. Friend put the presumption the other way, and say that the County Council might forbid the erection of a house?

(3.50.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I think it would be desirable that there should be no presumption against the erection of dwelling-houses and buildings on small holdings. In reply to the deputation which was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham to the First Lord of the Treasury yesterday, the First Lord of the Treasury acknowledged the shortcomings of the Crofters Act in the Highland districts, and said that these shortcomings would be met by the provisions of this Bill. Small holdings in the West Highlands consist not of twenty-five acres merely, but of fifty acres, and sometimes of two or three or four hundred acres; and if you put in a presumption of this kind against the erection of dwelling-houses and buildings it would make this Bill absolutely a dead letter. If the shortcomings of the Crofters Act are to be met by this Bill, I think the least that can be done is to make a full concession in this matter of the erection of dwelling-houses and buildings. Over the greater part of Scotland—the Highland area is the largest—but over the whole of this area the crofter families do not support themselves on their crofts. It would be absolutely impossible that they could do so in comfort, or in any other way. They supplement their income by fishing or by various other methods; and I think that it would be very unreasonable that in that large part of Scotland the Highlands, where the agrarian question is the most acute, you should put a spoke in the wheel of the County Council, and prevent them from carrying out one of the necessary portions of their duties. I think it is very desirable that this Small Holdings Act should in the end supersede very largely the working of the Crofters Act, so that there may be but one system in the country. That can only be done by making a concession of this kind. I sincerely hope the right hon. Gentleman will make it quite plain that there will be no presumption against the erection of dwelling-houses and buildings on these small holdings.

*MR. CHAPLIN: I think we are all in agreement as to the object to be carried out; but it is as to the means whereby that object is to be carried out that we disagree. I think, however, it is a mistake to say that there is anything in the sub-section which appears to raise a presumption against the erection of houses on small holdings. Perhaps the Committee would let me read it again—

“Where the County Council declare that in their opinion a small holding is not sufficient to enable the occupier thereof to maintain in comfort himself and his family by the cultivation thereof, the holding shall during the period aforesaid be held subject to the condition that no dwelling-house shall be erected thereon without the consent of the County Council.”

The County Council are not bound to declare anything. That is absolutely in their discretion; and if they do not make a declaration to that effect at the sale, then the purchaser is perfectly free to erect a dwelling house on the holding, however small. But, even if they did make that declaration, then a building can still be erected if they give their consent. I do not think the provision could be drawn upon much broader lines, or could give a more full and complete discretion to the County Councils. I am, however, perfectly ready on this point to accept any suggestion which appears to me to be a better one, or which would give fuller effect to the object we have in view.

*MR. HOBHOUSE: I would suggest that we should leave the matter to be regulated by the rules to be made by the County Councils. If we gave a direction to the County Councils that a man should be able to maintain his family out of his holding before he was allowed to erect a dwelling-house, they would very likely in many cases prevent the erection of houses; and the result would be that they would draw a wrong line and injure a really good class of small holders.

*MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON: Whether a man can maintain himself in comfort on land for which he pays £25 a year or on twenty-five acres or not depends upon the man himself, upon his capacity, and upon the particular cultivation of his holding. I happen to live in a district where there are a great number of small holders, and tenants of my own live in very considerable comfort on less than twenty-five acres. They pursue a special cultivation; they devote themselves to special modes of industry on the land. As to the cultivation, I suppose it is desirable to encourage a certain amount of market-garden cultivation in connection with small holdings near towns. Market-garden cultivation is carried on by a great many tenants on less than twenty-five acres, and twenty-five acres is a considerable market-garden—or even a holding of £25 a year valuation. In my neighbourhood, in Sussex, there are some hundreds of holders living upon small quantities of land by means of poultry, butter, and market-garden produce. They send it to Tunbridge Wells and Eastbourne and neighbouring towns. They are living in reasonable comfort. I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill wants some modification in the direction of greater freedom. As to this particular proposal is the owner for the time being to go to the County Council and represent his personal qualifications, and give information as to his means and experience, and explain what he proposes to do, before he gets permission to build or to change his cultivation? This is one of the conditions I have been protesting against from the first. I think the right hon. Gentleman is here throwing a very awkward and difficult duty upon the County Councils, and is seriously embarrassing the Bill.

*DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): What my hon. Friend has said is perfectly true, and I can corroborate it from my own personal experience. I quite agree with my hon. Friend that it is possible for a man to make a living out of 17 acres of land. I have a tenant myself who is not only doing that, but is able to live in greater comfort than a great many of the farmers surrounding him, because he is a man of great industry and practical experience, and turns to account every bit of land under his control. I am sorry my hon. Friend did not press his Amendment. If we want the people to come back to the land, if we want them to make their homes on the land, I think we ought to enable them to build where they please, on any quantity of land, and anywhere they like; and I think it is unfortunate that the Amendment has not been pressed.

(4.0.) MR. GRAY: It seems to me that the words which I have suggested are best adapted to meet the necessities of the case. I think we should not say anything about maintaining a family in comfort, because the County Council might have some difficulty in deciding what is comfort. It depends upon how many there are in the family; it also depends upon what some members of the family are bringing in—these are all matters which it seems to me are entirely outside the scope of a Bill of this sort. It seems to me that as we are all agreed upon what is required, the best way of getting at it would be to insert the words in line 18, page 4—

“Unless the County Council consider that the want of a dwelling-house occasions a serious obstacle to the successful cultivation of the holding.”

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I venture to submit to the right hon. Gentleman that he should omit this part of the clause, and bring up an Amendment on a future occasion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, the following Amendment was agreed to:—Page 4, line 15, to leave out from the word “holding” to end of sub-section.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to move—

In Page 4, after Sub-section (e), insert the following sub-section:—“(f) That no dwelling-house or building on the holding shall be used for the sale of intoxicating liquors.”

I do not think there will be any objection to this Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ROWNTREE: I beg to move—

In page 4, line 23, after “overcrowding,” insert, “In the case of any dwelling-houses so to be erected within the area of any borough the requirements of the County Council shall not run counter to or be in substitution for the bye-laws or sanitary and building requirements in force in such borough.”

Dr. Farquharson

The Bill as it stands in no way recognises the jurisdiction of the corporation of a borough within its own area. I venture to submit that it is extremely undesirable that there should be any conflict between the Sanitary Authorities if any new buildings are to be erected. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will make it quite clear that the County Council should not come to interpose in matters affecting the bye-laws and sanitary requirements of the borough.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 23, after the word “overcrowding,” to insert, “In the case of any dwelling-houses so to be erected within the area of any borough, the requirements of the County Council shall not run counter to or be in substitution for the bye-laws or sanitary and building requirements in force in such borough.”—(Mr. Rowntree.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. CHAPLIN: I am in agreement with the hon. Member so far as I understand his wish; but I do not think the Bill is drawn in any way to interfere with the jurisdiction of the borough authorities within their own area. It is quite clear that should the County Council lay down certain regulations for this purpose they are not over-ride or in any way interfere with any sanitary regulation which the borough authorities may choose to make. I think that is perfectly clear as the Bill has been framed, but if it is not I shall make it quite clear.

MR. GULLY (Carlisle): I think the difficulty would be met by modifying the hon. Friend's Amendment in this way—

“Any dwelling-house erected on the holding shall comply with the requirements of the County Council or Borough Council if such dwelling-house be within the boundary of the borough as fixed by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882.”

A small holder under this Bill might be put to the expense of complying with the requirements of the County Council after having previously gone to the expense of satisfying the regulations of the borough authorities.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I do not believe there is any necessity whatever for putting in rules with regard to these sanitary matters. Any tenant or proprietor would be amply protected against any infringement of the sanitary regulations by the general law.

MR. CHAPLIN : I shall look into the Bill, and make it quite clear on this point.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS : I beg to move in page 4, line 24, leave out the word "may" and insert the word "shall." Sub-section 2 says that if there is any breach of these restrictions the County Council may, after giving the owner an opportunity of remedying the breach, if it is capable of remedy, cause the holding to be sold. The object of this Amendment is to make that obligatory on the County Council.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 24, to leave out the word "may," and insert the word "shall."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'may' stand part of the Clause."

*MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON : I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not consent to this, to take away from the County Council all discretion in the matter. I can conceive that this Amendment, if adopted, might work a very serious injustice to the particular persons who might be the owners of property of this kind. There might be a good deal of property in the market and it might be depreciated, and to oblige the County Council to insist upon immediate sale might work a very great deal of injustice upon poor, unfortunate persons whose parents had perhaps put their little all in these small holdings. I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will not consent to this.

MR. CHAPLIN : I rather hope my hon. Friend will not press this Amendment. I think discretion should be allowed to the County Councils, and I can conceive cases in which, if it is made positively obligatory, great hardship will be done to the owners of small holdings.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS : After the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, I will ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS : I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman for an explanation of Sub-sections 4 and 5 of Clause 7. As the clause stands it refers to where the holding is sold free of these restrictions, and any man with sufficient capital might buy the holding and get clear of the restrictions entirely and do what he likes with the holding then and there. If that is the case, I should suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should put in some such words as I have proposed on the Paper. I move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, leave out sub-sections (4) and (5) and insert the following sub-sections : "(4) Any small holding sold by the County Council under this section shall be sold subject to the terms and conditions provided by this Act. (5) The proceeds of the sale shall be applied in discharge of any interest or instalment then due to the County Council on account of unpaid purchase-money, and the balance, if any, shall be paid to the person appearing to the Council to be entitled to receive the same."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Question proposed, "That those sub-sections be there inserted."

MR. CHAPLIN : The object of the hon. Member is provided for in the last three lines of the section as it stands now—"and in either case the provisions of this Act with respect to the purchase-money shall apply in like manner as if the sale were the first sale of a small holding under this Act." That is to say, it is to be sold subject to the conditions provided in this clause.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman in case a man purchases the holding—if it is for sale and he pays off the whole of the purchase-money—will he not, under this clause, become free of all restrictions?

MR. CHAPLIN : No.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS : In view of the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, I ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(4.15.) MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON : In moving the Amendment which stands in my name, I would point out that if the right hon. Gentleman will refer to a preceding section, he will see that the word used is "let." This Section relates back to the preceding portion, and the word "lease," which appears in the 13th line, should, therefore, be "letting." "Letting" will cover and include "lease," but "lease" will not include "letting." Therefore, I would suggest that the word should be "letting," and I move the alteration.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 13, to leave out the word "lease," and insert the word "letting."—(Mr. Thomas H. Bolton.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead): I only rise to call attention to a point which I think is really one of drafting. I think the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Forfarshire received rather scant attention, and if the right hon. Gentleman will turn his attention to Sub-section B, he will see that it provides that the holding shall be cultivated by the owner. If he then looks at Sub-section C, he will see that there is power to let with the consent of the County Council. Supposing the property to be let with the consent of the County Council, I cannot help thinking that, as the Act stands, unless the lessee employs the owner to cultivate the land, he will not be able to cultivate it at all. Of course, it is simply a question of drafting, but I thought it right to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to it.

MR. CHAPLIN: I will see to it.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8.

*MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON: The Amendment which I have to propose is, in page 5, line 26, after the word "loss," to leave out all the words to the end of line 30. As the first clause stands at present it is—

"Any such letting shall be at the best annual rent that can be obtained without any premium or fine, and on such terms as may enable the Council to resume possession of the land within a period not exceeding twelve months."

Anyone acquainted with agriculture, as the right hon. Gentleman is, will know that that would render it very difficult to let any land such as this for agricultural purposes. If a tenant is to be turned out in less than twelve months—if this is perpetually hanging over him—there is not much inducement for him to put much in the land. Then, again, it is objectionable that there should be a disqualification on the part of the County Council to take any premium or fine, because I can well understand that the land might be thrown by some preceding tenant on the hands of the County Council with a tenant-right in it which would be of value, and which ought to be paid for, and which, if paid for, would be a security to the County Council for the performance of the conditions of the tenancy. But this clause, providing that no premium or fine is to be taken, might prevent the County Council availing themselves of this opportunity of securing a return for money, perhaps, which they had expended. Then there is the provision that it is to be let at the best annual rent that can be obtained. How is that to be arrived at—by advertisement or by putting the property up to auction, or in what way? I know a landlord who fancied that he could get a considerable rent for his land by putting it up to competition. He put up two properties by auction and got a considerable rent, but what was the result? The people gave more rent than they could pay, and the consequence was that both tenants got into difficulties and are now leaving. That is most unfair against the careful and prudent and thoughtful tenant, and calculated to encourage that unfair competition for agricultural land which is altogether opposed to the principle of this Bill. The man who gives most rent is not always for agricultural purposes the best tenant, and I hope the County Councils, consisting of persons living in the country districts, will be allowed discretion in this matter. I, therefore, hope the right hon. Gentleman will assent to this Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 26, after the word "loss," to leave out to the end of line 30.—(Mr. Thomas H. Bolton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: I have no objection whatever to omitting the first part of these lines; but I should not like to omit the words which enable the County Council to recover possession in twelve months, because this is a clause which enables them to get rid of superfluous land, and I want to provide for the use of this land until they can sell it. I shall be prepared to leave out—

"Any such letting shall be at the best annual rent that can be obtained without any premium or fine."

*MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON: I agree to that, but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether on Report he would not deal with the question whether liability to eviction at twelve months or less is not rather unreasonable, and whether he will not give a tenant a clear twelve months' notice from the ordinary date for payment of rent customary in the district. That would enable him to get his full tenant-right. Then also I would suggest whether he would not give a tenant who comes in under these circumstances the benefit of the Agricultural Holdings Act with regard to tenant-right.

COMMANDER BETHELL: Will the Agricultural Holdings Act apply? If so will the County Council not be able to turn a man out at six months' notice?

MR. CHAPLIN: What I propose is to modify the words twelve months, so as to give the usual notice to quit, whatever that may be.

(4.23.) SIR R. PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I think it would be better to accept the proposed Amendment in its entirety, because the words proposed to be retained impose a restriction on the action of the County Council. They say that any lease or letting shall be on such terms as to enable the County Council to resume possession of the land within a period not exceeding twelve months. It is quite conceivable that the County Council might prefer to let the land on lease for a term of years, and I fail to see any advantage from keeping in the words that the right hon. Gentleman desires to retain.

Amendment amended, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9.

MR. BARCLAY: I beg to move my Amendment. It will make the clause read thus—

"A County Council may delegate, with or without restrictions, the powers of the County Council under this Act with respect to the adaptation of land for the holdings," &c.

The clause as it stands limits the delegation of this work to those cases where the holdings are of such a size that dwelling houses cannot be erected upon them. I think it would be much more advantageous to give the County Council a general power of delegation.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 40, to leave out the word "where."—(Mr. Barclay.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'where' stand part of the Clause."

(4.27.) MR. CHAPLIN: I am quite ready to accept the spirit of the Amendment, but I think the Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane) would be more suitable. The clause will then read—

"Where a County Council provide small holdings, they may delegate, with or without restrictions, the powers of the County Council under this Act," &c.

MR. BARCLAY: I will withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of Mr. HALDANE, the following Amendment was agreed to:—Page 5, line 40, leave out from "holdings" to "they," in line 42.

*MR. HOBHOUSE: I will not move my Amendment if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) will give me an assurance that there is nothing in this clause to prevent a County Council from managing a small holding through a Committee appointed under the Local Government Act in the ordinary course.

(4.29.) MR. CHAPLIN: I believe that to be the case; that is my understanding of the Bill. I now propose the Amendment that stands in the name of the hon. Member for Islington (Sir A. Rollit). It is in accordance with the engagement which I made at an earlier period of the Bill, and it is in order to give to the Borough Authorities a place upon the Committee to whom the management of these small holdings has been delegated in those cases where the land is within their own district.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, after line 5, to insert, "The Mayor and one member of the Town Council to be appointed by the Council for that purpose of any borough situate or partly situate within the area in which the holdings or part of the holdings are situate."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HOBHOUSE: The Committee as constituted consists of five Members. If this Amendment is agreed to it will consist of seven.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean "the Mayor and one member" or "the Mayor or one member"?

MR. CHAPLIN: It should be "the Mayor or one member." It should be so amended.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I would suggest that three members of the Council should be added to the Committee.

MR. CHAPLIN: I think there is reason in what the hon. Gentleman suggests. I will therefore withdraw the Amendment, and will introduce another at a convenient opportunity.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: This clause requires that three-fourths of the purchase-money shall be advanced; but the alteration that has been made in the amount to be advanced in the case of the creation of small holdings will necessitate some alteration in the clause. Therefore, instead of moving, as stated on the Paper, to leave out "three-fourths" and insert "eighty-five per cent," I will move to leave out "three-fourths" and insert "four-fifths."

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 26, to leave out "three-fourths," and insert "four-fifths."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 11.

On Motion of Mr. CHAPLIN, the following Amendments were agreed to:—Page 7, line 11, after "rate," insert "for the purposes of this Act"; line 13, leave out "the purposes of this Act," and insert "those purposes."

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I beg to move—

In page 7, line 19, at the end of the Clause, to add the words, "Providing always that one-half of the rate, or increase of rate, leviable in respect of such charge may be deducted by occupiers from the rent payable to their immediate landlords, any agreement to the contrary notwithstanding."

In moving this Amendment, I do not propose to raise the vexed question of rates as between landlord and tenant, because it is one that has been before a Select Committee of this House as well as before the Royal Commission. The Select Committee on Local Taxation reported in 1870 in these words—

"It is expedient to make owners as well as occupiers directly liable for a certain portion of the rates."

The Members of that Select Committee were well known in the agricultural world, and included the late Leader of this House and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Royal Commission on Agriculture in 1882 also reported in favour of the same principle. They said that, without disturbing existing contracts, all the rates should in future be borne equally by owners and occupiers. Upon that Commission there were the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, the present Minister for Agriculture, the present President of the Local Government Board, and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney. Surely, then, I am entitled to say that a principle which was first started by Gentlemen of considerable eminence on both sides of the House should be accepted by it. It prevails in Scotland, where, I believe, it works well and satisfactorily. Now the Act proposes to raise ten millions of money on the security of the penny rate for the purpose of setting up small holders. But every holder that is set up will displace a tenant farmer. You are going, then, to substitute small farmers. This rate, which is a new one, must have been quite unforeseen twelve months ago; and I think it is entirely unfair, entirely unjust, to set up a class by means of it to compete with the present occupier. The tenant farmers may well say, "Save us from our friends." Who would have ventured eighteen months or two years ago to predict that the Minister for Agriculture would have introduced such a proposal as that we are now considering? Everyone will admit that this is a just and a right principle which is embodied in this Amendment, and I sincerely trust that the right hon. Gentleman will accede to it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 19, at the end of the Clause, to add the words,—“Provided always, that one-half of the rate, or increase of rate, leviable in respect of such charge may be deducted by occupiers from the rent payable to their immediate landlords, any agreement to the contrary notwithstanding.”—(Mr. Seale-Hayne.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member has raised a question which is undoubtedly one of great importance, and to the principle of which I have on more than one occasion, both in and out of this House, given my adhesion. I may remind the Committee that it was one of the recommendations made many years ago by the Commission of which I was a Member. But, although we have accepted the principle, I do not think this is a convenient or a fitting occasion upon which to raise the question. The hon. Member has talked about the burden we are going to lay upon the occupying tenant, and the risk the County Councils are going to run; but, unless I am altogether mistaken, the burden will be practically nothing. Unless the Act fails to fulfil our views financially, there will be no deficit or rate to be raised at all. In any case, I think we may look forward with confidence to the working out of the Act in that respect. I ask the Committee, therefore, whether it would be wise to introduce such a large question on this occasion?

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I consider that this is by far the most important Amendment that has been moved in connection with this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has confidence that there is no risk in the measure. Well, Sir, I do not entirely share that confidence. I do not think anyone could go into the question of the principle involved without feeling that it will have a much larger extension than that which is given to it in the Bill. You cannot begin a system of this kind without going a great deal further than this tentative measure—as it has been called—can go. Everyone must see that as regards tenant farmers the Bill is not being received with enthusiasm. They regard with natural jealousy the fact that a class of competitors will be introduced by it into the agricultural market. What do they say? They say that the whole of the burden is to be cast upon them. I am sorry that the Chancellor of the Exchequer went out just now, because the question as to whom the burden is to fall on is one which ought to be considered. I know that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill has very clear and definite ideas upon the subject; but I do not know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer goes so far as he does upon this point. Now, this is a new rate; it has now been proposed for the first time. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted the justice of the division of the rate in Scotland—I am not quite sure whether he does so in regard to Ireland as well—as between the owner and the occupier. Unquestionably, in the first instance, this rate will fall upon the occupier. Now, if you want to make this Bill more palatable to the tenant farmers of England than it is at the present time, you must do something to show them that you are not going to throw upon their backs the whole burden of this change. The right hon. Gentleman said this was not a convenient time to raise so large a question; but what could be a more fitting opportunity for raising it than upon a Bill which proposes to create it? We were all agreed some years ago in regard to the education rate, which has since been complained of both in town and country. If you now create a new rate for the purpose of manufacturing holdings, and borrow large sums of money on the security of the rate, you will take a step which will have serious consequences. Therefore, I cannot understand the right hon. Gentleman saying that this is not a convenient and fitting time upon which to raise the question. But this is a fitting occasion for imposing a charge of the kind, and indeed there seems to be no dispute as to the justice or policy of the case. You are creating a charge by this Bill, and, therefore, it is just that the charge should be divided. This is the only occasion for the assertion of the principle, and I trust, therefore, that the hon. Member will take a Division upon this question, than which no more important subject can be raised within the four corners of this Bill.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The question now before the House is one that may be divided into two branches—one as to the policy, and the other as to the possibility of putting that policy into practice. As regards the policy, I think the House will not deem this a convenient opportunity for discussing the question of the division of rates. The Government, I may remind the House, have more than once expressed their entire willingness to consider and adopt the principle of the relief of rates; but it is clear that a mere division of rates without taking into consideration the question of the representation of the owners would not be fair or proper. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt) shakes his head, but he knows quite well that on the County Council the owner is not represented at all. He does not even have a vote, and it is, of course, quite a question—one I should be prepared to argue—whether if he had a vote that would be adequate representation. I venture to think the right hon. Gentleman himself would consider that it would be unjust and unfair to put a portion of the rate upon the owner without making arrangements by which he is to have some kind of representation. I ask the Committee whether this is not an inopportune occasion for taking in hand the amendment of the law in regard to the question of representation upon the County Council, and upon all the various other bodies, that will have to be considered in connection with this subject? It would, I submit, be exceptionally inopportune at the present moment, because this particular subject is now under the consideration of a Committee upstairs, which is discussing the subject and propriety of altering the representation of these bodies if the relief of rates is taken in hand. The Members of the Committee are now discussing not whether the owner shall have representation—that is admitted by all—but what degree of representation the owner shall have if there is to be any division of rates. But there is another difficulty in connection with the subject. The county rate is a rate which embraces many things. While it is not necessary for me to set out in detail the purposes for which a county rate is levied, I desire to point out that it would be absolutely impossible to distinctly and definitely lay down what portion of the county rate ought to be divided to meet any demand made upon the rates in consequence of this Bill. There is one observation the right hon. Gentleman made which I hope will be taken note of. The right hon. Gentleman said that in his opinion it would be unjust to put the whole of these rates upon the tenant farmer. Well, Sir, that is quite contrary to much of the argument used in regard to the Government Motion as to the relief of local taxation. It has been asserted by his colleagues that the relief which has been given by the Government to local taxation has been relief not to the tenant, but to the landlord.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Hear, hear!

*MR. RITCHIE: The assertion of the right hon. Gentleman is that it will be a farmer's rate.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I said it was a very disputed question as to how much of the rate fell upon the landlord and how much upon the tenant. It is quite true that the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture said the whole fell upon the landlord; but I have always accepted what I believe is the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that as regards the whole rates they fell more upon the farmer than the tenant.

*MR. RITCHIE: I do not think my observations have been affected by the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. However that may be, it is clearly a very hard question, and one that cannot be adequately discussed in Committee on this Bill, and it would be unwise and improper for the Committee to accept the Amendment now proposed.

MR. GRAY: This is a most important question to the tenant farmers of England who hold their farms under lease. Although I feel the force of what has fallen from the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie), yet I want to know when this sort of thing is going to stop? We were told exactly the same some years ago when the educational rate was imposed. In some instances that meant something like 2s. in the £1, and consequently was at the time a very serious matter to the tenant farmers. This, I know, will not be a such serious matter, but still the principle remains. I have not been influenced very much by what has fallen from the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) in his new-born zeal for the tenant farmers, since I remember that he did not stand up in vindication of the tenant farmer when the education rate was being imposed upon them, and remember also that not long ago we heard from those Benches that the land was not sufficiently rated. That, of course, meant that the tenant farmers were not sufficiently rated. What has weighed with me is, if I understand the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board correctly, the intention of the Government to deal with this question as a whole. Of course, we know that is the intention of the Government, but we are nearing the end of this Parliament, and consequently the statement must be taken with a certain degree of caution. If I can be assured that this is not a mere dangling of the subject, but that it is the intention of the Government to look into it in a wide sense when a suitable occasion arises, then I shall support the Government. Of course, we know what Gentlemen opposite will do; they are pledged to go into this matter, and if I have the honour to be in the House I will, under certain circumstances, remind them of that pledge.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): The hon. Member (Mr. Gray) has said that he would be satisfied if the Government would indicate their intention to deal with the subject in a large way on some future and suitable occasion; but he has not even received that paltry assurance. As far as I can make out the Government admit the principle, but do not deem this a proper occasion for carrying it into practice. This, they say, is not a convenient time. Why?

As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby pointed out, this is a perfectly new burden, and I hope my hon. Friend will go to a Division on the Amendment, as this is the only opportunity we shall have of expressing our view as to how the rates should be imposed.

(5.5.) SIR R. PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I regret that this question should have been raised in connection with the present Bill. The whole thing is an experiment, and I think it should be conducted at the expense of the State, and not at the expense of any one class of owners of property. As a matter of principle, I am in favour of the equalisation of rates between owner and occupier; but the question now to be considered is, Is this a convenient occasion to deal with the matter? Something has been said about a convenient occasion by hon. Members opposite, and I should like to ask whether the present time is more convenient to deal with this question of the division of rates than was 1870, when the educational rate was introduced? I maintain that if ever there was a time when the rates should have been divided it was when the Liberal Government brought in their Education Bill. I am afraid hon. Members on the other side of the House have lost sight of the clause as it stands. The first section imposes on the County Council the duty of fixing the purchase-money or rent at such a reasonable amount as will, in their opinion, guard against loss. County Councils are, therefore, bound to take care that their ratepayers are not saddled with a loss. It will be seen, too, that the maximum amount of the rate fixed by this Bill is a penny in the pound, and there is every probability that the rate levied will be very much less, perhaps only a farthing in the pound. I venture to say that the cost of collection and account-keeping connected with the division of so small a rate would be more trouble and expense than it is worth, and on this ground I shall oppose the Amendment.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I should like to point out that the farmers have a double grievance in this case, inasmuch as every penny they pay will be appropriated for the purpose of endowing a class of persons who will compete with them in the ordinary markets. The farmer will not only be handicapped, but he will have to pay the expense of the handicap. I submit that there is no sort of parallel between this case and the educational rate, because in the latter instance no body of ratepayers were paying to create a class of men that would be their direct competitors in business. We cannot have a case that constitutes a greater hardship than this, and I think it is one Parliament ought to deal with.

MR. MARK J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): It is a fallacy to say that this rate will be entirely paid by the tenant farmers. I contend that inasmuch as in Scotland the occupier and the landlord share the rates, no real burden will be imposed upon the farmers. Besides, I am satisfied that the tenant farmers in Scotland will consider this as for the national benefit, and that they will not object to pay any additional rate of a trifling character.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): The hon. Member who has just spoken says that in Scotland the rates are divided between the owner and occupier. That is not so in England, and considering this Act applies to both countries, the English farmers, under those circumstances, will be at a disadvantage as compared with the Scotch, and that we do not wish to be the case. The hon. Baronet's reference to the Education Act of 1870 is altogether misleading, because that Act applied to England only. But I should like to point out that public opinion has advanced during the past twenty-two years, although some hon. Members opposite have remained stagnant. Opportunities have occurred during the present Parliament to deal with this question. It was brought forward in connection with the Local Government Bill of 1888, but it was rejected notwithstanding the expressed desire of the Party opposite to deal with the question.

*MR. CHAPLIN: The tenant farmers are to be congratulated on their new-found champion, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt). I notice his support is generally forthcoming when he thinks he can inflict some injury on his opponents. I do not rise, however, for the purpose of dwelling upon the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but to reply to the hon. Member for Essex (Mr. Gray). And I may say that I have my right hon. Friend's (Mr. Ritchie's) authority for saying that the Government are prepared to consider and adopt this principle, and that the occasion upon which they do so will be, no doubt, to use the language of the hon. Member himself, a suitable occasion. I may add that it is the wish of the Government that the whole subject of the revision of rates should be considered and dealt with by Parliament. We have been asked when it will be a convenient occasion to deal with this question. Well, my right hon. Friend has pointed out that this question cannot be dealt with alone, as it involves the question of representation as well, and he has pointed out, too, the difficulty of separating this particular fractional rate from other rates. I think that is a conclusive reply to those hon. Gentlemen who ask if this is not a fitting occasion to deal with this particular matter.

(5.17.) MR. SEALE - HAYNE: I should like to reply to one or two objections that have been urged on the other side of the House against considering this question at the present time. And let me say, first of all, that it never is a convenient time for the Party opposite to carry out a reform of any kind. That is a commonplace which need not occupy us for a moment. It is said that this rate would be a small and infinitesimal burden. If so, why not agree to my Amendment? It appears to me that that is not a valid argument. Then it has been said by an hon. Member opposite that the Liberal Government did not divide the education rate. In 1870 this question had not been considered, the Royal Commission and the Select Committee had not reported in its favour, and therefore at that time it was by no means ripe for solution. But, Sir, there was an occasion when it might have been considered, but when it was refused consideration by the present Government and by the Conservative Party. When the Local Government Bill was passing through this House, the hon. Member for Northampton moved an Amendment for this special purpose, but the Government did not find that a convenient occasion. They did not support that Amendment, and I say that under the circumstances they are not entitled to twit the Liberal Government of 1870 with not dividing the educational rate. The main argument in favour of the division of the rate in this case is that you are going to tax the tenant farmer in order to provide him with a competitor, a step which I feel sure he will warmly resent.

Question put.

(5.20.) The House divided:—Ayes 133; Noes 203.—(Div. List, No. 127.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 12.

*MR. HOBHOUSE: I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name. Under the Local Government Act the borrowing power of the County Council is restricted to one-tenth of the annual rateable value of the county. Under this Bill the County Council will be able to raise, under Clause 11, the sum of £104 for every £1,000 of annual rateable value. The figures were given me by the right hon. Gentleman himself, and the effect of those figures is that if the County Council exercises to the full its powers under this Bill they can borrow rather more than one-tenth of the annual rateable value. If they borrowed that sum for the purposes of the Bill they would be unable to borrow for any other purpose whatever without a Provisional Order or Act of Parliament. I should like to know if the President of the Local Government Board desires to put them in that position, or if he will accept my Amendment, which provides that the borrowing powers under this Act shall not affect the limit of borrowing powers under the Local Government Act.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 26, at end, add "Provided that money borrowed under this Act shall not be reckoned as part of the total debt of a county for the purpose of section sixty-nine, sub-section two, of 'The Local Government Act, 1888.'"

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*MR. RITCHIE: I see no strong objection to the proposal of my hon. Friend; but, at the same time, I do not think it is necessary, for I can hardly conceive that the very large powers of borrowing possessed by the County Councils under the Local Government Act are likely within a reasonable distance of time to be exhausted. It must be remembered that the County Councils are not like Sanitary and Urban Authorities, which require to borrow large sums for many purposes. If, however, the Committee are of opinion that the Amendment is desirable, we do not offer any strong opposition to it, though we do not think that the large amount they can now borrow is not likely to be sufficient.

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I hope the Government will not give way in this matter, because it is very undesirable to extend the borrowing power of the County Council.

*MR. HOBHOUSE: I am afraid I did not make my case clear to the House. The Bill has sanctioned special borrowing powers for new and important purposes, and these powers if fully exercised will amount in every county to more than one-tenth of the total annual rateable value, and that is the limit of the borrowing powers for all purposes under the Local Government Act. Do the Committee intend that the borrowing power under this Bill should not only be restricted by the limit of a penny in the pound, but should also be restricted to the amount left over between the actual debt of the county as it exists and the one-tenth of the annual rateable value? If that is not the intention of the Committee, these or some such words are necessary to enable the County Council to raise the sum which on the face of the Bill they are authorised to raise for this special purpose. I agree that the County Councils are not like Sanitary and Urban Authorities — desirous of raising large sums for many purposes; but this is an entirely new purpose, and if the Committee think it is important that small holdings should be created in large numbers it is obvious that the County Council must have power to raise large sums, and I only wished to make it clear that they would have such borrowing powers as appear on the face of the Bill. At present if the County Council exercised their full powers under the Bill and then wanted to build an asylum or do some other work they could not raise the money without a Provisional Order or Act of Parliament. The other day the right hon. Gentleman received a deputation from the County Councils complaining of the delay in issuing loans under the present system. Much greater delays may be expected in the future if they have to get Provisional Orders or Acts of Parliament to enable them to borrow.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I hope the Government will accept the Amendment, which appears to me to be a common-sense one. Evidently the total borrowing power of County Councils under the Local Government Act was fixed with regard to the purposes contemplated at that time. Now a new purpose has been created and a new obligation placed on the County Council, and surely to the extent of that new purpose and obligation the borrowing power should be extended.

MR. CHAPLIN: As I gather that in certain instances the difficulties referred to might arise, I will accept the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: The Amendment I have now to move is to leave out the words which empower the Public Works Loan Commissioners to charge interest at the rate of not less than £3 2s. 6d. per cent. I propose to leave out that minimum sum, which will enable the Commissioners to advance money for the purposes of this Bill at a lower rate if the Treasury authorise them to do so. As the clause stands, though the Commissioners might have a disposition to lend at three per cent., they would be unable to do so; they would be compelled to charge more than they borrowed at, and the rate-payers would have to be overtaxed to that extent. There would be absolute protection in the clause as amended.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 32, to leave out from the word "interest," to the word "as," in line 33.—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Mr. Hobhouse

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: The terms of the clause were settled by arrangement between the Treasury and myself. In the absence of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I cannot accept an Amendment altering the terms of the clause as it is in the Bill.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider it between this and Report?

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I also had an Amendment down to strike out these words, but I wanted to substitute the words "two pounds fifteen shillings" for them. It appears to me that the money ought to be advanced to the County Council at that rate, especially when we remember that the rate fixed in the Irish Land Purchase Act was £2 15s. per cent. I think I am right in claiming for England, Scotland, and Wales that they shall have money advanced to them at the same rate as it is advanced to the Irish tenant.

MR. CHAPLIN: I should be glad to see that rate of interest put in the Bill; but if the hon. Gentleman can persuade the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept it, his eloquence must be more persuasive than mine. I will undertake to confer with my right hon. Friend on the question but it is open to the local authorities to borrow in any other quarter they may please if they can obtain money cheaper than they can from the Treasury.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Do I understand that the right hon. Gentleman will leave the matter open till Report? It is a very important one.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am satisfied with the promise of the right hon. Gentleman, but I hope he will press on the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, in the case of the Irish Land Act, for Irish purposes £2 15s. was put in as the minimum. Now, we are dealing with English Local Authorities, and I defy anybody to find better security than the rates of English Local Authorities. If it is safe and proper in Ireland to allow loans at £2 15s., I cannot conceive why, with such securities as the Bill affords, English Local Authorities should have to pay higher interest.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: If the clause passes as it stands, will it be competent to take out these words on Report? We do not ask that any other words should be put in, but simply to leave the matter to the discretion of the Loan Commissioners.

MR. MORTON: The hon. Gentleman says we do not want to put in  $2\frac{3}{4}$  per cent., but I do, and I shall insist on it so far as I can. The security offered by England, Scotland, and Wales is better than that offered by Ireland.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I think, in the case of Ireland, there was no power to loan at  $2\frac{3}{4}$  per cent., but Irish Land Stock at  $2\frac{3}{4}$  was created; that is not so good as the English Stock. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not give way on the point till he has conferred with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

(5.50.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: As I understand that the right hon. Gentleman will take the matter into consideration after he has conferred with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I beg leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 8, line 1, after the word "county," to insert the words—"shall be defrayed out of the county rate, and the expenses incurred by the Council of a county."—(Mr. Stephens.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(5.52.) MR. CHAPLIN: It is already provided by Sub-section (2) of the clause:—

"The Public Works Loan Commissioners may, in manner provided by the Public Works Loans Act, 1875, lend any money which may be borrowed by a County Council for the purposes of this Act."

MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): I beg to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

NEW CLAUSES.

(5.53.) MR. CHAPLIN: I beg to move to insert the following clause:—

(Registration of title to small holdings, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 87, s. 118.)

"(1.) When a County Council have sold a small holding to a purchaser under this Act, they shall apply for his registration as the proprietor thereof under 'The Land Transfer Act, 1875,' and thereupon the purchaser shall, without further inquiry, be registered under that Act as proprietor of the land with an absolute title, subject only to such incumbrances as may be specified in the application; but such registration shall not affect the remedy against the County Council of any person claiming by title paramount to the County Council; (2.) rules under 'The Land Transfer Act, 1875,' may (a) adapt that Act to the registration of small holdings, with such modifications as appear to be required; and (b) on the application and at the expense of a County Council provide, by the appointment of local agents or otherwise, for carrying into effect the objects of this section."

New Clause brought up, and read the first and second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be added to the Bill."

*(5.54.) MR. HOBHOUSE: I am sure all of us who are interested in the registration question are very much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for having acceded to our request, and put a clause of this kind in the Bill. But I would appeal to him whether he thinks it really advisable to put the County Council to the expense and trouble of making special applications, and to the expense of paying for local agents. It is clear to most of us that some local machinery will have to be provided, if this part of the Land Transfer Act is to work at all.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member make any Motion?

*MR. HOBHOUSE: Yes, I beg to move, in the new clause, to leave out the words "on the application and at the expense of a County Council."

Amendment proposed, in new clause, to leave out the words, "on the application and at the expense of a County Council."—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed new Clause."

(5.55.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I am not sure that I agree with my hon. Friend who has just spoken. I rather think the clause as it stands is quite right. There are two alternatives which might be adopted. You might take the general provisions under the Act which enables you to create district registries, or you might take the Act as it works in London, and make special provisions for applying it to the local districts by making the local offices have the duty of transferring everything to London. And the latter alternative is what the Government have adopted. Before I sit down I should like to say a word about this clause. I am sure we all feel that it is a very good step in advance so far as it goes, because it is the first time that registration of title in England has been made compulsory. The Act of 1875 did not work because of its voluntary character, and the right hon. Gentleman has taken a great step in advance in making registration of title compulsory under this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman is doing nothing revolutionary, because last year in a case under the Irish Land Bill there was a supplementary Act passed introducing compulsory registration into Ireland. This clause is an immense improvement, and a great advance on anything we had, and I think the Committee is under an obligation to the right hon. Gentleman, and also to the hon. Member for Stamford, who was the person who first put this subject down on the Paper. The hon. Member for Stamford (Mr. Cust) took the alternative mode of making use of the Act as it exists in London, without the creation of district registries, and in that way without any change of machinery providing for transfer at a very small cost. I understand that a transfer can take place under this arrangement at a cost of about something like a shilling an acre, which is a very great improvement on existing regulations. Therefore, I think we must all regard this as a great step forward in the conveyancing law of this country.

(6.1.) Mr. RATHBONE: I quite agree with my hon. and learned Friend that we are under an obligation to the right hon. Gentleman for what he has done. Not being a lawyer, I wish to ask one question. Am I to understand that under this clause no proprietor will be obliged to go to London and employ a lawyer to register and transfer his title; and are successive owners to be compelled to register their titles?

Mr. HENEAGE: Having raised this question on Clause 5, I, for one, am very much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman on account of having done so much as he has done, and I think we must all regard this Registration Clause as very satisfactory. But I do not see anything in the clause which will enable the original purchaser to transfer his land free of cost, except through a new conveyance, unless rules are made. If at the present time there are no rules in existence, unless such rules are made there is nothing in the clause which will enable the original purchaser to transfer his land free of cost when the property changes hands.

SIR R. WEBSTER: With reference to the first part of the question of the hon. Member for Carnarvon (Mr. Rathbone), and in reply to the hon. Member for Somerset (Mr. Hobhouse), who has moved this Amendment, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane), has stated, there were two alternatives which might have been adopted in this matter; either to create district registries under the general provisions of the Act, or to take the Act as it worked in London, and make special provisions for applying it to the local districts. We have adopted the latter alternative. If there is not a large number of applications there will be no necessity for making any special rules. I conceive that the right course has been followed. In every instance the County Council is to provide the local machinery contemplated by Sub-section B of the Land Transfer Act. In reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage), as to the expense required to be incurred in the case of a second or third transfer, that, of course, will depend upon whether the original owner of the land has in any way dealt with the land in the way of burdening it or mortgaging it, or anything of that kind. It is necessary, as hon. Members will understand in a scheme of this kind, that in the first place the transfer should be registered. The first owner of the land is to be bound to register as the proprietor, and then he will have for all practical purposes an absolute title. Then, if there is any more done in the way of the transfer of that land, of course it will be done without the intervention of a lawyer; and rules would be provided whereby the questions of form would be settled at once. As to the question of expense, I think it would be unwise to leave out a portion of Sub-section B of the Act, as has been suggested.

SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I think we are all very much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for the course which he has taken in this case. With reference to the questions raised by the hon. Member for Carnarvon and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby, I suppose what will happen will be this: If any owner wishes to transfer his land he will have to go to the local agent of the Land Transfer Department, and the local agent of the Land Transfer Department will see that his transfer is registered in London in the proper registry. That appears to me to be just as good a course to take, though, of course, it may not be as speedy, as if statutory district registries were established for the purpose in the country. I am not very fond of legislating by rules, and though I do not wish to make any Motion or Amendment at this moment, I would call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the point, and I think he will agree with me that if it should be necessary—though I do not say at this moment it is, for I do not know—that a rule should be framed, it should in some way be in accordance with the Act.

MR. RATHBONE: I did not quite understand whether the second part of my question had been answered. I understand that rules will be made, but will those rules provide that the successive owners shall be compelled to register their titles?

SIR R. WEBSTER: Certainly.

SIR H. DAVEY: The Act of Parliament does it.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider the point, for we have a system of registration in Scotland which I believe is more advanced than the system in England.

SIR R. PAGET: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it would be possible to provide by rules for an Ordnance map being recognised for the purpose of land registration?

SIR R. WEBSTER: With regard to Scotch registration, I would ask to be allowed to speak to the Lord Advocate upon the point. I have some general knowledge of the registration law of Scotland, but I am not au fait with the details. I rather understood from what I was told that no alteration would be required, but I will communicate with the Lord Advocate on the matter. With regard to the question put to me by my hon. Friend behind (Sir R. Paget) as to the use of the Ordnance map, I will say that I think the time is coming, and approaching very rapidly, when an Ordnance map will be recognised officially, and will be used for the land registry and for land surveying. But I think it is too much for me to say that the rule shall make an Ordnance map, without the sanction of Parliament, sufficient evidence. I think that would be an instance of which the right hon. Gentleman (Sir H. Davey) would have reason to complain of the rules going too far. Of course, use can be made of an Ordnance map already to some extent; but to ask that it should be made final and conclusive evidence would be going too far.

MR. HALDANE: I think some words are necessary providing that it should not apply to Scotland. It is a perfectly general scheme at present.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I think there is no objection to insert the words "County Council in England."

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: There is a point on which my right hon. Friend has not answered the hon. and learned Gentleman, and I, therefore, beg again to ask him the question. In paragraph B of Sub-section 2 of the clause it is provided that rules may,

"On the application and at the expense of a County Council, provide by the appointment of local agents or otherwise for carrying into effect the objects of this section."

What we want to ask is this: Do the Government undertake that in every case they shall provide some means by which the registration may be taken locally, because the clause does not say so?

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON: I entirely agree that it is better that the clause should remain as it stands under existing conditions, although in theory I think it might be better it should be amended. It is quite obvious from this discussion that a great deal of the value of this clause will depend upon the nature of the rules made under this Act. It may be possible, on account of our Parliamentary usage, that the rules made by the Lord Chancellor may not be laid on the Table before the passing of the Act, and I would ask whether it is not possible for the Attorney General or the President of the Board of Agriculture, by some means or other, to communicate to this House, before the Report stage, what the nature and what the purport of those rules may be.

SIR R. WEBSTER: It would be very rash to give any such promise as that. The rules will require to be carefully considered. They must be analogous to the well known rules now existing, and I cannot help thinking to endeavour beforehand to give their general scope and purport might lay us open to the observation that we did not communicate some necessary part. In reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, it is distinctly an intention that the registrations shall be carried out locally, and if these words do not restrict the clause to that, my right hon. Friend will certainly see that proper words are inserted. "Locally or otherwise" might mean that the agent need not be a person appointed ad hoc. Some difficulty might arise in the case of the County Council not having sufficient work to be done to justify the appointment of a local agent.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON: My suggestion was not that the exact words of the rules should be placed before the House, but that the general purport should be placed before it.

(6.15.) VISCOUNT EBRINGTON (Devon, Tavistock): Is there anything in the proposed rules to provide for the cost of the transfer of land? It is very important that the cost of transferring these small holdings by any future deed should not be heavy.

SIR R. WEBSTER: In the Land Transfer Act there is provision for fees. The fees for transfer after the first registration are extremely small, and I never heard any one complain of them.

MR. HOBHOUSE: After the discussion that has taken place, I ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be added to the Bill."

COMMANDER BETHELL: It is possible that laymen like myself may be under a misapprehension as to this clause, and I therefore would ask the Attorney General whether it will be necessary after this registration of the land for all fresh mortgages to be entered upon the register? If it is possible to do that by rules, then I think it should be done.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I am afraid that in answering another hon. Member on the opposite side of the House I have not clearly replied to my hon. and gallant Friend. The clause states:

"The purchaser shall, without further inquiry, be registered under that Act as proprietor of the land with an absolute title, subject only to such incumbrances as may be specified in the application."

Therefore subsequent dealings with the land by way of mortgage must be registered in order that the mortgage may be valid. Of course it is quite possible that a man may attempt to deal with his land without registration, but there would not be effective security without registration. All legal mortgages and proper incumbrances should appear on the register.

COMMANDER BETHELL: I gather from my hon. and learned Friend that the charges made after the first transaction will be very small, and that there will be very little necessity for the intervention of a lawyer. That leads me to ask this question about mortgages: Will a mortgage upon the land be valid if it is not registered?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I think it would not be valid unless properly registered. What I desired to say about the intervention of a lawyer was this. I do not mean to say that under all circumstances no lawyer would be required. There might be deaths, there might be intestacies, there might be an uncertainty as to the person entitled to the property, there might be a variety of matters about which I am the last person in the world to suggest that there should be no intervention by a lawyer; but the intention of the Government is that under ordinary circumstances of transfer the simple registration will be carried out locally and at comparatively small expense.

MR. CRAWFORD: I see that the Lord Advocate is now present, and I should like to repeat my question about the application of this clause to Scotland. It is quite obvious that it is inapplicable as it stands to Scotland, for the Land Transfer Act, 1875, does not apply to that country. It is highly desirable that this expeditious form of registration of title should exist in Scotland to facilitate the transfer of land, and we should all welcome a similar clause for Scotland. That can be done on Report. But I will in the meantime move to add at the end of the new clause these words, "This clause shall not apply to Scotland."

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Question has been put, "That this clause be added to the Bill," and it is now too late to move that Amendment.

(6.20.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I would point out that the question has been put, and the discussion has come to an end. I will, however, promise that if the clause should be found inapplicable to Scotland, it shall receive careful consideration hereafter.

MR. ROWNTREE: I am sure the Attorney General will admit that the system introduced into this Bill is practically non-existent in this country, and that those who are best entitled to speak upon it are opposed to legislation by rule.

(6.22.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not think I can make any such admissions as the hon. Gentleman desires. There are rules in existence at the present time which were framed under the Land Transfer Act, and all that the Committee have to do is to make such additional rules as are necessary to enable the transfer to be carried out locally. The new rules could not, however, be framed before the Report. I think this matter may properly be left to the rule-making authorities.

SIR H. DAVEY: I share the dislike that has been expressed by the hon. Member for Scarborough to legislation by rule, and so far as it lies in my power I will protest against it. On the present occasion, however, I think that the clause, which is a very important one, should be passed. I hope that my Friend the Attorney General will look into the matter, as I myself intend to do, with the object of ascertaining before the Report stage of the Bill what is the extent of the rule-making power. If he cannot then satisfy the House upon the subject, and I am unable to do so, I will take the liberty of calling attention to it again on Report.

Question put, and agreed to.

New Clause—

(Register to be kept by County Council.)

"Every County Council shall keep a register of the owners and occupiers of small holdings sold or let by them, and a map or plan showing the size, boundaries, and situation of each small holding so sold or let,"

—brought up, read the first and second time, and added to the Bill.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved—

In page 4, after Clause 6, to insert the following Clauses:—

(Public Inquiry by County Council where glebes offered for sale.)

"Where notice shall be given by the Board of Agriculture of the intended sale of any glebe under the Glebe Lands Act of 1888, the County Council within whose district the glebe is situate shall direct a public inquiry to be held in the parish in which such glebe is situate as to the suitability of the same for sale or leasing in small holdings under this Act, as to the need of small holdings in such parish, and the desire of the cottagers, labourers, and others to purchase or hire plots of lands for such purpose, and also in the event of the land being unsuitable for such purpose, as to the possibility of exchanging it for other land in the neighbourhood suitable for such purpose.

If the County Council after public inquiry shall be of opinion that any glebe which the Board of Agriculture shall propose for sale within their district is suitable for small holdings, or may be exchanged for other land suitable for such purpose, and that there is a demand for the same in the parish or district in which the glebe is situate, they may inform the Board of Agriculture that they desire to purchase the glebe, and the Board of Agriculture shall thereupon sell the glebe to such County Council for such price as may be agreed upon between them, being not less than the fair value of the same, and if no agreement shall be come to, then for such price as may be determined on under the Land Clauses Act.

Where a County Council shall have acquired any glebe with the object of exchanging the same for any land suitable for small holdings, they may hold the same until they are able to effect the exchange, and the cost of effecting the exchange shall be part of the costs of acquisition of such land for the purpose of this Act."

This is a question which has often occupied the attention of the House. I find that out of 131 cases in which glebe land has been offered for sale, in not fewer than 112 instances has it passed into the hands of the powerful landowners of the district. Only three plots have been sold to labouring people. Thus the intention of the Glebe Lands Act, 1888, has not been carried out. I have taken pains to ascertain why this failure has occurred, and it appears that not sufficient notice has been given of the intended sales to enable the people of the district in which they were to take place to come forward as purchasers. The only information previously given, so far as I am aware, is by means of notices posted on the church doors and at the post offices. I have been told by many people that numerous cases have occurred in which no inquiry has been made, and no notice given to the people of the district in which the sales were to take place. It is to rectify this, to facilitate the creation of small holdings, and to see that the Act of 1888 is carried properly into effect, that I move the insertion of the clause.

New Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(6.33.) MR. CHAPLIN: I am bound to admit that only a small number of the glebes sold since the passing of the Glebes Act has gone into the hands of the class of small holders. The right hon. Gentleman attributes the failure of the Act entirely to the fact that there was not sufficient publicity given to these sales; but I state this as a positive fact, that in accordance with the terms of Clause 1 of the Act, in every single instance glebes have been offered in the first instance in small parcels for the purposes in question, or to the Local Authority for the purposes of allotments. What further publicity can be given I do not know. The right hon. Gentleman proposes, in the first of his new clauses, that there shall be a public inquiry; and in the second, that if upon that inquiry there is found to be a demand for small holdings, the Local Authority are to inform the Board of Agriculture that they desire to purchase the glebe, and that the Board shall—not may—thereupon sell the glebe to the Council at a price agreed upon between themselves. Suppose they do not agree on the price, what is to happen then? It appears to me the effect of the clause will either to limit the market, and thereby to injure the sale of the glebe, or to injuriously affect the income of the incumbent, or else the clause will have no effect whatever. Then, again, I am afraid that the inquiry called for by the right hon. Gentleman would be very expensive, and by whom is the expense to be borne? Is it to be borne by the glebe, or by the Local Authority, or by whom does the right hon. Gentleman propose the expense shall be borne? I admit the object he has in view is a good one; it is unfortunate that glebes when sold should not be used in larger proportion for this particular purpose, but I do not see anything in the clauses of the right hon. Gentleman which would remedy the state of things. I am rather inclined to believe that if we were to pass clauses in the form they are presented they would not encourage the sale of the land for this purpose—they would have a contrary effect. The mere passing of this Bill will probably have the effect that people will have greater opportunities for the acquisition of land for this purpose than ever before, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that it would be well to allow the Bill to pass without these new clauses, and we should see the effect of it, and then if we find that further reform is desired in regard to glebe lands I shall be very glad to consider a proposal on the subject.

*(6.39.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM: From my own knowledge I can confirm what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford has said that the failure of the Glebe Lands Act, in so far as it was intended to promote the creation of small holdings, has been largely due to the manner in which sales have been effected. The clause proposed by my right hon. Friend would be most valuable; it would allow a County Council to take glebe where the parson wants to sell, and has expressed to the Board of Agriculture his readiness to sell, and if that land should not be exactly suitable for small holdings, the Council may acquire it and then, by exchange, get land which is suitable for the purpose. From our point of view, I see no objection to the clause. It might possibly diminish the price of the land, says the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin). What, diminish the price to bring in another competing purchaser in the shape of the County Council? How could you diminish the price by increasing the demand? I think it will be much more likely to promote the sales of glebe, and at the same time further the object of this Bill, for land is often more likely to be acquired in this way than by asking a landowner to split up his estate. I hope my right hon. Friend will persevere with his proposal, and take the opinion of the Committee upon it.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) has discussed the second clause as well as the first. I only discussed the first clause. The first and most important point is that there should be a public inquiry in the parish prior to the sale of the glebe—an inquiry in which the whole circumstances of the land and the condition of the people would be investigated, and in which the labourers in the district would be adequately informed of the intentions of Parliament and the offer of the sale of the land for the purposes of this Bill. That I hold to be of the highest importance. I do not think there need be any expense whatever. All that would be necessary would be that an agent of the County Council should go to the parish and hold an inquiry, inform the people of the intended sale, explain the provisions of the Glebe Lands Act, and of this Bill when passed into law; give, in fact, full explanation of the facilities offered under the two Acts for the acquisition of glebe for the purpose of creating small holdings. There would be no expense whatever to the Local Authority, beyond that involved in sending a single agent to hold a single inquiry. That is all that is proposed by my first clause, which of course, if the Committee accepts, I shall follow up with the next clause. But this first clause has simply for its object a public inquiry and explanation from the labourers of the district of the intentions of Parliament in relation to the sale of glebe lands. At present the people have no information; the whole thing is conducted in a "hole-and-corner" manner; the glebe is sold without any public inquiry or the people for whom the sale was intended having any knowledge of the sale or any opportunity of bidding for the land.

MR. ARTHUR H. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): Is the only objection of the President of the Board of Agriculture on the ground of expense? He must be aware that inquiries, such as are contemplated, can be conducted at very little expense. I do not see that he has made any objection to the first clause but the expense. Is that so?

*MR. CHAPLIN: I think I may meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman in this way. Whenever there is a sale of glebe, notice shall be given by the Board of Agriculture to the Local Authority, and the Local Authority being aware that the sale is about to occur, it will be perfectly within its competence to conduct such an inquiry as the right hon. Gentleman proposes. If that will meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman I shall be prepared to agree to a clause of that kind.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I think inquiry ought to be obligatory on the part of the Local Authority. In the past glebe lands have been sold, and they are now being sold without the people of the parish having any notice of the sale or of the intention of Parliament. It must be the duty of the Local Authority to direct an inquiry on the spot and supply all information. I should not feel satisfied with a merely permissive clause.

COLONEL GUNTER (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkstone Ash): A notice is posted on the church door, and the matter comes before the local Sanitary Board, who are bound to inquire into the particulars before any sale can take place. I speak from experience as Chairman of a Sanitary Board, and I know that every possible information is given to labourers and everybody around before glebe land is sold. There is no difficulty in any person interested finding out all about it.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The answer to that is that there are Boards of Guardians who are known to be intensely hostile to the carrying out of the Allotments Act, and have not performed their duty in the past in respect to glebe lands.

SIR R. PAGET: If the right hon. Gentleman were a little more acquainted with the manners and customs in rural parishes, he would be aware that if there is one thing which is spread abroad and becomes known in every village household it is the fact of glebe land being about to be sold. I defy anybody, if he desired, to conceal the information—it becomes known at once. It would be an altogether useless expense to insist upon a County Council inquiry in every case as to whether the land is suitable, and if there is any demand for small holdings.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 106; Noes 183.—(Div. List, No. 128.)

It being after ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to Amendments to Short Titles Bill [Lords] without Amendment.

Statute Law Revision,—That they have come to the following Resolution, viz. :—

“That it is desirable that the Statute Law Revision Bill be referred to the Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament on Statute Law Revision.”

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

To which Resolution they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That three be the Quorum of the Joint Committee of Lords and Commons on Statute Law Revision.—(Mr. Solicitor General.)

BALLOT ACT (ILLITERATE VOTE).

RESOLUTION.

*(9.3.) MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): The Resolution of which I have given notice, and which there is now an opportunity to discuss, deals with a subject which I have on previous occasions endeavoured to bring before the attention of the House. I wish to have the proper remedy applied to the evils which arise under the present system of dealing with the illiterate vote. The reasons why, when the Ballot Act was passed, provision was made for allowing illiterate persons to vote, are set forth in the discussions upon the Bill, and Mr. Forster stated that all he wanted to secure was that a man should not be disfranchised because he could not read. This I am ready to admit is commendable, but in practice the effect of the provision for the illiterate vote has been to defeat the object of the Ballot Act. Looking over the record of the proceedings of the Committee which sat on that Act, I find that a Motion similar to that in my name was made by an hon. and gallant Gentleman still a Member of this House, and who then was Captain Nolan. He moved—

“That all special provisions for the assistance of the illiterate voter should be omitted, and that no voters save those labouring under some physical disability should receive assistance in making out their ballot papers.”

This Motion was put before the Committee which considered the operation of the Ballot Act, and I find it was carried by a majority of nine to six, that majority being principally made up of Members of the Liberal Party. Remembering this, I think I may fairly look for support for my Motion now to the other side of the House. The majority on that occasion included the late Mr. W. E. Forster and the right hon. Gentleman now the Member for Bury (Sir H. James), the only Conservative Member being Mr. Sampson Lloyd. I mention this as indicating that the proposal is not put forward with a Conservative view; the object of the Motion is to purify the source from which we on either side derive our right to sit here—to secure absolute freedom for electors to vote for whom they choose. The then Attorney General declared the purpose of the Ballot Act was to secure electors from coercion and intimidation; but I fear very much that the Ballot Act, good as it is, useful as it is, though no doubt it protects the elector from landlord intimidation, does under cover of this provision for illiterate voters let in influences which detract from the secrecy and security it was the intention of Parliament to confer. I think I can show that, especially in Ireland, the secrecy of the ballot is violated, and the free opinion of constituencies sometimes—I do not say it is general—sometimes, and very often, misrepresented and thwarted. From the Return laid before the House after the last General Election we find that of the total number of electors who then voted the proportions of illiterates were: In England one in sixty-four, in Scotland one in seventy-four only, whereas in Ireland there was the remarkable condition of things that one out of every five voters declared himself illiterate. The actual figures were 194,994 voters, and 36,722 of these claimed to be illiterate. There is a Return of a more recent date which the House was pleased to grant at my request, showing the results in bye-elections since the General Election in Great Britain and Ireland; and here I find that out of 86,470 votes given in England only 870 were illiterate, in Scotland twenty-nine out of 5,142; but in Ireland, according to one Return, there were out of 9,872, 2,173 illiterate votes given, or, according to another Return, 2,500. I may explain two Returns were given because, in the first instance, a Returning Officer at one of the polling stations where the illiterate vote was greatest omitted to return a full list of the illiterate votes. In some parts of Ireland the figures from the General Election Return show a strange position of affairs. Out of eighteen thousand voters in the four divisions of County Donegal, nearly half—7,900—claimed to vote as illiterate. In North and South Monaghan twelve thousand persons voted—2,300 as illiterate. In North and South Derry 9,300 voted—2,253 as illiterate. In Tyrone 26,700 voted, and 6,957 claimed to vote as being illiterate. It is a significant fact which I cannot leave unnoticed—and I have received a letter to-night which emphasises the fact—that from the constituencies where the proportion of illiterate voting is largest, we find hon. Gentlemen returned as Home Rule Members; and on the other hand, in the constituencies returning Unionist Members the illiterate vote is not so large. I do not believe, I cannot bring myself to believe, that these figures represent the true state of education and knowledge among the people of Ireland. If it were a true evidence of the state of knowledge in Ireland, it would point the necessity for a more stringent measure of compulsory education. It would afford a striking commentary on the fitness of the country for Home Rule if the members of the various sections of the Party supporting the principle they were so unwilling to discuss this day week were returned by constituencies a fourth of whom were illiterate. But I do not believe this is the true condition of affairs; this is a pretended illiteracy, and it is due to totally different causes than want of elementary education. I have a number of letters here from candidates for Irish constituencies, and they all show the pressure put upon every doubtful voter to declare himself illiterate. Here is a letter from a Roman Catholic candidate for one of the Midland constituencies, in which he states that the election agent informed the voter that he was to declare himself illiterate, and he was given to understand his vote would be identified. A Leinster candidate says that in every polling booth there was a prominent National League agent or personation agent, and under the provisions for illiterate voting secrecy was destroyed in hundreds of cases. In some places, the candidate writes, the presence of the National League agent beside the presiding officer was sufficient to prevent the illiterate voter from giving his vote with the confidence of secrecy. A candidate in one of the Connaught constituencies says few of the electors knew who they were going to vote for. Some said, "for Parnell," others said, "for the priest." Several were allowed in the booth at one time, and there was very little secrecy. The presence of political agents to whom the voters were well known had an influence, to use no stronger word, over every illiterate voter recording his vote. I could give from the letters of Unionist candidates many statements of this kind, but I may also refer to an authority which hon. Members opposite may consider of more value. The newspaper United Ireland, on January 3rd, 1891, in commenting on the North Kilkenny election, said that priests acted as agents for Sir John Pope Hennessy at the approaches to the polling stations, and every illiterate voter was obliged to declare in their presence the candidate whom he wished to vote for; priests led the voters to the booth, by priests they were received inside, and in the presence of the clergy did the voter record his vote for Sir John Pope Hennessy. An intolerable state of things. What would have been said if, in an election at Kilkenny before the Land Act of 1881, the landlords had so acted, if they through their agents had ordered tenants to plead illiteracy and declare the candidate for whom they voted? Would not the country have rung with the denunciations from Gentlemen who call themselves Nationalists? On the authority of this same newspaper, United Ireland, it is said that at every polling booth the personation agents were Roman Catholic agents, that there is a complete list of them in Sir John Pope Hennessy's handwriting, and that many of these agents used language towards the voters which, if exposed to the world, would be visited with severe condemnation from the ecclesiastical authorities. Intimidation does not come from one source in Irish elections. At a recent election in Waterford, intimidation by means of this illiterate voters' provision came not from the Catholic priesthood, but from an entirely different source—from the mob. Thus we learn, on the authority of the Daily News of 24th December, 1891, that by noon more than half the expected total had been polled, and at that time large crowds collected round the polling booths intimidating many voters by the display of party feeling, and that this had a great effect on the illiterate voters. So the present Member for the constituency was returned by a large majority. But care not whence the intimidation comes—from the National League, from the priesthood, from the crowd, or from any other source; if it exists, if you allow the illiterate portion of the electorate to be influenced thereby owing to this special privilege, then I say it behoves us to carefully examine the manner in which the privilege has been exercised, and its effect on the representation of the opinion of constituencies. I have some feeling of sympathy with these unfortunate voters. They are driven like sheep to the poll, and in the presence of personation agents, local League officials or priests, they have to vote absolutely, entirely, and completely to order. I have here a statement by a candidate for an Irish constituency that the voters were drawn up in a sort of regimental order, their names were carefully called over in order to mark—hon. Members from Ireland will know what the expression “mark” means—the absentees from the roll call. Then the unfortunate voters were required to declare whether they were illiterate, and they were instructed who to vote for. I fear that in many parts of Ireland electors have to vote in the presence of the returning and personation officers in a manner which renders the intimidation of the voters both possible and practicable. And here I wish to explain that in any terms I have used I have endeavoured to guard against any attack on the Roman Catholic priesthood. I have a very high opinion of the useful work they do, not only in Ireland, but in every part of the world. Their valuable missionary enterprise in India I have myself seen, and my opinion is that there are no better, no more self-sacrificing workers in the evangelistic field in China than the Roman Catholic clergy. While they confine themselves to their honourable and exalted duties I entertain the greatest admiration for them, but I do consider that they depart from their vocation when they lead crowds of people to the polling booth and dictate as to the candidate to be voted for. When that is done my admiration diminishes. I agree with the views of a great speaker on this subject, if I may be allowed to coincide with so eminent a man as Lord Macaulay, who, when the question of the ballot was first discussed in this House, pointed out that his desire for that system was prompted by the wish to secure the voter against intimidation. He further pointed out that the House had done much to rid the constituencies of corruption, and then proceeded to say—

“Corruption has a sort of illegitimate relationship to benevolence, and engenders true feelings of a friendly and cordial nature. . . . But in intimidation the whole process is an odious one. The whole feeling on the part of the elector is that of shame and degradation, and hatred of the person to whom he has given his vote. The elector is, indeed, placed in a worse situation than if he had no vote at all: for there is not one of us who would not rather be without a vote than be compelled to give it to the person he dislikes above all others.”

I venture to say that the dictum that intimidation causes pain is truly and wisely applicable to the case of the man who has to go to the polling booth and tender his vote contrary to his dictates and intention. It may be asked why I, a London Member, address the House on this subject; and, in this connection. May I point out that I do so from no personal motive? Take the Metropolis as a whole, I think I am right in asserting that there is no part of the United Kingdom in which there are fewer illiterate voters. In Marylebone there were at the last election only two illiterate voters; in the constituency represented by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) there was only one such, and I am pleased to allude to the fact that in my own constituency (East St. Pancras) there were only four illiterates. Here I will point out that in the constituency of an hon. Member opposite, the Member for South Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill)—a gentleman of great literary and general ability, and whom I respect, though his views are not mine—out of 6,304 voters, no less than 3,200 voters claimed that they were illiterate. And here it may be remarked—as the Education Act was passed 20 years ago—every man now of the age of 30 years ought to be able to affix his mark to a voting paper. In this matter we need not look abroad, but, in passing, it may perhaps be mentioned that in America, where the obtaining of a vote is practically unrestricted, they have no such system as ours. I think that in these days a man ought to possess a sufficient degree of intelligence to enable him to vote under some system. If my Motion is carried, I quite allow the possibility of some system of marks against the candidates' names, in order that the least educated man may detect the candidate for whom he intends to vote. I have seen suggestions in a newspaper called the Pall Mall Gazette in other directions, but I will not touch upon these beyond remarking that they are clever, although I cannot say I entirely agree with them. My wish is not to disenfranchise the illiterates, but to prevent the infringement of the Ballot Act. Instituting a comparison between two cities in Derry and the Borough of Wandsworth, a strange and grave anomaly presents itself. In the former 5,000 electors have two Members of Parliament, whereas in the latter one Member represents 16,000 inhabitants. Can you imagine anything more striking than that nine men should only have the same weight in the Council of the nation as one illiterate voter in the divisions I have mentioned? Reverting to the question of intimidation, I very much doubt whether under the open system of the past that evil was so glaring as under cover of the clauses of the Ballot Act. The privilege of voting as conferred by that measure has, in my opinion, been notoriously and gravely abused. Indeed, I do not think that Parliament can fairly be said to represent the views of the people unless we have each district fairly and equitably re-distributed according to the population, and in such a way that a man may vote just as he chooses. The admirable intention of Parliament in this matter has been degraded, the secrecy of the Ballot has been violated, and it is essential that some remedy should be found. I could say much more on this subject, but I refrain in order that we may have a varied discussion of the expression of other views on a question which is grave and comprehensive, and which ought not to have a party character. My wish is to place the constituencies in the position the Ballot Act intended—that every man should be elected by the free wish of those whom he is sent to represent in this House. I beg to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, in the interests of true freedom of election, the clauses in the Ballot Act which permit the Illiterate Vote should be repealed.”

*COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I rise to second the Motion, and I shall do so in a very few words after the exhaustive introduction of the hon. Member who has just sat down. It must not be supposed that my motive in seconding is to disenfranchise any man; and in reference to what has been said regarding the illiterates of South Donegal, I will venture to doubt whether, out of the three or four thousands who voted for the hon. Member representing that constituency, there were more than three or four who could not have dabbed their pencils down in the right spot. I believe the average Irish voter to be a shrewd, intelligent fellow, and am perfectly certain that in nine cases out of ten he can, when called upon, place his vote mark in the right place, unless he deliberately puts it somewhere else. This question is not a new one. For the last five years I have had a Bill before the House aiming at a reform in this matter, and in the earlier stages I deemed it necessary to somewhat modify it in order that those who differ from me might not prefer the charge of disenfranchisement. I also introduced several devices in imitation of tramcar tickets, so that the voters might, by strips of colours, easily distinguish between the various candidates. My Bill provided that no minister of religion, of whatever denomination, shall be an agent in the booth or remain in or about that place. In making that proposition I have not the slightest intention of attacking any particular Church, for I consider the political interference of ministers of religion, of whatever denomination, harmful not only to themselves, but also to the body politic. Though ministers of religion they have a perfect right to their own opinions and a right also to express those opinions, but interference in the polling booth is entirely beyond their sphere. I have said this subject is not a new one. Shortly after the Act was passed an important Commission discussed the general provisions of the measure. The Report of that inquiry has already been alluded to, and I propose further to draw attention to one or two important features of the evidence given. One of the witnesses called before the Commission was Sir Joseph Heron, the Town Clerk for Manchester, who had acted as the Returning Officer for that city. Colonel Nolan said—

Mr. Webster

“A member of your Committee stated that the special provision might be used not only to delay voting, but also to facilitate bribery and intimidation.”

Sir Joseph Heron answered—

“In some places it seems to me that it would inevitably be the fact that they would arrange beforehand how they were to vote, and they would declare themselves to be illiterate in order that they might prove before the agent that they had voted as they had promised.”

The hon. and gallant Member for Galway, when he tendered his evidence, was asked—

“What is your view with regard to illiterate voters?”

He answered—

“I think I have had as much experience as any Member of the working of the Ballot machinery in Ireland for this reason, I made a canvass of the constituency before the Dissolution, and explained the Ballot to a great many voters and found that the general opinion among them was that nearly everyone, if he wished, would be able to mark the paper without telling anyone which way he wished to vote. “I found a great fear that if pressure was put upon the illiterate voters it would affect their votes, and that there were very few voters so illiterate that they would not be able to mark their votes in the same way as ordinary voters.”

The result was, I believe, that Colonel Nolan moved a clause in the Report to the effect that this special provision might be used as a means of discovering whether a man voted in accordance with a promise already made and that it might also be used to encourage bribery and intimidation. That is, as the hon. Member has pointed out, the use that has been made of illiterate voters, and we, therefore, desire to see this provision done away with. We have no wish to preclude them from recording their votes. Our opinion is—and the evidence of those most acquainted with the matter confirms our impression—that this class of voters would have been able, with few exceptions, to accurately give their vote without assistance. Recent experience has proved that a change in the law in this respect is required more than ever. As it was utterly hopeless for a private Member to get a Bill forward for Second Reading, unless he happened to be exceptionally fortunate in the ballot, I have withdrawn my Bill in order that my hon. Friend might bring forward this Motion, which I have much pleasure in now seconding.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, in the interests of true freedom of election, the clauses in the Ballot Act which permit the Illiterate Vote should be repealed,”—(Mr. Webster,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

(9.42.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I shall keep the House for a short time only, and indeed I should not have interfered at all in this Debate had not some personal remarks been made as to my own position. I must say that on a Motion of this kind, the tendency of which is to disfranchise a section of the community, the absence of many right hon. Gentlemen from the Treasury Bench is a subject of interest to me.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is the Opposition Front Bench?

MR. MAC NEILL: The Opposition Front Bench do not think it worth their while to attend, and I should not have thought it worth my while, but I chose to ward off slanders from my constituency when I have the opportunity. It is pleasant to see the courage of the hon. Members who have brought forward and seconded this Motion on the eve of a General Election. I should have imagined hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House would have been much more anxious to see how they could catch the votes of illiterate voters than to disfranchise them. This proposal, Mr. Speaker, is not a good one to go before the country with, and accordingly I regard with some amusement the absence of the Gentlemen who are mainly responsible for the course of Irish business. Now, Sir, this question of the non-education or illiteracy of Irish voters is one which lies very deep at the root of Irish misgovernment. Both hon. Gentlemen stated their case with great fairness, but the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Motion seems to have forgotten that Mr. Forster's Act was an English Act, and that the body of men—the Christian Brothers—who have the whole education of the people of Ireland in their hands are not supported by one farthing of public money. It is not the fault of the Irish people that they are ignorant. They owe their ignorance to a system which for years has kept the scales of darkness on their eyes. Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege of knowing many heads of households in Ireland who are illiterate. Long before I entered into politics special circumstances brought me into connection with them, and I can assure the House that many of these men who can neither read nor write are men of extraordinary intelligence and with an extreme zeal for learning. The real aim of this Motion is not to make the Ballot absolutely secret—hon. Gentlemen opposite resisted the Ballot as long as they could—but to disfranchise the men whom they suppose to be most under the power of the popular leaders of the country. I admit that these men are under that power, and why? Because they look with confidence to their leaders for protection against misery and injustice. But I am happy to say that the illiterate voter is dying out; he belongs to the past generation. The men who can neither read nor write are the victims of the atrocious system of government of times gone by. Do hon. Gentlemen who reproach the Irish race with ignorance know that it is the fault of former Unionist Governments in Ireland of which they are the successors? Do they know that every inducement in the way of learning has been held out to the peasants of Ireland to forsake their religion, but all in vain? One of the most wonderful chapters in Irish history is that which relates to the Charter Schools. These institutions were founded in Ireland by the English Government with the object of getting possession of the Irish Catholic child, and giving him a good Protestant education, and if he were a clever boy to send him to Trinity College. All this was done to entice the peasant away from his religion, but without success. The ignorance of the Irish people, having regard to the circumstances under which it exists, is to be admired and respected, for I know of no nation in Christendom where a people who have had such strong inducements to abandon their faith have kept to it. Unassisted as they have been, I maintain that the Irish have done their best to educate their children. Well, Mr. Speaker, blame has been cast upon the Irish priesthood—not directly but indirectly—for bringing the illiterate voters to the poll.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear hear!

MR. MAC NEILL: Who says "Hear hear"?

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I say "Hear hear!"

MR. MAC NEILL: The hon. Gentleman represents an agricultural constituency in England, and would he not be delighted if he could get the Primrose League parsons to take the smock-frocked labourers to the poll to vote in his favour? Well, Mr. Speaker, I have been through many elections and I have seen the action of the Catholic priesthood, and I can conscientiously say that these clergymen do nothing that other good men in their position would not do. They have great influence over the people because they deserve it. They guide the people and tell them how they should vote, and the people to whom these priests, in good days and in bad days, have been protectors and friends, generally act on their advice because it is for their own benefit. I am rather astonished at the absence of the Home Secretary from this Debate. If when a similar charge was made against the Irish priesthood some years ago, when the right hon. Gentleman was Member for Dungarvan and an obscure Member on the Opposition side—obscure men have only to rat and they became eminent on the Front Ministerial Bench—he said it was a social misfortune in Ireland that circumstances had forced the clergy into a position of prominence on political occasions, and had obliged them to become leaders on the popular side, and he added that the landlords must bear their share of blame for this result. The right hon. Gentleman also said that the Irish people had in their clergy "their only advisers and leaders." The idea that the clergy by acting as personating agents have, in the slightest degree affected the votes of these people is absolutely preposterous.

The people are only too delighted to show their respect and affection for their clergy—who have never yet led them wrong—by listening to their counsel and advice, and I maintain that the clergy have exercised their legitimate influence in acting at elections as they have done. Now, Sir, I wish for one moment to refer to a personal matter. It has been insinuated that my return was due to clerical intimidation or interference. I was returned by, I think, 4,606 votes, and my opponent was returned by 999 votes—at least that is how many votes he returned to Brighton with. It will scarcely be believed that the man who was put up by Dublin Castle to oppose me never came to the constituency at all. An agent was sent down, however, but for no other reason than to put us to expense. I was not returned as a Catholic, because I am a strong Protestant, while Mr. Munster—the Dublin Castle candidate—is a Catholic and a Liberal Unionist to boot. The true motive of this Motion is not to make the Ballot more secret, but to disfranchise a large number of men whose illiteracy is not their own fault, but the fault of those who, as long as they could, kept education from the people. I congratulate the Tory Party on having brought forward such a Motion as this immediately before the General Election. It shows that in going back to their constituencies they distrust the people. Lord Salisbury was the first to start this notion in a speech he made at the Mansion House in August last, but it has not been taken up by the First Lord of the Treasury. Now we have got a House for this discussion, I hope we shall go to a Division, because I am anxious to see how the Chief Secretary, and the Attorney General, and the First Lord of the Treasury will vote, and I hope the Division List will be a long one. I represent a constituency that is called illiterate, but I represent people who, if I transgressed in the slightest degree the moral code, would quickly call me over the coals. In their households in Donegal purity of life is known, and all the social virtues; the marriage tie is respected, and female virtue is safer than in a first-class carriage in one of your railway trains. If my constituents are illiterate they have probably exercised more intelligence than their more cultured neighbours, and I would not exchange them for the constituents which have returned hon. Gentlemen on the other side.

(10.3.) SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I rose before to take part in this Debate, but an hon. Friend said to me, "I would not speak till you hear the arguments on the other side." I have waited to hear the arguments, and I am waiting still. The hon. Member who has just sat down made a long speech, but he did not touch the question we are debating. I do not know what this has to do with the persecution of the Irish; the question is, is it a good thing or not that illiterates should be allowed to vote at elections? I congratulate the hon. Member (Mr. R. G. Webster) on having succeeded in getting a House, and I think it would have been a pity if he had not; for what can be more interesting to a Representative Assembly than a discussion on the manner in which it is elected?—and with all its faults this is the noblest Representative Assembly in the world. I venture to speak on this subject to-night, because I have been in the House a good while longer than many Members, and I remember the time when this Illiterate Clause was brought in by Mr. Forster. I forget who proposed it, but I remember that it came on about dinner time when the bulk of the Liberal Members had gone home to dinner. Two or three Liberal Members got up and said they were in favour of the clause, and Mr. Forster said afterwards—

"Well, I could not do anything else; there was no one here to back me up, and I was obliged to agree to the clause."

It was not carried by a very full or a very unanimous House; and after it had been carried I went into the Lobby and found an old friend of mine, a very strong Tory, who was literally dancing with delight. He said, "Now we have got this Illiterate Clause it is all right." He felt sure, as my hon. Friend (Mr. Mac Neill) feels sure, of being returned. But whether this clause was right or wrong, I would ask whether it is desirable to make provision for these illiterates now that twenty years have elapsed since we passed the Ballot Act? We have had education—Government education, compulsory education, and now free education—and it seems to me that even if it were necessary then it cannot be necessary now. I do not want to disfranchise anybody, and I do not think it is right to call this a disfranchising Motion. I do not think we can go into the matter as to whether people are very clever or whether they are able to discuss politics. The other day we were told that women were not to have votes because they were too stupid to exercise them. ["No!"] I know nobody said it, but I heard the leader of the anti-women party (Mr. S. Smith) say they are as good as we are; and having heard what was said, I think there is no other argument than that women are too stupid. But I would not disfranchise anybody, not even Peers, and I do not think we can go into an educational test at this time of day. It would be a ridiculous thing to confine the franchise only to those who are sufficiently educated to use it. If an educational test were necessary, I am afraid I should have very great difficulty myself in getting through. I think the whole question is whether the presence of this clause allowing illiterates to vote is, on the whole, an improvement of our representative system, or whether we should be better without it. We have had the Ballot now for nearly a generation to protect the people from a twofold injustice—from undue influence and undue corruption, from undue persuasion and from undue intimidation; and in my humble opinion, and from what I have heard and read, the keeping in of this clause about illiterate voters tends to weaken that system of election which we wished to adopt. It is, I really do think, ridiculous at this time of day to say these people could not vote. They could vote if they liked. With all the advantages we have in this country, and the extreme desire people have to get votes, it is absurd to say that they would not find out how to put their cross in the proper place on the ballot paper. They are not such fools as that. The hon. Member for South

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill) said that these illiterate voters were men of extraordinary intelligence, and I think they would certainly have intelligence enough to know where to put a cross.

MR. MAC NEILL: Wise men make mistakes sometimes.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I do not deny that; but what has that to do with the argument? The Member for South Donegal said that these illiterate voters were dying out. Then it is surely not necessary for us to keep up a clause for their protection; we do not want to protect dead men. My own opinion is, that the illiterate voter is a greater humbug than the bona fide traveller, and I say do not let us by our legislation confer special privileges on either dodgers or dunces, but put everybody on the same footing, and let all be protected fairly and fully by the Ballot Act. That is the principle of political equality, and, therefore, I shall support the Motion of the hon. Member.

(10.12.) MR. T. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): If the strong feelings to which the hon. Baronet has just given expression are his real views, it is a pity he did not endeavour, before making his speech, to bring the Motion more closely in accordance with those views. It seems to me that there is a strange inconsistency between the arguments which have been advanced in favour of this Motion and the words of the Motion itself. We are assured by the Mover and Seconder, and by the hon. Baronet, that they are all in favour of the franchise, and that they are all in favour of giving the franchise to the illiterate voter; but it is a singular fact that the combined ingenuity of the hon. Gentlemen has not been directed to find words which would give the means of secret voting to the illiterate, but to deprive him of voting at all. Instead of applying a remedy or devising a means by which the illiterate voter can give his vote free from intimidation and free from influence, the hon. Gentleman is endeavouring to deprive the illiterates of their votes. If the Motion of the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. Webster) had been a Motion to free the illiterates—whether in England, Ireland, or Scotland—from any influence that could control their vote, and to give them the same freedom of voting which the most educated and literate voter possesses, I would record my vote in its favour; but as it stands, it is nothing else, and can be nothing else, but a disfranchising Motion. It is idle for the hon. Baronet (Sir W. Lawson) to say that if the House passes this Motion the vote will be anything else but an attempt to deprive the illiterate voters of any means of recording their votes. We have had some strange arguments from the Mover of this Resolution (Mr. Webster). He endeavoured to be facetious at the expense of our country, and declared that it was the illiterate portion of Ireland which had given its vote solidly in favour of Home Rule. It is quite true; but does not the hon. Gentleman see that there is another side to this question? It is only natural that a body of men, which have been kept in the condition in which the Irish people have been kept under your laws and under your Government, should be extremely desirous of devising a system of government which would bring them better conditions. If the great body of the Irish voters are illiterate, the shame is not theirs; the shame belongs to the system of government which you have practised in that country. The speech of the hon. Member is a libel on Ireland. No body of men have with more difficulty and greater expense to themselves endeavoured to educate the people than the priesthood of Ireland. You have had in this country the advantages of a system of assisted education. In Ireland they have had to educate the people at their own expense; they could not have recourse to the means by which the national system of education was carried on. But I do not want to go back to such things, and it is only because I hear hon. Gentlemen utter such a slander as to say that the Irish priesthood have endeavoured to keep the people ignorant that I feel bound to say it is not true, and that hon. Gentlemen on the other side should be the last persons to make such assertions. We have heard a great deal about the system of intimidation exercised in Ireland; but why, if you wish to be consistent, should you, in order to punish the man who practises that intimidation, deprive the illiterate of his voting power, and allow the man who practises intimidation to go scot free. Is it impossible for Parliament to devise some secret means of voting by Ballot for the illiterate voters and for those who, in consequence of some physical disability, may not be able to record their votes? We have been told how in Ireland the voters are brought up by the priests to the poll. I regret that the priests have found it necessary, in the exercise of their duty, to take so prominent a part in political matters as they have done. But that is not confined to the priesthood in Ireland. I have seen the same thing at English elections. (Cries of "No!") Hon. Gentlemen may give their own experience; I am speaking of mine. I was at Barrow, and saw clergymen exercising the same system. That is not the argument. What we are addressing ourselves to is, Is the system bad? If so, stop it everywhere. What we want in Ireland is equality of votes, and if you find that system good for the government of your own community we shall be glad to follow your example in Ireland, when you give us the right to do so. Now, Sir, a great deal was endeavoured to be made out of the election of the hon. Member for South Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill). The figures quoted are undoubtedly figures which, if we did not know the circumstances which brought them about, would be to a large body of Irishmen a source of humiliation. It is necessary, however, to remember that the district is an almost exclusively Irish-speaking district. If you had given them the means of educating themselves in their own language—and you never have—you would not be able to say they were illiterate because they cannot read a ballot paper printed in English. If you take the figures for the whole country, how much do you gain by it? Some hon. Gentlemen say that some Home Rule Representatives would not be in the House but for the illiterate votes cast. Let them point out a single constituency where, if the illiterate voters had gone to the other side, the same Representative would not have been returned. In the constituency where the highest illiterate vote was cast the Unionist candidate polled 900. In one constituency at the General Election the Unionist candidate polled 74; if you were to add to those the whole of the illiterate votes, the Home Rule Representative would still have been returned. Of course, Sir, I admit at once that there is a great deal in the argument that there is a certain number of men who could properly record their votes and yet give illiterate votes, and I admit that there are cases where that power has been abused. But are you, because of that, to deprive every illiterate voter, every man suffering from physical disability, many of whom are intelligent men, of the right to vote? I admit while the present provision exists you give to the weakest members of the community—the men most liable to temptation—an opportunity of being corrupt in the exercise of their votes which you do not give to others. That is an anomaly and a grievance; but when I put that side by side with the question of depriving every illiterate voter—many of them intelligent men—of their votes, I cannot think of voting for the Motion. It is useless for Unionist Members to rely on the arguments put forward with regard to the election in South Donegal. If the votes were cast at the instance of the priests, if the priests came forward and advised the voters and accompanied them to the poll, the votes were cast for a Protestant and a stranger, who was never in Donegal before. When you accuse the Irish priests of bigotry, sectarianism, and a desire to exterminate Protestants, you contradict your own arguments when you point out that they persuaded the illiterate voters in Donegal to vote for a Protestant and a stranger. The hon. Gentleman would have little difficulty in passing his Motion if he would only put in the words of the Motion the principles which he avowed himself a supporter of in his argument. If the Motion passes in its present form it will undoubtedly deprive the illiterate voters of the right to cast their votes. ("No, no!") I must assume that hon. Gentlemen have not read the Motion, or that they do not understand the English language. I would be sorry to accuse any inhabitant of South Donegal of so much want of intelligence, if he could read the Motion, as to say it was not a disfranchising Motion. If the hon. Gentleman desires to prevent any suspicion that the Motion is for the purpose of disfranchising the illiterate voters, let him amend it and put it in a form which will make it clear that he wishes to devise some method by which they can give an uninfluenced vote, and he will then have the support of many Members on this side of the House.

*(10.30.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The Motion has been discussed as if it affected Ireland only. That is an entire mistake. The Motion covers the illiterate voter wherever that illiterate voter may exist, and that he exists elsewhere than in Ireland is abundantly proved by the figures in the Parliamentary Return. At the Election in 1885, out of 3,734,693 votes polled in England and Wales, 80,430 were illiterate votes. In Scotland, out of 447,588 votes polled, 7,708 were illiterate, while in Ireland, out of 450,906 votes polled, 98,404 were illiterate. I admit that there is a preponderance of illiterate votes in Ireland, but that does not justify speakers in attaching a sectional character to the Resolution. It affects illiterate voters throughout the United Kingdom. If the Resolution be passed and legislation is founded upon it, that legislation must affect England, Scotland and Wales, as well as Ireland. There is no doubt that the question must have a peculiar effect upon Ireland, as is shown by contrasting different parts of Ireland. Take Antrim and Cork, for instance. In 1885 there were 29,698 votes cast in County Antrim, and out of that number 2,550 were illiterate. In the County of Cork there were 30,047 votes, and of that number 11,587 were illiterate. That is a tolerable contrast; but, if you take the cities of Belfast and Cork, the contrast is as remarkable. Out of 25,178 votes cast in Belfast, 1,559 were illiterate, 999 being in the Western Division, represented by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton). In the City of Cork, with a vote of 8,376, there were 1,297 illiterates. In the two divisions of County Down, out of 16,010 votes, 2,182 were illiterate, of which number 2,021 were cast in the Southern Division. In the face of facts like these, the Resolution must have a special bearing on Ireland, but it should not be treated as a purely Irish Motion. The facts are not denied. Then what is the answer of the hon. Member for the most illiterate constituency in the three kingdoms—South Donegal—to this state of affairs? I think it was that it is not the Irish priest, and not the Irish peasant, who is to blame; it is the English Government. The English Government is a very convenient packhorse, but I protest against its being made to carry this load. When was the system of national education established in Ireland? It was in 1831, and therefore we have had sixty years during which education has been brought to the door of every peasant, and practically free. I am told in an aside that the Catholics could not accept that education. Who were the men on the first Board of National Education? Archbishop Murray, the head of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland at the time, was one of the leading promoters of the system. Why tell me that the Catholics could not accept the system sixty years ago, when the head of that Church was a member of the Board? It is impossible to put forward that argument. If the Catholics have not accepted the system, as the Protestants have accepted it, the results are seen when you contrast the counties of Antrim and Cork and the cities of Cork and Belfast. I submit, Sir, that the Resolution has been misrepresented to the House. The hon. and learned Member for the Harbour Division (Mr. T. Harrington) treated the Motion as a disfranchising Motion, and said that if it had been as liberal in its terms as the speech of the hon. Mover, he should have felt inclined to vote for it. What are the terms of the Resolution?—

"To call attention to the provisions of the Ballot Act in regard to the Illiterate Vote; and to move 'That, in the opinion of this House, in the interests of true freedom of election, the clauses in the Ballot Act which permit the Illiterate Vote should be repealed.'"

Mr. T. HARRINGTON: Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to say that what I contended was that the repealing of those clauses would deprive the illiterate voter of any means of voting at all?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I do not think the hon. Member has mended his position by the interruption. The Motion does not disfranchise illiterate voters; it simply withdraws the privilege that this House conferred on ignorance twenty years ago. If it were passed and legislation founded upon it, the illiterate voter instead of being disfranchised would find himself exactly in the position of the voter who can read and write, which is the position of most of the men who pretend to give an illiterate vote. The illiteracy of the Irish voter in great part is a fraud, is contrary to public order; and the priest, as personating agent in the booth, is able practically to control the vote which ought to be given in secret. Voting is not secret while that state of things exists. We have had eulogies of the Roman Catholic priests to-night, and I am not going to say a word against these gentlemen as priests, or that they do not deserve the eulogium passed upon them. They may be all that is said of them, but in the eyes of this House they are simply citizens. The hon. Member said that English clergymen acted in the same way, and that he had seen them.

Mr. T. HARRINGTON: I did not say it in that connection. I was replying to the Mover of the Resolution, who spoke of an instance where he had seen in some county in Ireland the priests accompanying the voters to the poll. The voters were drawn up outside the booth and the priest took their names. He described precisely what I have witnessed in an English constituency. I did not speak of English clergymen being personating agents or going into the booth, nor did I defend the Irish clergymen who did so.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I think the hon. Member has publicly and effectually barred himself, in Ireland, from taking that position. But what I want to point out to the House is that any attempt to draw any analogy between Irish and English clergymen in this matter must fall to the ground. I have been at more elections in England than the hon. and learned Member, and I have never yet seen an English clergyman, either belonging to the Established Church or a Nonconformist minister, acting in the way in which I have seen Roman Catholic priests acting in Ireland. I have never seen, and the hon. and learned Member for the Harbour Division has never seen, an English clergyman or a Nonconformist minister inside a polling-booth at an English election acting as a personating agent; and that is exactly the point where the danger comes in. If the Roman Catholic clergyman is not there inside the polling-booth acting as a personating agent, the illiterate vote might be tendered with impunity; and I say that his presence there, acting as a personating agent, invalidates the secrecy of the Ballot and the freedom of the electors, and if it was only for that reason alone, I should vote for the Resolution of the hon. Member. I submit now—because this is not a matter on which I wish to speak at any length—that the prevalence of illiteracy in Ireland must be a much more serious thing there than in this country. But I do not think that this is a disfranchising Resolution. It simply leaves the illiterate voter in the place occupied by every other voter, so that he can do with his voting paper whatever he pleases; and that was the object the Legislature had in view in passing the Ballot Act. I would object to any man wielding the power which a Roman Catholic priest wields in Ireland, being inside the polling-booth, acting as a personating agent. To see him standing there in the presence of the poor, illiterate voter to see how his voting paper is marked, and then to pretend that that is secrecy of the Ballot, is absurd nonsense. For that reason I support this Resolution.

(10.44.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I noticed that when the hon. Member for South Tyrone was referring in almost scornful tones to illiteracy in Ireland the most noticeable cheer—in fact, the only mocking cheer—which came from the other side of the House, came from the only Catholic Englishman, except the Home Secretary, who sits upon that side of the House.

Mr. T. W. Russell

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): When you have finished I shall have something to say.

MR. SEXTON: We are so accustomed to inarticulate expressions of opinion from the hon. Member that I, for my part, should welcome, if only for the novelty of the thing, any articulate expression of opinion from him, whatever may be its import. As I have said, the hon. Member, with the exception of the Home Secretary, is the solitary Representative of English Catholicism in this House. When the hon. Member for South Tyrone makes references to the illiteracy of the poor in Ireland—which has been their misfortune, not their crime, the result not of their own inclination, but of your policy—a mocking cheer comes from the Representative of the class of Catholics of this country, the aristocratic sections of whom have never had any sympathy with the sufferings and the wants of their poor Irish co-religionists. He is not ashamed to utter that mocking cheer, although he knows very well that if it had not been for the sufferings and the struggles of those poor ignorant Irishmen, those illiterate Irish who could not mark a ballot paper in the days of O'Connell any more than they can now—but, of course, there was open voting then—if it had not been that their trials, their sufferings, their shrewd and intelligent perception of political issues, notwithstanding the fact that they could not read and write, the hon. Gentleman and English Catholics whom he represents might be standing to-day outside the pale of the British Constitution. The miserable ingratitude of such conduct on the part of a class of the citizens of a great and wealthy country, who owe their emancipation to their efforts, must strike with disgust the mind of every chivalrous Protestant gentleman, no matter what may be his opinion on the Motion before the House. I confess upon the question of principle it appears to me to be open to discussion whether education, even primary education, is an essential to the intelligent exercise of the vote. I am glad that the First Lord of the Treasury is present. He is disposed to take a philosophical view of political questions, and I would put the point before him with some confidence whether it is so self-evident that a man who may be able to read and write is necessarily a more intelligent politician, or can cast a more intelligent vote, than a person of natural shrewdness and intelligence who has been condemned by circumstances to what is called ignorance, so far as education in schools is concerned? I am perfectly certain, though I have no clear proof of it, that there are Irish-speaking peasants in Donegal who take a more shrewd and intelligent view of their interests upon political questions—and it is for the protection of their own interests that the vote has been given to them—I say that there are Irish-speaking peasants in Donegal who take a more shrewd and intelligent view of political questions that concern them, than the hon. Member who moved this Motion takes on any political question, although he took a first at the University. If it were possible for this House to establish a competitive examination and draw a line across that Bar, and put at the Bar the hon. Gentleman who moved this Motion, and beside him an Irish-speaking peasant from Donegal, and cross-examine them both upon Irish political questions, I think the Irish peasant would come out uppermost. We talk about education. This House, I suppose, represents the quintessence of the efficiency of education. The Members of this House are supposed to be the most educated class, taken all in all, in the country. But to what practical use do Members of this House put their education in determining political issues? I think if we take the Divisions every day we shall see how the highly educated Gentlemen who are Members of this House apply their education in determining the issues brought before them. They smoke in one room, and play chess in another, and read the newspapers in another, and when they come to exercise their vote they take their directions from the Whips. I think an English gentleman who is vested with a responsible trust, when he takes his directions from a Whip at the door of this House, acts in a spirit which more requires restraint at the hands of the Constitution than an Irish peasant in Donegal when he takes advice from a priest. And I submit, if the vote has been given to a citizen for his own protection and for the advancement of his interests, that it is not an essential question whether or not that man can read or write. These poor Irish peasants, whether they speak Irish or English, have interests to protect. They follow the course of politics, though they are not able to read or write. What is the true inwardness of the Motion which has been presented to the House? It is simply this—that these men upon whose ignorance you depend for suggesting that they do not understand their own interests, apply their votes so much to the direct advocacy of their own interests that you find it has resulted to your inconvenience. There can be no doubt whatever that if the peasants in Ireland, literate or illiterate, had been found to vote in favour of the hon. Member who brought forward this Motion and hon. Members who have supported it, that that learned Gentleman who obtained such distinction at the University and who moved the Motion to-night would be found to be the loudest advocate in their favour. The Debate upon the Motion has resolved itself into an indictment of Ireland, and into an indictment of illiteracy in Ireland; and I am not surprised to find, from the patriotic services of the Irish priesthood, that the Debate on the Motion on the part of certain Gentlemen has resolved itself into an indictment of the Irish priests. It has been said that there is no analogy between the action of the Irish priests and the English parsons. No, Sir, there is no analogy. I should scorn to admit that there is any such analogy. The English parsons act selfishly, the English parsons act stealthily, and they often act corruptly; they always act in the interests of a social class and of a political party. The Irish priests act in the interests of their country because they love their people. It has been said that the Irish priests have striven to keep the peasants in ignorance. Well, Irishmen have long memories. It is not so long a time since, when the Irish priest endeavoured to teach his people, you set upon his head the same price as you set upon the head of a wolf. You have been 700 years in Ireland. During all that time you have applied yourselves, according to the intelligence and means of successive generations, to forward primary education in this country. When did you begin in Ireland? Until the last generation you left it in the hands of the priest and of the hedge-row pedagogue. Then you established a system of primary education, the design of which was to extirpate the nationality and uproot the faith of the people. Reference has been made by the Mover of the Motion to the designs of primary education as stated by Dr. Whately. Dr. Whately was one of the Commissioners of National Education. His words have not been quoted. I can quote them. He said—

“The main objects of your primary system to wean the Irish people from the errors of the Romish system and to undermine the vast fabric of the Romish faith.”

When the Irish priests came to learn, from the words of a Protestant Archbishop, that such had been the design of the system, it would not have been strange if they had not opposed themselves to it as a system which attacked vitally—I will not say their natural prejudices—but their religious faith and their natural sense of right, but I claim without the fear of denial that the success of primary education in Ireland is due to the ardent and continual co-operation of the priests. Without them your system would have failed; with them it has been a considerable success. One of the most astonishing facts in connection with this Motion is that during the twenty years that have elapsed since the Ballot Act was given, the proportion of illiteracy in Ireland has come to be vastly decreased. The Ballot Act was passed in 1870. If any hon. Member will take the trouble to examine the Census of 1871, and compare it with the Census of 1891, he will find that although this primary system of education has scarcely yet penetrated into some of the backward and Irish speaking districts of the country, although the National Board of Education has refused to adopt the intelligent bilingual method of teaching the English language, yet he will find that upon the whole illiteracy in Ireland since the Ballot Act was passed has decreased about one-third. Now, what is to be said of the intelligence of a graduate of the flower of English Universities who comes forward twenty years after this House deliberately passed the Ballot Act at a time when illiteracy in Ireland was known to be much more extensive than it is at the present moment, and who ignores the fact that illiteracy has decreased in such a proportion that in a few years there is reason to believe that it may be extinguished altogether? Why did he not recognise the force of events? It is apparent to anyone—I shall not say to an enlightened politician like the mover of this Motion—but I must say it is apparent to any man who in anything like a statesman-like spirit applies his mind to the case of Ireland, that this Parliament should rather rejoice that within a period of twenty years the proportion of illiteracy has so much decreased, and that the probability is that in the course of another decade it will have disappeared altogether.

MR. WEBSTER: I should like to know, if I am in order in asking the hon. Member, what number of illiterates there were in Ireland twenty years ago in proportion to the number at present?

MR. SEXTON: It does not take much experience to know that when an hon. Member, who after prolonged cogitation and who has had many months for consideration, brings forward a Motion in this House the onus of producing relevant facts in support of it is thrown upon him and not upon me. Perhaps the First Lord of the Treasury may consider that excusable, as he is himself an adept at introducing relevant facts that are useful, and leaving out those that are inconvenient. Possibly he thinks the hon. Member has acted upon that principle.

An hon. MEMBER: Go to the Library.

MR. SEXTON: At any rate, if you examine the Census for 1871 and 1891 you will find that the decrease, and the disappearance in some cases, of illiteracy is universal throughout Ireland, and that the change from illiteracy to literacy has been more extensive in the course of the last twenty years than in any previous years. Therefore the hon. Gentleman has committed a high Parliamentary crime in ignoring the cardinal facts of the case, because the whole course of education for the last twenty years entitles the House to rejoice at the experiment made in 1870, and to conclude that in the course of a very few years more every man will be able to cast his vote in Ireland under circumstances which will cause no suspicion of undue influence. The people of Ireland are extremely poor. In such districts as Donegal the land system which you established and which enabled the landlords to strip the people bare, and leave them naked and hungry, obliged poor parents to take their children away from school almost before the years of infancy were passed in order to assist them in obtaining the means of living. The ignorance, such as it is, that exists in Ireland now is partly due to the grinding poverty which was the result of your political policy—a political policy which only in the present day we have been able to modify—and partly due to the fact that the system of education in Ireland was not a system in accord with the principles or sympathies of the people; and I respectfully submit that if the question of illiteracy was to be taken into consideration, you ought to regard it rather in a spirit of sadness and of shame than in a spirit of mockery, rather as the fault of your own unwise—I will not say of your own criminal—policy than as any inclination of the Irish people towards ignorance. The way to cure such illiteracy as remains is not to deprive the poor illiterate peasant of the means of recording his vote; but to so reform the system of primary education as to make it accord with the sentiments and feelings of the people of Ireland.

(11.3) MR. DE LISLE: The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken did me the honour to lose his temper, and launch a personal attack upon me for what he was pleased to call "mocking jeers." I have read of persons who imagined that they had seen blue devils peeping round corners, and that they had shrieked at those blue devils. I leave it to the judgment of the House whether I am the blue devil the hon. Member sees in this House, or whether my existence was not objective, and rather due to his own diseased imagination. But I did give utterance to an expression which may have been thought to have been a mocking jeer, but it was not intended in the sense in which it was understood by the hon. Gentleman. My hon. Friend on the other side of the House threw, as it appeared to me, in the teeth of the poor Catholics of Ireland that they had not made that progress under the system of national education for some years which we in England had made under happier circumstances, and if I did give utterance to any sign it was intended to be dissent from the opinion that the national system of education which has been instituted in Ireland is a system which could be cordially and heartily supported by the Irish people. Irish Catholics naturally had demanded, still demand, and will demand Catholic education; and when the British State in its wisdom—I hope in a very few years—concedes to the Irish people the advantages which English Catholics enjoy, I have no doubt the Irish people will improve, and show that they are as intelligent, as quick in learning, and as anxious to reap the advantages of education as any section of the Queen's subjects.

MR. SEXTON: I entirely accept the statement of the hon. Gentleman, and express my regret.

MR. DE LISLE: The hon. Gentleman finds he has made a mistake for once in his life, and he will perhaps now feel that on many occasions when he has misjudged me he has done so because of his own ignorance. Now that I have been called to my legs I should like to say one word why I heartily support this Motion. I do not believe for a moment that one person in five of the Irish electorate is an illiterate voter. If they do give themselves out as illiterate voters I believe it is for a purpose. In my opinion, knowing the Irish people fairly well, or, at any rate, a considerable number of the Irish—because I have all my life been accustomed to meet Irishmen, a great many Irishmen live in my own neighbourhood, and I have been to school with many—I believe there is no Irishman who could not be taught in two hours how to distinguish between two names printed upon a paper. I believe the passing of this measure, as I believe it will be passed—I commend it to the Government as a subject to deal with before the next election takes place which, by the way, I think ought not to take place before this time next year—will not disfranchise a single voter in Ireland, because the so-called illiterate voters have sufficient wit and sufficient understanding to learn to distinguish between two names printed on a piece of paper. Only one other word, and it is with respect to the statement made by my hon. Friend (Mr. T. W. Russell), in which he spoke about priests being recognised merely as simple citizens. Now my only wish, in the interests of good government, is that the Catholic priests were recognised as simple citizens, and had the full rights of citizenship. Anyone who knows my constituency is well aware that I have often said I thought one of the difficulties which arise in dealing with the Irish question is that the Catholic priests have not their full rights as citizens, and are not allowed to hold that position which they hold in this country; and one of the best things Her Majesty's Government could do would be to concede full rights of citizenship to Irish priests. I do not know whether right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench are aware that a Roman Catholic priest has not these full rights. He is debarred by his orders—the orders of the Church of Rome, which are recognised by Act of Parliament—from the honour and privilege of sitting in this House.

An hon. MEMBER: So are English clergymen.

MR. DE LISLE: But his order is not represented in the other House. Now, as has just been said, English clergymen are debarred from sitting in this House, but their order is represented in the other House, and they are consequently brought into touch with the Constitution. My only wish is that the Roman Catholic priests might enjoy the full rights of English citizenship, and be brought into close touch with the Constitution; and I believe that if they were, in a few years the Conservative and Unionist Party would receive their support, for they would see that the only way to prevent such ebullitions of feeling as we have seen to-night is the maintenance of the fair, just, and honourable rule of one united Parliament for the whole of the United Kingdom.

(11.11) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): The terms of the Motion, as the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has said, do not apply specifically to Ireland, but are applicable to the whole of the voters in the United Kingdom, and they point to the necessity of preserving the principle of freedom of election. I entirely agree with the object of the Motion in that respect, and the question that I have to ask myself is whether a simple repealing of the illiterate voters' clause is a proper remedy for any defect there may be in ensuring that freedom of election. I do not know that it has been noticed—certainly it has not been by those who have spoken since I entered the House—that this question of the illiterates is really a consequence of the particular mode of taking the vote which is prescribed in the Ballot Act. If a mode had been prescribed similar to what is usual in many other places where the ballot prevails, there would not have been any question about illiteracy. A simple direction to put a ball into the right box for one candidate and another into the left box for the other would, under the present system of single-member constituencies, be almost enough for the purpose. Now, if it be really necessary for the purpose of securing freedom of election that the present rules with regard to illiterate voters should be done away with, then I should be quite willing to join with the hon. Member, but at the same time I should wish to substitute another mode of giving effect to this desire. I am, happily, not in the position of some persons who think they have to defend or to attack either

Mr. De Lisle

Roman Catholic or English clergymen. I cannot agree with the hon. Member for West Belfast that English clergymen often act corruptly. I do not think that that is the case. Nor, on the other hand, can I withhold at any time it may be necessary or advisable my testimony to the conduct of Roman Catholic clergymen in Ireland, who in a very difficult position have to a very large extent been the supporters, helps, and guides of their people. But if it be found that the presence of clergymen, whether of the Roman Catholic or any other denomination, is fatal to due freedom of election, then that freedom ought to be secured by direct disqualification inserted in the Act. In that case, you must go a great deal further, and disqualify, as personating agents, the recognised agents of landowners and influential persons who know large numbers of the lower classes. Yet I do not think that any disqualification can be wisely or effectually adopted. If you are to secure freedom of election, and you wish, on that account, to do away with illiterate voters, then substitute a different mode of taking the poll, for I think that to disqualify all those who cannot or will not, from a fear of showing their poor scholarship, attempt to write or are unable to trace a word on paper, would be to disqualify a portion of the constituency, which is undoubtedly suffering under a great disadvantage, but which ought not to be disfranchised. In my view, what we ought to do with every question in regard to the franchise is to get every force that exists among the people of England within the electoral roll. What we want is that all those who have opinions, who are exercising their influence upon, and have any weight with, their fellows, should have the opportunity of voting directly, and not of using indirect means—that they should give their votes in the polling-booth, and not be driven to make their voices heard in mobs or assemblies. On that account I should be most unwilling to disfranchise even the illiterate voters. But I go a little further. I decline altogether to admit that the absence of facility in reading or in writing is the right criterion to take as regards whether a person is fit to exercise the vote or not. I have met—I should think most Members have met—very many persons who always say they are no scholars, and consequently are afraid to write, who find some difficulty in reading, and yet who are men of shrewd sense, and quite competent to exercise their voices in their vote. I do not believe—I do not know there was ever a time when I did believe—that the franchise could be based in any sense upon education. I am quite certain that you do not get greater intelligence in politics by having specific forms of distinct education. What you do want is that the voters should be alive to what is going on around them—that they should take an interest in their fellows; that they should take over the difficulties that are met with; that if they cannot read they should attend and hear what is said—hear both sides, hear all sides. I think nothing can be more important for us than that all those who have influence should exercise that influence under the lines and in the cause of the Constitution; and it is our duty as legislators, if the present mode of exercising their vote infringes on the due freedom of election, to take other measures for that purpose. I shall vote against the Resolution.

(11.19.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Let me preface the very few words I have to say upon the Amendment which is before us by pointing out that we have not now to discuss a disfranchising measure. If I understand the contention of my hon. friend rightly, he does not in the least desire to disfranchise anybody. He does not intend to impose upon any particular class any special disqualification. All he desires to do is to remove from one class a special privilege to which he thinks they have no right. And, in the second place, let me point out that it is not a controversy, as some speeches that have been made would almost suggest, between the priests on the one side and the parsons on the other. The hon. Member for West Belfast, who, earlier in the debate, made one of his eloquent and spirited speeches, delivered himself of an invective against the clergy of the Church of England, whom he contrasted in a most unfavourable sense with the Roman Catholic priests of Ireland. I utterly fail to gather on what that comparison is based. I have, as the hon. Gentleman knows, never levelled any attack against the Irish priesthood as a class; but, at the same time, I must confess that no facts have been brought to my notice which would lead me to believe that in any public appointment requiring the display of any great quality, the class which the hon. Gentleman has taken under his special protection has any preferential claim as compared with the class which he has made the object of his attacks. The real question the House has to consider is not a question of disfranchising or enfranchising, but a question of how far we are to carry out the principles of the Ballot Act, and how far public policy requires us to remove a privilege which the Ballot Act conferred on certain classes of the community. The hon. Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin—a gentleman quite as well acquainted with the Roman Catholic constituencies of Ireland as even the hon. Member for West Belfast can profess to be—stated that the number of persons who claim to be illiterates is far in excess of the number who actually are illiterates. If that statement be true, it is evident that in Ireland, at all events, the provisions of the Ballot Act are deliberately abused. However, I think the question of principle, apart from all special Acts of Parliament, is one of even greater importance, and the question the House has to determine by this Resolution is, “Ought we, or ought we not, to give special privileges to people who, in spite of all the advantages in the way of primary education which have been conferred by Parliament upon the people of England, Ireland, and Scotland during the last two or three generations, are unable to put a cross opposite the name of the candidate whom they favour? The hon. Member for West Belfast appealed to me as to whether I did not think that a person who can neither read nor write might not, nevertheless, be as shrewd a judge of his own private interests and of any public interest as a person who has profited to the utmost by education? I admit he might be. I think that may happen, and I go much farther, and say that before the advantages of education were as widespread as they are now you would constantly find among the working classes of the population large numbers of persons who, though they could neither read nor write, showed as great a capacity for business and for deciding public questions as anybody, be their education what it might be. But circumstances have greatly changed since the Education Act was introduced. You will no longer find that the largest class of the population are unable to read and write. That state of things has gone, and under the operation of our Education Acts has, I believe, gone for ever; and now the class of the population who can neither read or write is certainly far from being that from which we should choose those we wish to conduct our private business and to direct our public affairs. The hon. Gentleman has pointed to the constituency of Donegal, where, I understand, a greater number of illiterates exist than in any other constituency in the three Kingdoms, and he has said that that constituency—I will not say is specially marked by its intelligence—but, at all events, shows great ability. We have no evidence of the special intelligence of any constituency, except so far as we are able to judge of it from the Gentlemen who sit in this House; and, judged by that test, I am far from complaining of the constituency which gives us the benefit of the eloquence of the hon. Gentleman who took part in this Debate earlier in the evening. At the same time, I must recall to the recollection of the House that, if we study statistics in this matter, among the population who cannot read nor write we find the greatest number of recruits to the criminal classes of the country. I have not the figures by me, but I should say that half the criminal classes in Ireland are unable to read and write. If you carry the investigation a little further, and study the proportion of children sent to industrial schools between the ages of six and fourteen, you will find an enormous proportion—I think I should not be wrong in saying three-fourths — are unable to read and write. That is a conclusive proof, I think, that this particular class is not a class upon which this House ought to desire to confer special privileges.

AN hon. MEMBER: Apply the argument to England?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am quite willing to apply it to England. I have only dealt with Ireland because the last two or three speeches have been specially addressed to the Irish side of the question; but, so far as I support this Motion, I do not do so specially with a view to Irish questions, but with a view to every constituency in the three Kingdoms. Therefore I think we should feel that it would be impossible for us to touch again the question of the franchise without dealing with this subject in accordance with the principles laid down by my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend is, of course, aware that even if the House assents to this Motion—as I hope it will—it will be impossible in this Session of Parliament, or for many Sessions of Parliament, probably, to introduce a Bill embodying in any practical shape the views which he has laid before us. Nevertheless, I think it would be well that we should record our deliberate opinion that if and when this House again takes in hand the consideration of what constituencies shall return the Members responsible for the Government of this country this, at all events, will be one of the questions which they will not be able to leave on one side; and it is because I hold that view, and hold it strongly, and because the Government of which I am a Member have shown their earnestness in this direction by introducing clauses in conformity with the views of my hon. Friend in the Local Government Bill for Ireland—of which we shall hear a great deal more next week—that I shall follow my hon. Friend if he proceeds to a Division, it being, of course, distinctly understood that we do not think it possible—indeed, it would be absurd to suppose so—that any Reform Bill embodying my hon. Friend's views can be introduced in the course of this Session, and that we commit ourselves only to the general proposition that when Parliament, in its wisdom, thinks fit to revise the principle upon which our electoral system is based, this will not be the least among the many important questions that will then come up for discussion, and have to be decided, and finally decided, I trust, in the sense of the Resolution of my hon. Friend.

(11.35.) MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): The right hon. Gentleman, with that cleverness which is perhaps worthy of his palmiest days of discussion in this House, has drawn from an apparent conflict of opinion between the hon. Member for Belfast and the hon. Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin an argument in support of his views. He endeavoured to show the House that there is a difference of opinion between those hon. Gentlemen, when there is absolutely none at all. My hon. Friend the Member for the Harbour Division, in alluding to the alleged illiteracy of the Donegal people, was simply repelling the idea that the voters there are as ignorant as many persons in this House believe them to be. The right hon. Gentleman has said that in Ireland the largest proportion of the criminal classes are to be found amongst the illiterates. It follows logically from that argument that the largest proportion of the criminal classes in England are also illiterate. Then does the right hon. Gentleman propose to disfranchise the classes in England that are illiterate? No, he does not. The practical effect of the Resolution before the House, if it were carried out, would be to disfranchise a great many persons in Ireland who, notwithstanding their illiteracy, ought not to be deprived of a right, for a defect in regard to education, for which they are not themselves entirely responsible. The primary object of the Motion, indeed, is to deprive the large portion of the Irish people of the vote, and that this is so is attested by the fact that few or no arguments have been addressed to the House during the Debate except such as have been drawn from the state of Ireland. The hon. Member who moved the Resolution said the largest number of illiterates was to be found in the Irish constituencies that supported Home Rule, and he drew the inference that these men supported Home Rule because they were so illiterate.

MR. WEBSTER: Excuse me; I simply stated the fact. I did not draw any conclusion at all.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I could draw no other inference from the fact than that it was the desire of the hon. Member, in introducing the Motion, to disfranchise or weaken the vote that was cast in Ireland for Home Rule. Why does not the hon. Gentleman go further and propose to disfranchise all constituents in Ireland who are in favour of Home Rule? That is the logical conclusion of his proposition. I suppose that those whom the hon. Member represents in St. Pancras are all learned men; but he will allow that Home Rule also exists in St. Pancras. If the hon. Member carried his argument to its logical conclusion he would bring forward a Motion to confer Home Rule upon Ireland, when, of course, learning and Conservatism would follow and Members from Ireland would sit on his side of the House. Certain it is that the people of Ireland are not Home Rulers because they are illiterate, but they are illiterate, to some extent, because they have not Home Rule. A good deal has been said about the action of the priests in Ireland in regard to the votes of illiterate persons, and it has been complained by hon. Members on the other side of the House that priests have exercised a certain amount of influence in elections. But who is to blame for the possession of that influence? Hon. Gentlemen have themselves to blame, if blame attaches, for the influence the priests possess. They are responsible, for they have neglected their duties to the people which the priests have performed. They have exercised the rights of property without performing any of its duties; they have allowed the priests to become the only educated class in Ireland who have stood up for the rights of the Irish people. To whom should the Irish people look for advice and counsel in political matters? It is only natural they should turn to those who in the past have stood by the people for the protection of rights attacked and confiscated by predecessors of hon. Gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House. I am one of those who have protested against the exercise of any undue influence on the part of clerics in politics. I am prepared to give the clergy all rights of citizenship and no more. I object to their being allowed to be present in polling-booths to exercise undue influence over voters, but I would allow the clergy of any Church to have the full right of citizenship by vote, and such influence as position and education should have. I draw a line at the polling-booth. That there may be danger of undue influence there I admit. But I would prefer the influence of the priests in politics to the disfranchisement contemplated by this Motion. Reproach has been cast upon the Irish people that they are not better educated; that they have not made better use of the system of national education in years past, and when one of my hon. Friends alluded to the neglect of Irish education in the past he was met with the derisive remark, "Are the old, the ignorant, and illiterate class who voted in old times still alive?" No, they are not, but it is not all at once you can get rid of the evil effects which grew up through centuries. The blight, the incubus of enforced ignorance cannot be removed in a generation or two. But the argument has been used on the other side of the House, and has found support on this, that illiteracy is going to remain in perpetuity in Ireland. My hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) has shown clearly that illiteracy among the Irish voters has declined enormously in the past twenty years, that it continues to decline, and we may look forward with hope to its entire disappearance in a short time. In considering this question the hon. Gentleman should have thought of some other method of removing this blot on our system of voting. The best way to meet the difficulty is to educate the class from whom come the illiterate voters, and to facilitate the passing into law of the Bill which is now before the House to give to the people of Ireland the full benefit of that principle of general education which has been productive of such good results in this country, and which, if extended to Ireland, would for ever remove the necessity for discussing here such a Motion as this.

(12.48.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): The state of the Benches near me indicates how little importance is attached to this discussion—what little reality there is in the Motion which has been brought forward.

MR. WEBSTER rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER said there yet remained time for discussion, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I will not delay the House for long. The unreality of the Motion is proved by the argument brought forward in its support, because hon. Members have relied on the fact that after all, if the Motion were carried into law, it would not disfranchise any large number of people, for these people would be able to fill up their papers even if they were denied the privileges allowed under the Ballot Act. It seems to me, if you propose a disfranchising Motion and support it by saying it will not have a disfranchising effect, you cut away the ground from your own feet. I was quite prepared to believe that very few voters would be disfranchised by the Motion; but so far as it has any reality at all it is a disfranchising Motion. ("No, no!") It is not? Why, the whole argument is that voters who are unable to fill up their papers shall have the privilege of having their papers filled up for them taken away. Now, we know that hon. Members on the other side believe that the smaller the register the better is their electoral chance, and so we have this method proposed of reducing the register. But the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House is far too clever to go before the country with a Disfranchisement Bill. He says he looks on the Motion with a considerable amount of favour; it is a good idea, but that it is impossible to give effect to it in this Parliament, or for a future Parliament for many years to come to give effect to the ideas of the hon. Member. The right hon. Gentleman sees that if the Motion were carried into law he would in the course of a few months go before the country having disfranchised a considerable section of the people. All I can say from our point of view on this side of the House is, if hon. Members like to identify themselves with a Disfranchisement Motion, we do not object, and shall be only too glad to see them bring forward a Bill to give effect to their Motion, and go to the country a few months hence with the reputation of having disfranchised 150,000 of the population.

(11.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 116.—(Div. List, No. 129.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

It being after Midnight, Mr. SPEAKER proceeded to interrupt the Business—

(12.5.) Whereupon Mr. WEBSTER rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(12.5.) The House divided:—Ayes 118; Noes 52.—(Div. List, No. 130.)

Question put accordingly, "That those words be there added."

(12.15.) The House divided:—Ayes 117; Noes 51.—(Div. List, No. 131.)

Words added.

Mr. WEBSTER claimed that the Main Question, as amended, be now put.

Main Question, as amended, put accordingly.

(12.25.) The House divided:—Ayes 115; Noes 50.—(Div. List, No. 132.)

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, in the interests of true freedom of election, the clauses in the Ballot Act which permit the Illiterate Vote should be repealed.

WATER COMPANIES (REGULATION OF POWERS) BILL [H.L.]

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, this Bill, to which I now ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading, is, with the exception of one or two particulars to which I will call attention in a moment, identical with a Bill which passed through this House in 1885, and which, while it was in this House, was considered in its details by a Select Committee. My Lords, this Bill has two main objects; it imposes upon all Water Companies who supply water for profit an obligation to send to every consumer a demand note containing the particulars of charge, and it also requires all Water Companies, when a dispute arises between them and any consumer of their water, to abstain from cutting off until a decision of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction has been obtained. In order that I may make clear to your Lordships the reasons for this Bill I may remind your Lordships of what the law is with regard to all Water Companies. At the present time on the first day of the quarter every consumer of water is required to tender to the office of the Water Company a quarter's payment of his water rate in advance, and he is also supposed by the law of England to know what the amount of his debt to the Water Company is; there is no obligation upon the Water Company to give any particulars of charge, and if on the first day of the quarter the consumer has not tendered to the Water Company the correct quarter's rate in advance, the Company are empowered and have the absolute right the very next day to cut off the supply of water. Under these circumstances, my Lords, it would be very strange if a good many abuses had not arisen, and this has been the case as some years ago I proved before the Select Committee. My Lords, this Bill passed through this House in 1885, but it was afterwards lost owing to want of time in the other House of Parliament, although certain portions of it were passed into law by Mr. Forrest Fulton two years later. I am now going to ask your Lordships again to pass the Bill, and I still have some hopes that there is time for it to become law. I believe it will be very useful if Parliament shall be able to pass it. I will now call your Lordships' attention in a very few words to the contents of the Bill. Under Clause 4 the Company is required to send to the consumer a demand note containing particulars of charge, and those particulars are to be furnished at various dates, which are more or less frequent as the house is a larger or a smaller house. The next point is that the consumer is allowed twenty-one days within which to consider the charges which are made, and, if during that time he thinks that any of those charges are open to dispute, he is allowed to dispute them; but at the same time he is obliged by the Bill to send in the particulars to which he objects, and the charge which he thinks ought to be made in lieu of the charge which is actually made. Then, in these cases of dispute, the Company are not allowed, as they are now, to settle the matter by cutting off the supply, but must bring the consumer before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction; and when the dispute is decided, if it is decided in favour of the Company, the Company may issue a notice that they will cut off the supply, which notice must run 14 days. In the same way in cases where no dispute has arisen the companies are allowed to at once issue a notice of their intention to cut off, which notice likewise has to run 14 days; and, if within those 14 days the bill has not been paid, then it is allowable for the Company to cut off the supply. I think those are the main provisions of the Bill. There are certain other minor provisions to which perhaps I may call attention in Committee, but which are devised quite as much in the interests of the companies as in those of the consumers. I ought perhaps to call attention to Clause 13 which defines the extent of the Act. Clause 13 states that this Act shall apply to where water is supplied for domestic purposes, and also to such cases where it is supplied partly for trade business or manufacture and partly for domestic purposes, if the amount in respect of domestic purposes is greater than the amount of the water rate for the other purposes. That last reservation is to meet a particular case. There are I understand a great many small shops where the shopkeeper lives above his shop, and it would be highly inconvenient if the house portion of the shop were to be subject to the Bill, and if the shop below were not so; but your Lordships will see that if the charge for the trade purposes be larger than the supply for domestic purposes, then the Bill is not to apply. That is the chief point of difference between this Bill and the Bill of 1885. I now ask your Lordships to give the Bill a Second Reading.

Moved, "That this Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord Knutsford): Might I ask the noble Earl what are the other points of difference?

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Under Clause 11, which is a new clause, when a Water Company cuts off the supply, the Company is to be required to give the Sanitary Authority notice that it is cut off—that is in accordance with the general law. There are other changes in drafting, but I am not aware of any other change in substance.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Com-

ALEXANDRA PALACE AND GROUNDS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I have opposed the Bill brought in by the Alexandra Palace Company on previous occasions, on the ground that they proposed to relieve themselves from the obligation not to build on the park, and I should oppose this Bill because it contains a clause in the same direction, but that I understand the promoters of the Bill propose to modify the clause to meet objections, and I, therefore, do not oppose this stage of the Bill. I further understand that the Company are negotiating with the London County Council for the purchase of the park.

MR. JOSEPH HOWARD (Middlesex, Tottenham): Yes, that is so.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL MONEY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(3.10.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): As this Bill constitutes a new departure, perhaps the House will expect me to say a few words in explanation on moving the Second Reading. The House has imposed on the London County Council, and the London County Council alone, the obligation of introducing an annual Money Bill, and we considered that under the circumstances we might fairly ask Her Majesty's Government to take charge of the measure. Up to last year the Bill was introduced by the Government, but, the Government having declined to undertake the duty any longer, I now have to move the Second Reading. I have no desire to go back on the question which was debated at length last year, and merely mention it now in explanation. The powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works to borrow were derived from various Acts, which powers have passed to the London County Council, together with the powers conferred by the Local Government Act, 1888. The series of Acts relating to the finances of the Metropolitan Board of Works began in 1869, the Act of that year containing the original provisions authorising the issue of Metropolitan Consolidated Stock. Further Acts were passed in 1870, 1871, and 1875, and since 1875 Acts have been passed annually. Since that date it has been arranged that the actual power of raising money shall be limited year by year to the requirements of the year; and Bills conferring the powers assumed to be needful have been introduced annually as Public Bills on the responsibility of the Treasury, and have been passed into law. The form of these Acts has differed almost every year, as experience from time to time has shown some alteration in the system of accounts to be desirable. In many of these Acts clauses have thus been introduced relating not only to money powers conferred on the Council or their predecessors during the particular year, but which have altered the general enactments in force under previous Acts. In the result there can be no doubt the series of Acts has reached an unsatisfactory condition, and the complications were made worse by the passing of the Local Government Act of 1888. That Act, while it purported to provide in general terms that the powers of borrowing and raising money should be exercised by the Council in accordance with the Acts relating to the Metropolitan Board of Works, introduced several alterations and contained sundry provisions with reference to the financial powers of the Council, which were inconsistent with the Acts of the Metropolitan Board. This state of things led to a good deal of criticism from time to time in both Houses of Parliament, it being justly observed that it was practically impossible for anybody to understand from the Bills as annually presented, and the current series of Acts, what powers the Council possessed, or how far those powers were being exercised in accordance with the law. Under these circumstances, it has been thought better to repeal the old Acts and place the law as it stands in a clear and intelligible form before Parliament. We do not wish to alter the law, but merely to place matters before the House in a way Members can understand, and this I hope has been done in a satisfactory manner; but of course we are ready to consider any suggestions that may be made in reference thereto. Passing now to the financial part of the Bill, the Bill confers borrowing powers on the London County Council to the extent of £5,800,000. At the present moment the amount of Metropolitan Consolidated Stock outstanding is £28,811,000, against which the amount standing to the credit of the Consolidated Loans Fund is £11,802,000. There are, however, some other debts and liabilities imposed on the Council, transferred from the Metropolitan Board of Works, and in connection with arrangements made under Local Acts for the counties of Surrey and Middlesex, and the result is that the total liabilities of the London County Council amount to about £30,000,000, while, on the other hand, there are assets in the Consolidated Loan Fund to the amount of £13,000,000, the net liabilities being therefore £17,000,000. But although the Bill does sanction these large borrowing powers of the Council for the next eighteen months, the facts are not quite so serious as might, at first sight, appear. We are obliged to insert in the Bill the maximum amounts which may be required for each purpose. Of the total amount, the sum of £2,900,000 is a re-grant of amounts sanctioned in previous Acts, and, again, £2,200,000 is for loans to be made by the Council to other Metropolitan Authorities, £1,250,000 being new, and, of course, requiring the consent of Her Majesty's Government. The new borrowing powers created for the Council itself amount to £1,600,000. The principal amounts in the Bill are as follows:—Blackwall Tunnel, £750,000; Main Drainage, £600,000; various street improvements, £450,000; housing of the working classes, £420,000; expenditure in connection with lunatic asylums, £320,000; capital expenditure on parks under the control of the Council, £250,000; purchase of tramways, £200,000; for purposes of the Fire Brigade service, £100,000. These are the principal amounts, and I conclude the House will not wish me to go into details in reference to them, for they may be more conveniently discussed at a subsequent stage of the Bill. I do not know that there is any opposition to the Bill, and having stated briefly the circumstances under which the Bill has been introduced, I hope the House will now give it a Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir J. Lubbock.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

THE WRECK ON BRIGG'S REEF.

SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the iron ss. Emily was wrecked on Brigg's Reef, off Groomsport, County Down, in 1889, and that, in the event of a wreck taking place on the same shoal, the local committee, the coxswains, and crew of the Groomsport Lifeboat consider the wreck of the Emily would be a source of great danger to the lifeboat's crew, especially at night; and whether, notwithstanding the fact that the Commissioners of Irish Lights do not consider the wreck dangerous for the lifeboat, he will give directions to have it forthwith removed; and, if not, whether he will state the grounds on which the Commissioners arrived at their decision?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Under the Acts for the removal of wrecks in the way of lifeboat service the Board of Trade can only deal with recommendations made by a general Lighthouse Authority. In the case referred to by my hon. Friend no such recommendation has been made to me, and the Commissioners of Irish Lights inform me that after consideration of a Report made by their Inspector of Lights, who had previously made a careful examination of the position of the Emily, they were led to the opinion that the wreck did not constitute a danger to the lifeboat service, the lifeboat station being three-quarters of a mile from the wreck, and it being therefore questionable whether it could be considered a hindrance or an obstacle to the launching of the lifeboat. The Commissioners say further that Brigg's Reef is marked by a first-class conical buoy, moored one-third of a cable from its northern extremity; and having regard to the great extent to which the reef is embayed, they consider there is only a very remote probability of another vessel becoming stranded on the same rock.

SIR E. BIRKBECK: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will have further inquiry made and ascertain whether it is not a fact that the lifeboat crew could not go out to the relief of a vessel in distress at night on this reef in consequence of the extreme danger to the lifeboat from this wreck?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: If that is a fact it should be brought before the Lighthouse Authorities. It is not my business to suggest expenditure in such matters—it is the duty of the Lighthouse Authorities.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (LICENCES REFUSED) RETURN.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Return, ordered on 15th February, of Intoxicating Liquors (Licences Refused) will be presented and distributed?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied): There is a reasonably good prospect that this voluminous Return will be presented before Parliament re-assembles after the Whitsuntide Recess.

SHILLELAGH POOR LAW ELECTION.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it has come to the knowledge of the Local Government Board that in the last election of Guardians for the Shillelagh Union, eight votes tendered for a candidate named Terence Byrne were rejected by the Returning Officer; that some of the votes were rejected on the ground that they were the votes of illiterate voters, although they were duly marked with the authority of the voter, and in his presence, and bore the signatures of witnesses; and whether, in view of the fact that Mr. Byrne's opponent in the election, Mr. Casey, was declared elected by a majority of two votes, and that Mr. Byrne claims that, if the votes which were disallowed by the Returning Officer were given him, he would have had a majority of legal votes, the Local Government Board will cause an independent inquiry to test the decision of the Returning Officer, and the claim of Mr. Byrne to have been duly elected?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The unsuccessful candidate for one of the divisions of the Union mentioned did forward a statement through his solicitor containing particulars of the votes claimed by him and objected to. The Local Government Board, after careful consideration of the explanations furnished by the Returning Officer, saw no reason to question the correctness of the return made by him for the division, and they therefore did not consider it necessary to put the division to the expense of a sworn inquiry in regard to the election.

JOHN M'GRATH'S PENSION.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) (for Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN, Cork, N.E.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if his attention has been directed to the case of Mr. John M'Grath, formerly of the 1st Battalion 18th Royal Irish, who after serving twenty-one years and one hundred and ninety-four days, including the Russian and Indian Mutiny Campaigns, and receiving two good conduct badges, the Crimean medal with clasp for Sebastopol, and the Turkish medal, was discharged on the 25th April, 1876, on a pension of tenpence a day; and whether, having regard to the fact that M'Grath is now disabled by old age and want of employment from augmenting this small sum, and is disqualified for Chelsea Hospital by reason of his pension, and having regard to the effect of such cases in discouraging recruiting, means will be taken to give M'Grath some increase of pension in recognition of his long and gallant service?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): John M'Grath since 1876 has been in receipt of the highest pension which could be awarded to him under the Royal Warrant. The possession of this does not disqualify him from admission to Chelsea or Kilmainham, and he would be almost certain to be admitted if he applied. I am afraid nothing can be done towards increasing the amount of the pension.

MR. SEXTON : He may be admitted if he applies ?

MR. BRODRICK : So far as I am aware, but of course it is a question for the Commissioners to decide.

POLICE AT IRISH NATIONAL FEDERATION MEETINGS.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is it true that at the last meeting of the Mallow Branch of the Irish National Federation the entrance door was watched by three policemen who took the names of members as they entered ; and, if so, by whom was this directed, and will it be continued ?

*MR. JACKSON : The Constabulary Authorities report that the house where the meeting was held was in a public street in Mallow, where it is customary for police to be on patrol duty. The patrol at the time referred to consisted of two men. They in no way interfered with the meeting.

MR. SEXTON : Patrolling seems to indicate passing through the street. Why did the police consider it necessary to stand at the door ?

*MR. JACKSON : I do not understand that the police did more than patrol duty.

MR. SEXTON : Will the right hon. Gentleman give instructions that the police shall avoid giving annoyance in so doing ?

*MR. JACKSON : I do not understand that in this instance any annoyance was given.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE POST OFFICE.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can say what are the special duties of the Financial Secretary to the Post Office ; by what officer of the Treasury or of the Post Office those duties have been carried on for the past five years during the lengthened and frequent absences of the present holder of the office ; and whether the Treasury are satisfied as to the manner in which, during the period referred to, the functions pertaining to the office of Financial Secretary have been discharged ?

Mr. Brodrick

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.) : The hon. Member will allow me to answer his question. The Financial Secretary to the Post Office is, as the title implies, the adviser of the Postmaster General on all financial questions. He is specially charged with the secretarial control of the Receiver and Accountant General's Department, and of the other account branches of the Post Office, including the Savings Bank. He is responsible for the preparation of the Estimates of both Revenue and Expenditure, and, as the "Accounting Officer" of the Department for the "Appropriation Accounts" rendered to the Comptroller and Auditor General. In the absence of the Financial Secretary, these duties were mainly undertaken by the Secretary to the Post Office, who had himself filled the office of Financial Secretary for the six years previous to the appointment of the present occupier of the post. The present Financial Secretary has only been absent from duty, except for his annual leave, for six months in the twelve years during which he has held the appointment—namely, two months in 1888 and four months in 1891-2. The latter period of leave, granted at my discretion, was highly desirable for the recovery of Mr. Turnor's health, and I have reason to believe that it has been effectual for that purpose. It may be added that during those twelve years the Financial Secretary has, generally speaking, undertaken the charge of the Department in the absence of the Secretary, whether on occasions of ordinary leave or of attendance at Postal Congresses abroad, some of the latter occasions being of a prolonged character. Since Mr. Turnor's accession to office the voted expenditure of the Postal and Telegraph Services has increased from £5,388,000 to £9,150,000, and the staff by 18,000. The Financial Secretary is the officer, not of the Treasury, but of the Postmaster General, and is responsible to him only for the proper discharge of his duties. It is believed that every Postmaster General who has preceded me during the period of Mr. Turnor's appointment has entertained a very high sense of the manner in which the important duties entrusted to him have been discharged. I must express my regret that the hon. Member has by his question given currency to an imputation against a very useful public servant, for which there is no justification.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I beg to say that in consequence of this answer I shall feel it my duty to refer to the subject in Committee on the Estimates.

SUNDAY POSTAL LABOUR IN DUBLIN.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will again inquire if the hall porters in the General Post Office, Dublin, are paid at the same overtime rate for Sunday duty as the postmen, from which class they were promoted; why in view of the fact that the Treasury Minute, dated August, 1891, fixed a time and a quarter rate for Sunday duty for all other officers, is a different rule enforced against the hall porters; and will he see that they are paid at the regulation rate?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hall porters at Dublin are not paid at the same rate for Sunday duty as the postmen; their work is not similar, and a certain attendance on Sunday formed part of their engagement on weekly wages. The Treasury letter of 20th July, 1891, to which I presume the hon. Member refers, authorised extra payment for Sunday work to postmen only. There is no regulation for making a similar payment to hall porters.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Does the arrangement apply only to Dublin?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Hall porters in London are on the same footing—two hours' attendance on Sundays is part of their duty.

SUNDAY CLOSING OF HOTELS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. BAIRD (Glasgow, Central): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the refusal of a hotel keeper in Dunfermline to admit to his hotel on Sunday, 1st May, two cyclists who arrived there from Glasgow; and whether Procurators Fiscal have any jurisdiction in such cases; and, if so, will he instruct them to exercise it?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I have inquired into this matter, and find that two cyclists arrived on the day in question at the Royal Hotel, Dunfermline, during church hours, when the proprietor and his wife were absent, and that they were refused admission. In cases of breach of certificate in burghs it is the duty of the Procurator Fiscal of the burgh to proceed against the offender. In this instance the prosecutor did not consider that the refusal to admit these persons justified him in taking any proceedings. Any complaint against this decision should be laid before the Magistrates. It is not a matter in which I have any power to interfere.

BAILIFFS AND FISHERMEN ON THE SHANNON.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the Press reports of an encounter between bailiffs and fishermen on the Shannon near Limerick, on the night of Sunday 8th instant, when two fishermen were seriously wounded by revolver shots alleged to have been fired by the chief bailiff and his assistants; whether any of the bailiffs have yet been placed under arrest, and whether the revolvers will be taken from these bailiffs, as was done in Cork recently; whether he is aware that the fishermen complain of the destruction of their nets, when fishing on their own waters, by the bailiffs' steam launch; and whether he will cause an inquiry to be held at once into the conduct of the chief bailiff and the state of the Limerick fisheries, as has repeatedly been requested by the fishermen?

*MR. JACKSON: It appears that the Inspector of Bailiffs alleges that the shots were fired in self-defence and when his life was in danger. Legal proceedings, however, have been instituted in the matter, and the case will no doubt be fully investigated in a Court of Law.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Is it alleged that the fishermen carried revolvers? If not, how is it contended that the life of the bailiff was in danger?

*MR. JACKSON: Life may be endangered from weapons other than revolvers.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Does the right hon. Gentleman encourage the use of revolvers as a means of self-defence?

*MR. JACKSON: There is no desire to encourage the use of revolvers.

COMPULSORY FIRE ESCAPES.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, although the Factory and Workshops Act, 1891, came into operation on the 1st January last, the majority of factory proprietors and owners in London and the country are unaware of its existence; whether any steps will be taken, and when, to enforce the provision of means of escape in case of fire, as required by Section 7 of the Act (Clause 2); and whether, in view of the terrible loss of life through fire at Battersea, Fulham, Victoria, and this week at Scott's in the Haymarket, he will consider the advisability of making compulsory the providing of fire escapes of a simple yet safe nature at all hotels, restaurants, and other places where a large number of persons are employed?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I cannot accept the statement that the majority of factory proprietors are unaware of the existence of the Factory and Workshops Act of last year. Abstracts of the Act were forwarded to every known occupier of a factory in the United Kingdom. In addition to this, the attention of every occupier was specially called to the chief alterations in the law by a circular letter signed by the Chief Inspector, and this circular was sent with each abstract. I may assure my hon. Friend that every care is and will be taken to secure the observance by factory occupiers of the provisions of Section 7 of the recent Act. I have already twice this Session answered the particular suggestion made in the third paragraph of the question.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: Is there any reason why a short amending Act should not be introduced? It is an important matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no further answer.

"GROGGING" SPIRIT CASKS.

MR. CAMERON CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the precautions which he has taken to prevent "grogging" in the case of home-sale casks can be extended to spirit casks imported from abroad?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Casks of foreign spirits are treated under the "grogging" regulations in a similar manner to those containing British spirits. In the case of empty spirit casks imported from abroad, the wood of which may be saturated with spirits, steps are being taken to prevent loss to the Revenue or injury to the British spirit trade from the "grogging" of such casks. I am informed that the importation of empty spirit casks for the purpose of grogging does not prevail extensively at present.

ROTHESAY SCHOOL BOARD AND THE GOVERNMENT GRANT.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the fact that the education grant earned last year by the public schools under the Rothsay School Board, having again amounted to more than half the expenditure upon them, the School Board has again resolved, rather than forego the surplus, to increase their expenditure by dividing the balance as a bonus among the teachers; whether he is aware that the higher class schools under the control of the same Board are carried on at a loss; and whether in view of the increased surplus anticipated by the Board for the current year, and the desire expressed by the Government to promote secondary education in Scotland, it could be arranged that the surplus grant earned by the public schools should be applied in reduction of the loss on the higher class schools, instead of being expended on bonuses devised for the avowed object of evading the restrictions imposed upon the payment of the grant?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I am not aware of anything peculiar in the financial position of the two schools under the Rothesay School Board, and from the balance sheets for both the schools for the year ending 31st March, 1891, it appears that in the case of one, the Parliamentary grant was very considerably less, and in the case of the other slightly less, than half the expenditure. The Scotch Education Department has not yet received the accounts of either of the schools under the Rothesay School Board for the school year just ended. I understand that these are the only schools under the management of the School Board, which has no higher class under its management. Section 20 of the Education Act of 1876, which applies to Scotland, provides that the income of schools sharing in the Parliamentary grant "shall be applied only for the purpose of public elementary schools."

ASSISTANCE IN PROVINCIAL POST OFFICES.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the large sums allowed under the Votes to the postmasters of some of the provincial head post offices for the purpose of providing assistance in addition to the ordinary established staff are placed at the absolute disposal of the postmasters of the respective offices to which such allowance is made; and what account is rendered or what check exercised over the expenditure of this money?

*SIR J. FERGUSON: The sums placed at the disposal of the postmasters individually are not large, being very rarely as much as £100 a year, and generally a good deal less than that amount. An account of the disposal of the money is rendered by postmasters to the surveyors of their districts.

DANGEROUS BATHING IN THE SHANNON.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick City): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if, in view of the dangerous condition of part of the southern foreshore of the River Shannon at the King's Island, near Limerick, held by the Military Authorities and used by the soldiers stationed in Limerick as a bathing place, he will direct that land posts or stockades be erected to warn persons of the treacherous state of the locality; whether, in addition to other fatal accidents, two soldiers of the Black Watch Regiment were drowned last summer at this spot; and whether the Corporation of Limerick have represented to the War Office the particular danger mentioned?

MR. BRODRICK: Two soldiers of the Black Watch were drowned last June at King's Island, where the Corporation of Limerick have established a bathing place by paying a nominal rent to the War Office, and it would appear desirable for the Corporation to take precautionary steps for the prevention of accidents. There is no record in the War Office of other fatal accidents, or of the representation referred to in the question.

MR. O'KEEFFE: Would the Corporation be debarred from taking steps to prevent accidents by reason of the land being the property of the War Department?

MR. BRODRICK: The Corporation may set up notices warning persons of the danger.

LISBURN WORKHOUSE.

MR. McCARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a letter of 14th April last, addressed by the Assistant Secretary of the Local Government Board to the Chairman of the Lisburn Board of Guardians, from which it appears that the bread supplied to the poor people in the Workhouse was "sour and badly baked"; that the wards are not sufficiently heated; that there is no schoolmistress in the Workhouse; that the relieving officers do not visit and report monthly on the condition of orphan and deserted children boarded out; if the Clerk of the Union, who is nearly ninety years of age, and unfit to perform the duties of his office, should be retired; and whether he will state what steps have been taken to redress these grievances?

*MR. JACKSON: The Local Government Inspector called attention to the several matters referred to in the question, and his remarks were communicated to the Guardians on the 14th ultimo, and they, at a subsequent meeting, explained for the information of the Local Government Board that the quality of the bread now supplied to the Workhouse has improved; that the matter of the heating of the several wards properly has been attended to; that there are only a few girls in the school, and the Guardians are of opinion that they are properly cared for and attended to; and that the relieving officers do visit and report on the condition of the orphan and deserted children; and further that the duties of the Clerk, who has a competent assistant, are discharged to the entire satisfaction of the Board.

THE LAND COMMISSION IN ARMAGH.

MR. McCARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state how many fair rent applications, and also the number of applications under the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, from County Armagh still remain undisposed of; and if he can mention the date and place fixed for the next sitting of the Sub-Commission in the County Armagh?

*MR. JACKSON: The Land Commissioners report that there are at present three hundred and sixty-eight applications to fix fair rents undisposed of from the County of Armagh, twenty-eight of which are applications under the Redemption of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891. A Sub-Commission will, it is expected, commence its sittings in the Town of Armagh to hear cases from the Union of Armagh in July next, and will take up the hearing of cases from other Unions in their turn.

ARMY MESS-TIN CONTRACTORS AND UNION WAGES.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether Messrs. Haynes and Co. have a contract for the War Office for mess-tins (1811); whether they are paying the men employed on the contract the recognised rate of wages prevailing in the trade for this work; and whether he will inquire into the matter?

MR. BRODRICK: The War Office has a contract with Messrs. Haynes for mess-tins, but no complaint of any kind has been received from their workpeople. When the firm tendered in November last they stated that the mess-tins would be made on the sectional system, for which there is not an accepted rate of wages; but they pledged themselves that their men took more money weekly by 10 to 15 per cent. than was earned by men making the same articles elsewhere, and they reported further that their men were perfectly satisfied. The Secretary of State does not consider that further inquiry is necessary.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Will the hon. Gentleman say what was the date of that Report?

MR. BRODRICK: The letter is dated November last.

LAND PURCHASE ACT RETURNS.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the Returns required by Section 33 of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, will be laid upon the Table and distributed?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham) (who replied): These Returns are nearly ready, and I hope they will be presented in the course of a few days.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that they are six months beyond statutory date?

MR. JACKSON: I do not think that is so.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to present the Returns before the Vote on Account is taken?

SIR J. GORST: I am not able to enter into any pledge on the subject.

MR. SEXTON: I shall object to proceeding with the Vote on Account in the absence of these Returns.

MEDICAL WITNESSES—"QUEEN V. MONTAGU."

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware that in the case of the "Queen v. Montagu," three medical men were summoned as witnesses who were ignorant of the entire circumstances of the case, unless by report; whether when one of them was put into the witness-box, the Judge would not allow him to be examined, and asked why he had been brought there; and if he can explain why these men were paid five guineas per day expenses, while the doctors brought from Coleraine, whose evidence was admissible, only received two guineas per day?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): It is a fact that three medical gentlemen were summoned to give evidence as experts. It is not the fact that the Judge asked why medical experts had been summoned as witnesses. He did remark that sufficient medical testimony had been given, and the evidence of the gentlemen referred to was not pressed. The three medical experts were gentlemen of eminence in their profession, and were paid special fees for a thorough examination of the whole case, and attending to give evidence at the trial. The fee appears to me to be a very moderate one.

THE GLENTIES RAILWAY.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is he aware that all the men employed on the Glenties portion of the line have been thrown out of employment, and that at the present time their families are very much in need of food; what is the amount of the contract for completing the line, and how much of that sum has been handed over to the contractors; and what additional time has been given to the contractors; and will they get a further extension if they ask it?

SIR J. GORST (who replied): I am not aware of the circumstances alleged in the first paragraph. The amount of the contract, less rolling stock, is £98,335, and the amount paid to the contractors is £8,971. No extension of time has been asked for or contemplated.

MR. O'HANLON: Does the right hon. Gentleman think it is wise on the part of the Government—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must not discuss a matter of opinion.

POLLING STATION FOR GLENCOLUMBKILLE.

MR. O'HANLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the distance from Glencolumbkille to the nearest polling station (County Donegal), an order can be made to give the Glencolumbkille voters a station, inasmuch as it is likely to be a contested Division at the next Election?

*MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member is perhaps not aware that I answered a similar question on the 5th of this month, and my answer was to the effect that I have no power to consider alterations of existing districts except on resolutions passed by Chairmen of Quarter Sessions.

MR. MAC NEILL: I put a subsequent question, in which I asked the right hon. Gentleman to communicate with the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, a supporter of his own.

*MR. JACKSON: And I recommended the hon. Member to communicate with the Chairman.

MR. O'HANLON: Will the right hon. Gentleman take the trouble to visit the district? I think his predecessor went to Killibegs.

*MR. JACKSON: I should be very glad of the opportunity of visiting this very beautiful district.

NUMBER OF BONDED WAREHOUSES.

MR. O'HANLON: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many merchants or firms in Ireland, England, and Scotland are allowed to bottle spirits in bond?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The number of bonded warehouses in which the bottling of spirits is allowed is, in Ireland, forty-one; in England, one hundred and forty-four; in Scotland, one hundred and four; total, two hundred and eighty-nine. There is no record of the precise number of firms who avail themselves of the privileges granted to these warehouses.

THE CONVICTION OF MR. LEWIS LYONS.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State, for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a letter in the Daily News of the 10th instant, and signed by Mr. H. Whorlow, regarding the case of Mr. Lewis Lyons, President of the International Tailors' Union, who is at present undergoing a sentence of six months' imprisonment on a conviction for libelling a firm of tailors, by describing them as "sweaters," in an article in Yiddish in a small trade publication entitled the Jewish Trade Unionist; and whether, considering that Lyons admitted the authorship of the article but was prevented from bringing forward his witnesses in justification because he had failed to give the notice required by law of such a plea, he will look into the statement of the case in the letter referred to with a view, if it is correct, of reducing the sentence?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the learned Recorder that the defendant had been dismissed from the service of the prosecutor because his practices were not consistent with honesty; that he had several times applied unsuccessfully to be taken back into the prosecutor's employ, and afterwards published the libel when the prosecutor was a candidate at the recent election to the London County Council. The defendant having stated before the magistrate who committed him that he intended to call witnesses, the prosecutor's solicitors wrote to him on 29th March to inform him, as he was not legally represented, that it would be necessary for him to file a plea of justification if he wished to call witnesses. The Recorder, considering that this letter was sufficient notice to the defendant if he really wished to justify the libel, refused to postpone the trial. The prosecutor was called, and cross-examined by counsel for the defendant. He disproved the allegations in the libel. The learned Recorder informs me that he was satisfied that the libel was a personal attack and not an honest attempt to expose a sweater. I see no ground for interfering with the sentence.
